notoriety which I so hated. If it had been my own individual case alone, I should have eagerly accepted the offer, and made the compromise. But when I thought how much was involved, how many other lives would be affected by the decision which would be given in my case, I put all thought of settlement aside. I would not now be bought by the man who refused to care for me when it was his duty to do so; and I said to my lawyers, and General Maxwell, "Go on." There was no further delay, and the legal fight commenced at once. As so much has been said concerning this trial, and as it seems so generally misunderstood, I will devote a chapter to the legal points, and an epitome of the court proceedings, as far as they have reached, so that the general public may more fully understand what I sought, and what grounds I had to justify my action.

ON the 28th of July, 1873, I commenced an action for divorce against Brigham Young in the District Court of the Third Judicial District of Utah, and the "Complaint" was served upon him by the United States marshal.

This "Complaint" set forth, with the usual proximity of all legal instruments, the grievances which I had appealed to the law to remedy; but, as it would be utterly impossible, in the circumscribed limits of these pages, to give that document entire, I shall present the reader with as succinct a resumé of its contents as I possibly can.

554 STATING MY CASE.

It was addressed "To the Hon. James B. McKean, Judge of the Third Judicial District Court, in and for the Territory of Utah, and the County of Salt Lake, in Chancery sitting," and the following are the several items which it contained—

It began by stating who and what I was; that I was born at Nauvoo, Illinois, but had, since the year 1848, been resident in Utah; and that I was the wife of Brigham Young; and that I was married to him on the 6th of April, 1868, when I was in my twenty-fifth year, and was the mother of two children by a former marriage, one four and the other three years of age; that neither I nor my children had anything to depend upon— a fact of which Brigham was well aware,— and also that my children were boys, still living.

That Brigham had lived with me for about a year after our marriage, treating me with some degree of kindness, and providing, though inadequately, for my support; and that I had always fulfilled my duties as a wife toward him.

That about a year after our marriage he began to neglect and ill-treat me; that during the year 1869 he sent me, against my wishes, to a farm, four miles distant from Salt Lake City, where, for three years and a half I was compelled to labor until I was completely broken down in health; that my only companion was my mother; that, except the limited fare which the defendant allowed me, he appropriated all he proceeds of the farm; and that on the few occasions when he visited the farm he treated me with studied contempt, objecting even to my aged mother remaining with me, after her health was destroyed by overwork on his farm.

That toward the end of 1872 Brigham removed me to a house in Salt Lake City, where, however, he seldom visited me; that when I called upon him to ask a supply of the necessities of life, he used the most opprobrious language toward me, and gave me so little that I had to work constantly to support myself and my children.

That for five years past my health had been so bad that I was now unfitted to labor, and was in constant need of medical advice; that Brigham knew it, but repeatedly refused to furnish me with assistance, medicine, or food, so that I was obliged to rely on the charity of friends; that Brigham had declared he would never do anything more for me, and said that henceforth I must support myself, notwithstanding that he was the owner of several millions of dollars; that, as President of the Mormon Church, he occupied a very important position, and I believed that his monthly income could not be less than forty thousand dollars.

That I had been compelled to sell my furniture, and all my household goods, in order to obtain the necessities of life; and that, for a year previous to that date [1873], Brigham had entirely deserted me.

Further, I stated that it was impossible for our union to continue; that I prayed for a separation, and also an allowance, as all I possessed consisted of about three hundred dollars, and my children were dependent upon me for support; I asserted that I had secured the aid of Messrs. F. M. Smith, A. Hagan, and F. Tilford as my counsel; that I had been informed that twenty thousand dollars would be a reasonable compensation; and I therefore prayed he court to direct a subpoena, commanding the defendant, Brigham Young, to appear to answer to my suit; that, pending it, he might be ordered to pay me a thousand dollars a month from the date of filing this bill, a preliminary fee of six thousand dollars to my counsel, and that after the final decree he should pay them the remaining fourteen thousand, and all the expenses of the court.

Furthermore, I prayed, that after our legal separation, he might be ordered to support myself and children suitable; and that for the purpose the sum of two hundred thousand dollars might be set aside from his estate.

556 THE PROPHET'S INCOME.

This bill, the substance of which I have given above, was signed by my solicitors, Smith, Hagan, and Jilford, and to it the following was appended—“TERRITORY OF UTAH, County of Salt Lake, ss.

“Ann Eliza Young, being first duly sworn, deposes and says: That she is the complainant in the above entitled action; that she had heard read the foregoing bill of complaint, and knows the contents thereof, and that the same is true of her own knowledge, except the matters and things therein stated on information and belief, and as to those she believes them to be true.

“ANN ELIZA YOUNG.

“Subscribed and sworn to before me, this 19th day of July, A.D., 1873.

JOSEPH F. NOUNNAN, Clerk.”

A motion for an allowance and counsel fees was notice for hearing at the same time, and the service was by the same officer. This document was headed with all due form and ceremony. It stated, I, Ann Eliza Young, the plaintiff, being duly sworn, alleged:

That I was the wife of Brigham Young, the defendant; that while I was living with him, and performing the work mentioned in the bill already filed, he acquired enormous property, of the value of several millions of dollars, and was now the owner of at least eight million.

That I had no means of knowing his exact income, but was sufficiently informed to allege that it was at least forty thousand dollars a month.

That the facts stated in the bill were true; that I and my children were penniless; that knowing the power and influence of Brigham, that he had the disposition to harm me, and that my life would be unsafe in any private house, I had taken refuge in the chief hotel in Salt Lake City,—the Walker House,—about the 15th of July, where I had since resided; that my expenses were very large, but that I had no income, and that me health was too feeble to allow me to work. I therefore prayed the court to grant me the items included in the bill already filed.

This affidavit was signed by me, and countersigned by Joseph F. Nounnan, the clerk of the court.

Attached to it was an affidavit, signed C. M. Turck, making, upon oath, a statement of the destitute condition in which I was previous to the time when I left my private residence and went to the Walker House.

On this affidavit it is needless for me to speak in detail, further than to say that it more than fully establishes to the utmost all that the previous bill and affidavit affirmed. Other affidavits were made by gentlemen who knew me well,—one by Mr. Malcolm Graham, and another by me medical advisor, J. M. Williamson, both of which full confirmed my own statements.

James B. McKean, judge of the court, was absent temporarily an account of sickness at that time, and Judge Emerson, of the First District Court, presided for him. Judge McKean had held that, in equity cases, the United States marshal was the proper officer to serve process, but the defendant came into court at the time appointed for the hearing, and moved to quash the service of the process, on the ground that the “territorial marshal,” and not the United States marshal was the proper officer to serve the process in the case. Reversing the rule administered by Judge McKean, the judge temporarily presiding held the motion good, and quashed the service.

Therefore new process was issued, and placed in the hands of the territorial marshal, accompanied by an order to the defendant to appear and answer to the motion for and allowance and alimony. This was regularly served, and at the day appointed the defendant appeared by counsel, and, for cause against the motion, filed his demurrer to the bill, on the ground that the District Court had not jurisdiction tion of the subject of divorce in Utah Territory. Two days were occupied in the argument of this question, and it was taken under advisement for ten days longer. At the end of that time the presiding judge came into court, and held that this court had no jurisdiction in matters of divorce, and denied the motion.

The case then stood over, by an agreement between the counsel, until the following May, 1874. The Supreme Court of the Territory, at its term held in that month, in the case of Cast vs. Cast, decided that the district courts of the territory had jurisdiction in actions for divorce and alimony, thus reversing the opinion of Emerson, justice in this case. The case being afterwards—in July, 1874—called on for hearing on the demurrer to the complaint in the District Court, McKean, presiding, overruled the demurrer, and gave the defendant leave to answer.

Thereupon my counsel asked and obtained leave to renew the motion for an allowance and alimony pending the suit which had been denied. It is proper also here to state, that on the 24th of June, 1874, Congress enacted a law expressly conferring authority in divorce cases on the District Court of the Territory; but his law only affirmed by legislation what the Supreme Court had already decided to be the law.

On the 24th of August, 1874, Brigham Young filed an answer, of which the following is a correct summary—

He denies that at any time he had been married to me.

That at the time when my affidavit alleged that this marriage to me took place, I was really the wife of James L. Dee, never having been legally divorced from him, but that he [Brigham] believed at the time of the alleged marriage in April, 1868, that I had been properly divorced from Dee.

He alleged his previous marriage with Mrs. Mary Ann Angell Young, at Kirtland, Ohio, on the 10th of January, 1834, and that the said legal wife was still living, of which fact I, complainant, was aware.

559 BRIGHAM'S STATEMENT.

He admitted his marriage with me, after the custom of the Latter-Day Saints, but denied that the marriage was legal, in any sense acknowledged by the laws of the land.

He then proceeded to deny every one of the counts in my complaint, seriatim, winding up with the following statement—

“Defendant denies that he is or has been the owner of wealth amounting to several millions of dollars, or that he is or has been in the monthly receipt from his property of forty thousand dollars or more. On the contrary, defendant alleges that, according to his best knowledge, information, and belief, all his property, taken together, does not exceed in value the sum of six hundred thousand dollars, and that his gross income from all his property, and every source, does not exceed six thousand dollars per month.

“Defendant further says, that at the time of the said alleged marriage, this defendant had, and still has, a very large family; that his said family now consists of sixty-three persons, all of whom are dependant upon this defendant for maintenance and support.

“Whereof the defendant prays judgement of the court that he be hence dismisses with his costs herein.

“WILLIAMS, YOUNG, & SHEEKES, and HEMPSTEAD & KIRKPATRICK,

Defendant's Attorneys.”

To the replication of defendant, which was very lengthy, denying or explaining away every point in the bill which I had filed, the following was appended—

“TERRITORY OF UTAH, County of Salt Lake. ss.

“Brigham Young, being duly sworn, on his oath says: That he has heard read the foregoing answer, and know and understands the contents thereof, and that the same is true of his own knowledge, except those matters therein stated on his information and belief, and as to those matters he believes it to be true. Affiant further says that he is the defendant in the above entitled suit.

“Subscribed and sworn to before me this 25th day of August, 1874.

“Jos. F. NOUNNAN, Clerk.”

The court then gave me, or my counsel for me, leave to renew the motion for alimony as asked; and notice having been given, the motion was by agreement fixed for hearing on the 3rd day of October following. My counsel also filed a motion to strike out portions of the defendant's answer, and on hearing the motion for alimony, insisted upon submitting it to the court. When the motion was called for hearing, I offered to submit a number of affidavits bearing on the question of alimony, which were filed and severed with the original complaint. The defendant objected to the reading of them, on the ground that they had not had sufficient notice of them by the notice renewing the motion, and they were withdrawn.

The defendant then offered to read affidavits in support of his answer, but as they had not been served, and their contents not made known prior to the hearing, they were objected to and excluded. It also appeared that the affidavits were addressed to other matter of defense than those set up in the answer.

The hearing was then had upon my complaint and the defendant's answer, my counsel at the same time submitting their motion to strike out certain objectionable portions of the answer, and insisting that such portions should be disregarded by the court, and treated—if the motion were well founded—as out of the answer.

The questions involved were argued, and on the 23rd day of February, 1875, the judge decided the motion for alimony, pending the suit, in an elaborate written opinion, of which the following is an accurate summary—

The Judge, Jas. B. McKean, laid down nine general axioms tending to demonstrate that the defendant's pleas were invalid; that a marriage solemnized in Utah, after Mormon fashion, would be legally valid, provided the parties were married were competent to enter into that engagement; that the court could not grant a divorce if the marriage were proved to be bigamous or polygamous; that the court had power to grant alimony, and intended to do so to the extent of one twelfth of what the defendant admitted his income to be, or one eightieth according to my assertion.

He then summed up the statements of both parties to the suit. He gave the substance of my "Complaint," and then took into consideration Brigham Young's reply.

Then he considered the defendant's denial that any marriage had ever taken place between us; his statement that, at the time when I alleged that our marriage took place, I was actually the wife of Jas. L. Dee, never having been properly divorced from him; and also his admission that we had been married polygamously in April, 1868.

The judge gave quotations from various sources to prove that this marriage was legal and binding according to the laws of the Territory and of the United States, notwithstanding that the forms of the Mormon Church were used; providing, always, that we were both competent to enter into the contract.

He discussed the assertion of defendant that he was also incompetent to marry while his lawful wife, Mary Ann Angell, was still living. This, the judge explained, was the admission of felony; as, if admitted, it would prove that the defendant had entered into a bigamous marriage. Such statements he, the judge, said should be admitted as evidence, so far as they were to defendant's prejudice, but must be proved true before they could be admitted as evidence against the plaintiff. The defendant must prove that the plaintiff was the wife of another man, and that he himself was the husband of another woman, on the 6th of April, 1868.

The judge stated, that in order to prove the allegations made on both sides, it would be necessary to summon witnesses, procure documentary evidence, etc, which would involve very great expense. He should, therefore, allow alimony, and a certain amount for costs of prosecution.

He quoted legal precedents to show what amount should be considered reasonable; and then he summed up, and decreed that, after considering all circumstances, the court had concluded to order defendant to pay three thousand dollars for the prosecution of the suit, and also five hundred dollars a month for the maintenance of plaintiff and her children, from the day of the filing of the "Complaint." The order was accordingly made.

In deciding the question, it will be seen that virtually the court disregarded portions of the answer, and, to that extent, sustained the motion to strike out those portions, though it did not formally pass on that motion.

The defendant expected to the decision, and shortly afterward filed a notice of appeal, and bond to stay proceedings under the order.

The copy of the order directing payment of the alimony was duly served personally of Brigham Young; and demand having been made upon him for the allowance made for my attorney's fees, and payment refused, he was arrested in proceedings in contempt, and brought before the court.

His answer to the proceedings consisted of a showing that he had taken an appeal, and filed a bond for a stay, etc., and, therefore, he was not in contempt. The court held it not to be an appealable order, and adjudged that he pay a fine of twenty-five dollars, and be committed to custody for one day, which was complied with.

Thereupon he caused the amount then due under the order to be paid. My allowance he had been given twenty days to pay, and this portion of the order had not been complied with, and had not become due, except five hundred dollars, which was paid, when Judge McKean was removed by President Grant, and David P. Lowe, and ex-congressman from Kansas, was appointed chief-justice, and succeeded to the position.

Shortly after Judge Lowe entered upon his duties, proceedings were begun by counsel to bring the defendant up again in contempt, for refusing to comply with the order as first stated. On appearing, he again showed cause, by claiming his right of appeal, as in the former hearing; and objected, also, that the district courts had no jurisdiction of matters of divorce at the time of the bringing of the suit; that the order was null and void; that there was no contempt.

The court held, in deciding the matter, that it had jurisdiction; that the order was not appealable. In the course of his summing up, he said, "The complaint and answer are each upon oath, and it appears from the record as well as from the statement of counsel in argument, that the order for alimony and expenses was made upon the complaint and answer alone, without any other evidence or showing whatever. It is the general doctrine of the courts in divorce, that before temporary alimony can properly be awarded, that marriage must be admitted by the parties, or established by proofs. In the very recent case of York vs. York, 34 Iowa, 530, it is said, 'Alimony is a right that results from the marital relation, and the fact of marriage between the parties must be admitted or proved before there can be a decree for it even pendente lite.'" He then decided that the order was erroneously made, and dismissed the proceedings against the defendant.

The case now stands, therefore, on the motion (not yet formally passed on) to strike out portions of the defendant's answer. The defendant has also filed a motion to vacate and set aside the original order granting the alimony, and the two will probably be heard together.

My counsel, for me, insist that I am entitled to the alimony upon the following grounds—

1st. That it is alleged in the complaint that the plaintiff and defendant were married at a time and place designated. The defendant admits that a marriage ceremony did take place, and sets up new facts to show that the marriage which actually occurred was invalid. On this state of facts the plaintiff insists that, pending the question as to the legality of the marriage, she is entitled to alimony.

2nd. It is denied by the plaintiff that the new matter in the answer ought to be disregarded; first, because it is badly pleaded; and, second, it is an attempt on the part of the defendant to take advantage of his own wrong, to wit, the assertion that he had a lawful wife living, which a court of equity would not permit. The defendant admits that he was married to the plaintiff; that they lived and cohabited together as husband and wife; that he supported and maintained her as such; and, in fine, clearly shows that a relation of marriage existed in fact between them.

3rd. The plaintiff claims that she will succeed on the merits; first, because the defense on the new matter ought to be disregarded as badly pleaded, and inadmissible under any form of plea; second, because the marriage of the defendant Mary Ann Angell cannot be proved, and never was a lawful marriage. There was cohabitation, but no marriage according to law. This will appear if the true state of facts if ever reached in trial. And the first alleged marriage must be shown to have been a lawful marriage. In Case vs. Case, 17 Cal. Rep., 598, the law is well stated on this point.

As to the allegation in the answer, that the plaintiff had a lawful living husband living at the time of the alleged union between plaintiff and defendant, it is sufficient to say that she was divorced from James L. Dee by the Probate Court of Utah, and that it was done under the statute, and the Supreme Court of Utah had previously decided that such court had exclusive jurisdiction in divorce matters. While this decision was probably erroneous, it was made by the highest tribunal of the territory, and was not appealable; hence it was the law.

More than this: the act of Congress of June 23, 1874, provided that all judgements of the Probate Courts of Utah which had been executed, or which had not been appealed from, should be held good. So that, upon the facts, there is nothing in the allegation that plaintiff had a husband living at the time of the marriage between plaintiff and defendant.

It is only right to say, that in the opinion of the ablest lawyers of the West, Judge Lowe, in holding that the new matter in an answer is only denied "at the trial," has misconceived the California case which he sites, and mistakes the law. In injunction cases the pleadings are treated as affidavits by express provision of the California statutes; but no case can be found in California or elsewhere, under the code, where a pleading is treated as true in one stage of a case, and false in another. Such a doctrine would be absurd under any system of pleading that has ever existed.

The last legal step that has been taken, so far, was taken by me in making an affidavit for the purpose of proving that the defendant perjured himself, and which will furnish the foundation for his prosecution for the crime. With this affidavit, the case is stayed for the present.

AS soon as I had fully decided that compromise was impossible, I began to consider my future. I felt able to take care of myself and my children, if I could see the way to do it. I was not afraid to work, and I felt a new impulse stirring within me which made me strong. Life was my own, and I would do the best I could.

The thought of a public career had never occurred to me. I had no ambition to gratify, and I had already gained more notoriety than I cared for. I was keenly sensitive to what was said about me, and many of the newspaper paragraphs, 567 MY TALK AT THE WALKER HOUSE.

wittily written, by persons who neither knew me nor understood the situation in which I was placed, wounded me deeply.

The gentile papers in Utah were, without exception, friendly to me, and I am sure kindlier words were never given than they have sent after me, since the very day I came out from under Brigham's control.

During my residence at the Walker House I was requested to give some account of Mormonism to the residents of the hotel and a few of their friends. I consented to do so, and an evening was appointed. I prepared a simple history of my life, and introduced, in the course of it, an epitomized description of the Mormon religion and its rites; and when the evening arrived, and I entered the parlors of the Walker House, I was startled to see the numbers of persons who had assembled to listen to me. I stood for a moment gazing in sudden bewilderment; the blood rushed to my face, and my first impulse was to run away and hide myself in my own room. But the applause which greeted me, the smiling, reassuring faces which were turned towards me, and the sympathy which I read in them all, gave me courage.

My audience listened with the closest attention, and when, after a while, I grew more accustomed to my strange position, and ventured to look up, I saw tears on more than one cheek, and when the last word was read, and I laid my manuscript down, I was surrounded by my newly made friends, all enthusiastic in their demonstrations of sympathy.

Previous to this involuntary public appearance, it had been suggested to me that I should take the lecture platform against Mormonism. I shrank from the very mention of it, and replied to the friends who proposed it that I could not, and would not, do it. To parade myself and my troubles before the world seemed such an indelicate thing to do! But when it was shown me that I might make myself a power against Mormonism which should be felt, and which should open people's eyes to the enormity of the religious system which was tolerated by the government, I hesitated no longer.

I wish it to be distinctly understood that I did not undertake this work with a view to self-aggrandizement, or to gratify an inordinate ambition. Nothing has wounded me more, since I commenced my labors, than the oft-repeated accusation within a few months in the Woman's Journal, the leading organ of woman suffrage in Boston, in an article written by one of its editors and part proprietors, who, in the same article, commended Brigham Young to public favor because he gave the suffrage to women.

"Making capital" out of her woes, and, above all, her domestic infelicities, is something no woman of delicacy could do; and had I been governed by no motive except one so unworthy, I should deserve all the contemptuous criticism which I have been treated to be this apostle of "Fair Play for Women."

Does any one think that, for the sake of emolument, I could thus open my heart to the rude gaze of a curious public, bear all the slurs, slights, jeers, and aspersions that are cast at me by malicious Mormon and thoughtless Gentile papers, be made a by-word of, have my name on every vulgar lip? Never. My womanhood revolts at the idea.

As a means of support, I would never have undertaken it. When I saw it was a duty, I adopted it without hesitation, and I shall never cease my labors as long as I have strength to work. While I have a hand or voice, Mormonism and Polygamy shall find in me a relentless foe. I will never rest, God helping me, until either I, or this hellish system, so fraught with misery, go down in the contest.

When my decision was fully made, I confided it to my father, who was my constant visitor. He gave me the warmest encouragement; but it was a terrible blow to my mother who considered that I was setting the final seal to my future and eternal misery.

569 MY PERILOUS ESCAPE.

I discovered, after my arrangements were made, that my intention had become known to the Mormons, who were threatening me with all sorts of vengeance if I insisted on carrying out my plans. It had been arranged that I should make my first appearance in Denver, and as I was extensively advertised there, the news of my proposed lecture had been telegraphed to Salt Lake, so that the date of my departure was made public.

I did not dare to leave Salt Lake by rail, nor would my friends allow it, and all our final arrangements were forced to be made with the greatest secrecy. I did not venture even to take my own trunk. A new one was bought, carried to a friend's room, my clothing conveyed to the same room, a piece or two at a time, packed as we could find opportunity, and then taken to a carriage, and carried outside the city.

On the evening of the 27th of November, I went with my father, and one or two friends, to the house of Mr. and Mrs. Stratton. We left the hotel by the back door, for the front entrance was closely watched, although it was not expected that I would attempt to leave the city until the next morning. About eleven o'clock we left the Stratton's, and started, ostensible to walk home. A carriage was in waiting at the corner. We got in, called for Mrs. Cooke, who was to be my travelling companion, and were driven rapidly out of the city. I was to take the cars on the Union Pacific road of Uintah, and thus avoid travelling at all on the Utah railroad, where I should be sure to be recognized.

The night was intensely dark; we could not see our hands before our faces, and, as we plunged on through the night and the darkness, we were a gloomy and apprehensive party. We were not sure how closely we had been watched, or whether we had succeeded in eluding Mormon vigilance. Even then "Danites," those terrible ministers of Mormon vengeance, might be upon our track, and I could not cast off the feeling that every moment brought us nearer and nearer to some dreadful death.

570 A MIDNIGHT RIDE.

Twice during the night we were lost. The last time, we missed our way, and went several miles up a cañon, and I felt sure that we were betrayed, and that our driver was carrying us to certain destruction. I spoke to him, without letting him know my suspicions, and told him we were going wrong. He turned about, and drove rapidly back, and we reached the mouth of the cañon just as the day dawned. Confusion vanished with the darkness, our driver found the right road, and by fast driving we reached Uintah just as the train came up. Tickets and checks had been secured at Ogden, and with a hurried "goodbye" to my father, I jumped on board the train, with Mrs. Cooke, and we were off.

I can never describe my sensations when the train began to move. With the new sense of freedom came a feeling of such utter loneliness that, for a moment, I was bewildered by the situation, and, turning to Mrs. Cooke, I said, helplessly, "What shall I do?"

"Keep a brave heart, and think of the work before you." Said she.

Her experience in Mormonism had been no pleasanter than mine, and she was as glad to get away from it as I was. For twenty years she had taught Brigham's children, and acted in Mormon theater, and had never received a cent of remuneration. Her husband, a member of the special police force, was killed on duty, and after his death the prophet, through his counselor, Daniel H. Wells, swindled her out of the two thousand dollars which the city had granted her, and tried to get her house from her. She put the matter into a Gentile lawyer's hands and still retains her home. She was with me several months, a devoted and faithful companion.

Our first stopping-place was Laramie, Wyoming Territory, where we were to await the arrival of my agent from Salt Lake. My presence in town was soon discovered, and I received many friendly and congratulatory calls. After my lecture every hospitality was shown me, and I felt fresh courage, so kindly was my reception, and so genuine were all the expressions of interest.

My agent arrived in a day or two, and we set out for Denver. The news of my escape from Utah had been telegraphed, and on my arrival, I found myself eagerly expected. I was visited by the editors of the different papers, who assured me of the friendly feeling toward me, and offered me the use of their columns. The clergymen all came to see me, and spoke generous words in my behalf from every pulpit in the city. They all literally "took me on trust." I shall never forget the earnest, spontaneous kindness which I met from the professional men of Denver.

The night on which I was to give my first lecture, the 5th of December, 1873, was extremely cold, and the snow fell heavily. I was discouraged and despondent, for I had come to consider this first evening as prophetic of my future career, and I saw failure before me. I did not know whether I should be able to reach the church, the storm was so furious; but as a faithful few had promised to be in attendance, let what might happen, I determined to make the trial.

My foreboding had been utterly useless. Long before the church doors were opened a large crowd was in waiting, and before the hour for beginning the lecture arrived the house was full, and hundreds had gone away unable to gain admission. As I looked into the crowded house, before I came on the platform, my courage almost left me. But while hesitating, the thought of the poor women whose cause I was to plead, came vividly into my mind, and with a firm step, and beating heart, I walked onto the platform, and stood facing my first audience, who greeted me with tumultuous applause.

I have never spoken more effectively in my life than I did that night. It seemed to myself almost as though I was inspired. I forgot myself in my subject, and new indignation thrilled me as I told my story of bondage, such as my hearers never dreamed of, and unveiled the horrors of the Mormon religion. I made no attempts at oratorical effects, I worked up no dramatic "points." Naturally and simply as I could, I said what I had to say, without a single rhetorical flourish.

573 BRIGHAM HEARD FROM.

The lecture was a success. After it was over, my audience crowded around me, with such earnest words of commendation, that I felt my first victory won. Since that memorable evening I have addressed hundreds of audiences, but never have I found one more sympathetic than the one composed of the true-hearted people of Denver.

I was not permitted to be quiet after that evening. Engagements came pouring in, and I worked my way steadily eastward. I was universally well received, but I knew that I should somewhere encounter Mormon opposition. I had seen too many attempts made by Brigham Young to ruin anyone who dared to differ with him, to think that I should escape.

The first blow came through the columns of a Chicago Paper, which devoted considerable space one day to a scandalous article concerning me, giving an air of truth to the statement by mentioning the persons who were authority for the reports. I was overwhelmed by it, for I feared it would put an end to the career of usefulness which I had marked out for myself. After I read the shameful article, my first words were, "Brigham Young's money is at the bottom of this."

And so it proved. The matter was put into the hands of Leonard Swett, Esq., of Chicago, for investigation. Letters came, in most cases unsolicited, from the persons referred to as having started the scandal, each one indignantly denying the whole. Further inquiry revealed that George C. Bates, a Mormon lawyer, of low repute, and twenty thousand dollars, induced the Paper to publish the article which originated in the foul imagination of Bates.

The papers of good standing came at once to my defense, and endeavored in every possible way to heal the wounds which the article had so cruelly inflicted on me.

The scandal was published on the eve of my first appearance in Boston, and I was greatly distressed lest it should injure my prospects in that city. I wanted my visit there to be a success, as I felt that, if I made a favorable impression, I should hold the key to all New England. And it was to the stanch and loyal New Englanders that I looked for assistance in my labors. My new and good friends had taught me to consider Reform and New England synonymous terms, and I really believed my battle would be well begun if I could gain such devoted allies as her brave, inflexible sons and daughters. But after the attack by the Chicago Paper, I regarded failure as certain. How surprised and gratified I was to find, instead of prejudice I had expected to meet, a feeling of earnest kindness toward my self personally, and of unfeigned interest in my work.

All the papers sent representatives to visit me, and I found them kind and intelligent gentlemen, and the papers which they represented were as generous as they. Nowhere have I met that courtesy and chivalric consideration which have been uniformly accorded me by the members of the Boston press. They have refrained from sarcasm and indelicate witticisms; they have been ready with sympathy, and quick to encourage; and whatever their politics or principles, they have been unanimous in their generous treatment of me.

My first lecture was given in Tremont Temple, before a large and enthusiastic audience. Mr. James Redpath introduced me and the short speech he made fairly inspired me, it was so kind, so reassuring, so generous, and above all, so just. He had never heard me speak, but he was so bitter an enemy to this horrible system, as indeed he is to every wrong, that he was willing to take me for me work's sake. After the lecture was over, I felt that my hopes were realized, and that New England was open to me.

In Washington, nearly all the government officials attended my lecture, and expressed themselves enthusiastically in my favor. George Q. Cannon was contesting his seat in Congress, and Mormonism and its rulers were at that juncture ture prominently before the public. Cannon resented my appearance at the capital, and tried to break me down by ridicule. He made friends with the Washington Chronicle, in Brigham's most approved style of winning allegiance, and the day after my first lecture a burlesque report of it appeared in that paper. It was intended to prejudice the public; but when the lecture was over, and all the papers were unanimous in their commendation, the Chronicle suddenly grew ashamed of its disreputable alliance, and refused to maintain it any longer, and, at the same time, grew more respectful toward me.

I have had hundreds of pleasant platform experiences since I commenced my crusade against polygamy; but the three which stand out the most vividly in my memory, are the first evenings at Denver, Boston, and Washington.

All this time I was learning to love my Gentile friends very dearly, and to feel at home in "Babylon." I was comparatively happy, but I was not at rest. There was something lacking in my life—a void which nothing seemed to fill. Ever since I had found myself the dupe of a false religion, I had drifted blindly on, with no belief in anything, no faith in any system; sometimes, even, doubting the existence of God.

I was in this bitter mood when I spoke, one day, before the Methodist clergymen of Boston and vicinity. Among the persons to whom I was introduced on this occasion, was the Rev. Dr. Daniel Steele, of Auburndale. I had noticed him during my address, and felt quite strongly toward him, on account of the extreme interest which he evinced. One of his first questions was whether I had found any religion to take the place of the superstition I had cast off.

A hopeless "No," was my reply.

Then, for the first time in my life, I heard the principles of the religion of Christ. It was like a day-dawn after a night of the blackest darkness, and I cried out eagerly—

576 MORMON INFLUENCE IN WASHINGTON.

"This is what I want—this religion of love."

A few weeks after this I was the guest of the Methodist Female College, at Delaware, Ohio, of which Rev. Dr. M'Cabe was president. I was recovering from a severe illness, and was very much depressed. My mother was constantly writing to me, telling me of the struggles through which she was passing in giving up her religion; for Brigham's treatment of me, his utter disregard of the truth, and his malicious attempts to ruin me, opened her eyes, and unbound her reason; and she soon saw the falsity of the whole Mormon plan of salvation. I knew every pang which she was suffering, for I have passed through it all myself. Yet I was powerless to comfort her, for I was not at peace.

Dr. M'Cabe was my frequent visitor, and patiently and kindly he pointed out the way of rest to me, until at last I willingly placed myself and my troubles in the living, outstretched arms of God. Life opened out to me fuller than ever of possibilities, and my work grew holier. Peace brooded over my tired heart, and in the new experience I found infinite rest. Tossed all my life on a stormy sea of superstition, I was at last anchored in the sheltered haven of Christian belief.

CHURCH GOVERNMENT. — MORMON APOSTLES. — THE ORDER OF ENOCH.

Mormon Administration.—The Earthly Trinity—Filling Vacancies—Mormon Apostles.—Polygamy made Profitable —The Seventy.—Two-Dollar Blessings.—Astounding Promises.—Bishops and Spies.—The Order of Enoch.—All things in Common.—An Apostolic Row—How Enoch Works—A Stupid Telegram.—Logic Extraordinary.—A Gigantic Swindle.—Zion's Co-operative Mercantile Institution.—Brigham's Revelations.—The Saints Laugh in their Sleeves.—“It Pays to be a Mormon.”—Beginning to see Through It.—The Apostate President.

ALTHOUGH the power wielded by Brigham Young is absolute, he is ostensibly assisted in the administration of church affairs by a large number of officers, whose real business it is to see that the President's plans are carried out, and his commands obeyed. He is the motive power, and they are mere tools in his hands, to be employed as he see fit.

The “First Presidency,” which controls the whole church, is supposed to be the earthly representative of the Trinity, “the Eternal Godhead, Three in One,” and consists of the President and the First and Second Counselors, who are the types on earth of “the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost,” in heaven. It is needless to say which rank Brigham assigns to himself.

578 THE FIRST AND SECOND COUNSELORS.

His first counselor, George A. Smith, has recently died, and it is yet undecided who shall fill his place. It the plan was followed which raised Brigham to his present position, the second counselor would have it by right of seniority; but the general impression is that “Young Briggs” will be jumped into the position, and the Saints will be obliged to receive him as certain “successor,” whether they wish it or not. They will have less difficulty in becoming reconciled to the inevitable, since he has been for so long a time persistently thrust upon the people as the “probable successor,” that they have grown used to hearing his claims discussed.

The second counselor is Daniel H. Wells, who is notoriously one of the most cruel, bigoted, and tyrannical men in Utah. He, like Smith and Brigham, has the title of “Prophet, Seer, and Revelator.”

The Prophet Wells served for years as general, or commander-in-chief, of the Mormon army; and has ever been Brigham's right hand man in iniquity, fearlessly disposing of life and property in the name of the Lord, counseling his superior to deeds of blood without number, and then treating with the most consummate cruelty the very men who have assisted him in the carrying out of his atrocious plans. He is Mayor of Salt Lake City, and stands high among the dignitaries of the church, but he rules with an iron hand, and cruelty and oppression predominate in all he does.

The “apostles” rank in church affairs next the First Presidency. There are twelve of them, and Orson Hyde is their worthy President. This apostle is a practical polygamist, as are all the rest, but he has a convenient way of utilizing the system. He marries a cook, a laundress, a seamstress, a dairy-maid, or any servant he may happen to need. It is so much cheaper to marry domestics than to hire them. Under the latter arrangement he would be compelled to pay them for their services, while by the former he is only obligated to give them shelter, food, and clothing. His wives represent nearly every nationality, and when visitors come to the house, the first Mrs. Hyde introduces her husband's other wives, as “Mr. Hyde's German wife, Mr. Hyde's English wife, Mr. Hyde's Danish wife,” and so on until all are presented.

He apostatized in 1833, and made some remarkable revelations concerning Smith's polygamous practices, but he soon found his way back into the church, and has been one of the most staunch allies of the Prophet. He is supposed to have been connected with some of the most atrocious murders which have been committed in Utah. William Hickman implicated him most seriously in his confessions.

Next to him Orson Pratt, who has six wives and several children, and is by far the most able man in the church.

The other apostles are John Taylor, the happy husband of six wives; Willard Woodruff, whose kingdom numbers but four; Charles C. Rich, who has an indefinite number of wives and fifty children; Lorenzo Snow; Erastus Snow, whose kingdom is the size of Woodruff's; Franklin D. Richards, who has five wives of his own, and in addition has five "proxies," who before becoming his wives, held the less responsible positions of aunts-in-law. On his uncle's death, Richards assumed the earthly care of them to be members of his own family; George Q. Cannon, the Mormon politician, who repudiates polygamy in Washington, but is one of its most ardent supporters, both theoretically and practically, at home, having four wives and thirteen children; Brigham Young, Jr., whose family has already been described; Joseph F. Smith, who has three wives; and Albert Carrington, who holds the office of Church Historian.

The apostles have a general supervision of the Territory. They also go on missions, edit magazines, or take charge of the newly selected "stakes."

The working body of male Mormons is divided into seventy quorums, each having seventy members. Each quorum has a president, and these constitute the "Seventy." These presidents also have a president, who ranks next to the apostles. This body, the Quorum of Seventies, might with propriety be called the Mormon Missionary Board, as they attend to all matters connected with the propagation of the faith. The present president is Joseph Young, brother to Brigham.

In the year 1834, while the Saints were in Kirtland, Brigham's father expressed a desire to bless his children before he died, as did the patriarchs of old. On mentioning the subject to Joseph Smith, he, as usual, had a revelation that the Lord wished every father to bless his children, and that there should be Patriarchs set apart to bless those who had no father in the church. The first Patriarch was "Old Father Smith," Joseph's father, and his business was to bless all the fatherless who applied to him for blessing. At that time blessings were free for all who sought them; but when the first Patriarch died, and was succeeded by his son Hyrum, the business became so engrossing that it was thought best to charge one dollar for every person blessed. Hyrum was succeeded by "Uncle John Smith," his cousin, and he by William Smith, son of Hyrum. The only necessary qualification for this office is to be a Smith, and in some way a relative or descendant of the Prophet.

These "blessings" are rather wonderful affairs; they promise all sorts of things, in a vague, indefinite way, if only the recipient proves "faithful." Some are assured "they shall never taste death, but live until Christ comes, and be caught up to meet Him in the air;" others are assured that they are to have the privilege of redeeming their dead so far back, that there shall not be a broken link in the chain. Absurd as all this seems, there are hundreds of Saints who believe the "every word shall be fulfilled," as they are sometimes promised unconditionally, and the office of Patriarch is quite a profitable one, now that the price of blessings has been advanced to two dollars.

The bishops act at once as ecclesiasts, directors of municipal affairs, and judges of probate. Salt Lake City has twenty-one wards, each of which has a bishop over it. The entire Territory is also divided into wards, each with its governing bishop. Their duty is to settle disputes in the church, and to act as general spies and reporters, alike over Mormons and Gentiles.

In the last duty they are assisted by the Ward Teachers, whose duty it is to visit all the people in their ward, report all suspected persons, catechize every one, and discover all heresies, false doctrines, and schisms among the people, who are obliged to answer every question which is asked them, reserving nothing. Through these spies and informers, and their superiors the bishops, Brigham knows all the most private affairs connected with every individual, and this knowledge serves to render more binding his hold on this people.

Although the Ward Teachers are subordinate to the bishops, indeed, are the agents by which the latter do their work, they do not rank next to them. This position is held by the High Counsel. This body constitutes a sort of court of appeals, when the bishops do not give satisfactions to litigants. Appeal may be made from the High Counsel to the First Presidency.

In the early days of the church, the duty was strongly enjoined of consecration all the possessions to the Lord; and this was not to be a figurative, but a real consecration; in which all the possessions were to be catalogued and consecrated in legal form, and the transaction authenticated by witnesses. The custodial of this property was to be a "Trustee in Trust," the community into which the faithful Saint thus entered was to be called "The United Order of Enoch," and the property was to be held for the benefit of this community.

The Saints did not take kindly to the Order, and it existed in theory merely. Within a year or two Brigham has been making the most arduous efforts to bring his followers into this community, meeting, however, with very little better success than its founders. When he first proposed its re-establishment, it was decidedly opposed in the Tabernacle, by the apostles Orson Pratt, John Taylor, and George Q. Cannon, and a regular quarrel took place; the Prophet and his dissenting followers parting, each with a firm determination not to yield to the other side. The next week the four went north on a preaching tour, and labored harmoniously together in the attempt to build up the Order.

583 A SAINTLY QUARREL.

Whoever joins this community gives all his earthly possessions into the keeping of Brigham Young. His children, too, are required to sign away all claim or title to the property; if any are too young to write, the pen is given them, and their hands guided by their elders, and they are thus deprived of their rightful patrimony; and in return for all this, the family is to be furnished with what food and clothing the officers think they require.

As Brigham and his co-workers journeyed northward, he telegraphed to the bishops of the various settlements through which he would pass, informing them what time he would visit them, and requesting them to call special meetings of the residents of their wards before his arrival, and read to them the following telegram: "I am coming north, organizing branches of the Order of Enoch; how many of you are willing to join the Order without knowing anything about it?"

In the little town of Fillmore seventy-five men responded to the call for a meeting, and, strange as it may seem fifty of those men voted to join the "Order." They fully understood that all on becoming members were required to deed their property to the "Trustee in Trust," otherwise, "Brigham Young, his heirs, executors, and assigns," yet they decided, with full knowledge of this, to make a blind investment of all their "worldly gear," and upon the arrival of the religious Autocrat, one half of the remaining twenty-five accepted the situation, and signed their names to an agreement binding themselves to obey "Enoch's" requirements. The following were the unanswerable arguments which Brigham used to secure their conversion: "I want you to understand that the car (meaning Enoch) is rolling on. The set time of the Lord has come, and no man can stay its progress. If you do not want to be run over, jump on, or get out of the way. I do not want a part of your property, I want it all. If there are any of you who cannot abide the requirements of the Lord, I do not want you to come near me, or to speak to me. I feel as far above you as the heavens are above the earth."

Those who became members of this branch of Enoch worked well, determined to make it a success. All labored together for the interest of the Order, and were credited a certain sum, I think fifteen cents an hour. They were economical, hoping to make the books show a balance in their favor, after deducting expenses of sustaining their families. But there were many sinecures, and so much mismanagement, that after the lapse of one single summer an investigation of affairs became necessary, and the fact became known that their divinely directed labors had not paid the running expenses of the institution. Many who had expected that the records would exhibit a balance in their favor, awoke to the disagreeable fact that they, as copartners in the United Order, the grand scheme that was to reconcile "the irrepressible conflict between capital and labor," must discount the sum stipulated as payment for their services. And they are at present in debt for the commonest necessities of life consumed during their short-lived experiment.

A similar condition of affairs exists wherever this gigantic swindle has been in operation. And while Brigham has been gloating over his ill-gotten gains, he has bound these poor victims more firmly to himself by the terrible bondage of debt. The wildest dissatisfaction exists, and in nearly every county the Order may be regarded as dead, and beyond even the power of Brigham Young to restore.

585 MORMON TITHING.

When Joseph saw that the people did not take kindly to his community plan, he found it necessary to adopt some other means of raising a permanent fund for the church, and Orson Pratt proposed that every member should every year be obliged to pay one tenth of his income, out of which the church should be supported. This plan met with the approval of the officers, and it has been continued ever since.

Every town has its tithing-house, which is in charge of the local bishop. He takes charge of all the goods that are brought in, usually paying himself a handsome commission, and sees, when any quantity has been gathered, that it is transported to the large tithing-house in Salt Lake City.

This tithing-house is under the direct control of Brigham Young, and he, his counselors and clerks, have the first choice of all the goods that are brought in; the remaining stores are dealt out as payment to the poor men who are employed by Brigham as laborers. I have seen the tithing-store besieged by a crowd of tired, care-worn women, wives of these men, waiting for their turn to be served. Sometimes a poor woman will stand all day waiting for a sack of flour, a basket of potatoes, or a quart of molasses. Let the day be ever so cold or stormy, there she must wait, until the clerks see fit to attend to her wants.

Everything is received here in payment for tithing: hay, grain, vegetables, butter, cheese, wool, or any other product. If a man has not money, he must give one tenth of what he has. It matters little whether he can afford it; the church demands it, and "the church" gets it.

The nearest approach to the practical realization of the Order of Enoch was what is called Zion's Co-operative Mercantile Institution. This was a great commercial corporation, engaged in buying and selling the produce of the people, and supplying them with every kind of merchandise needed in a new country. The stock was held by the people of the Territory, and branches of the parent concern were scattered throughout all the leading settlements; so that all the commercial exchanges of the country might be made through this establishment. It was designed to destroy the business of Gentile merchants in Zion, and accordingly all were commanded to patronize it; but the completion of the Pacific Railroad, and the influx of Gentiles, came to the relief of the proscribed merchants; their goods, too, were of a better class, and there was a greater opportunity for selection, so that Mormon and Gentiles alike patronized them; and at the present time, while the Co-operative institution seems tottering to its fall, in spite of the frantic attempts of Brigham and his assistants to prop it up and make it secure, the Gentile houses are rapidly gaining in wealth and credit.

Most of Brigham's "revelations" have met with about the same degree of success in their attempted carrying out. His project of making silk, and another equally wild scheme of producing sugar from beet-roots, were gigantic failures, although he will not acknowledge it. Two more of his "inspirations” are kept in the minds of the Saints, by being so constantly before their eyes. The unfinished mud wall, which was to protect the city from invasion, and the divinely projected canal, which was to bring the stone for the new Temple from the quarries to Salt Lake City, and which Brigham announced that he had seen just as distinctly in a “vision” as he “ever should with his natural eyes.” A large amount of money, and a great deal of hard labor was expended on these enterprises; all of which his a total loss.

Brigham is shrewd enough to see the “revelation” is not one of his strong points, and he rarely attempts it; less frequently now than formerly, even. The catch-words, “Thus saith the Lord,” are not nearly so potent as they were before the Saints came so much in contact with the Gentile world, and unconsciously lost some of their superstition. They do not openly laugh at Brigham’s prophecies, but a few of the more honest and far-seeing venture to criticize him very quietly, although they submit to his rule, and are seemingly good Saints as ever. They are not ready to apostatize; their interests and associations bind them to the church, and they do not wish to leave it. Some cling to it, like George Q. Cannon, through ambition; for that young apostle dares to cast his eyes toward Brigham’s position, and has expressed the belief that he might ultimately succeed him. Others, like Orson Pratt, are so closely identified with it, that they cannot and would not cut themselves adrift from it. The church is their life, and they will only leave one when they are compelled to give up the other. Another class, to which Brigham’s sons notably belong, stay because their pecuniary interests demand it. It “pays” to be a Mormon. But when once the present ruler is taken, they will have nothing to hold them, and they will do openly what they have long since done in their hearts—repudiate Mormonism, and all its superstitions and practices. And I am morally certain that the first one to take advantage of his newly-obtained liberty will be John W. Young, who even now known as “the Prophet’s Apostate Son,” and who yet, in spite of his apostasy, holds the position of “President of the Salt Lake State of Zion,” with the rank of bishop.

CHAPTER XL.

THE CONDITION OF MORMON WOMEN—HIGH AND LOW LIFE IN POLYGAMY.

Increasing Light—The Equality of the Sexes—Exaggeration Impossible—Likely Saviors—The Present Condition of Mormon Women—The Prospects for the Future—Polygamy Bad for Rich and Poor—A Happy Family—The Happiness Marred—Sealed for Time Only—Building on Another Man's Foundation—The New Wife—How the Old One Fared—The Husband's Death a Relief—Asa Calkin's English Mission—What Came of It—How to Get Rich—Two Sermons from One Text—Dividing the Spoil—No Woman Happy in Polygamy.

ALL this while I was gaining knowledge of the domestic customs and relation of the "Gentiles." At nearly every place I visited I was entertained in some private family, and my eyes were constantly being opened to the enormities of the wicked system from which I had escaped.

I had felt its misery; I had known the abject wretchedness of the condition to which it reduced women, but I did not fully realize the extent of its depravity, the depths of the woes in which it plunged

women, until I saw the contrasted lives of monogamic wives.

I had seen women neglected, or, worse than that, cruelly wronged, every attribute of womanhood outraged and insulted. I now saw other women, holding the same relation, cared for tenderly, cherished, protected, loved, and honored. I had been taught to believe that my sex was inferior to the other; that the curse pronounced upon the race in the Garden of Eden was woman's curse alone, and that it was to man that she must look for salvation. No road lay open for her to the throne of grace; no gate of eternal life swinging wide to the knockings of her weary hands; no loving Father listened to the wails of sorrow and supplication wrung by a worse than death-agony from her broken heart. Heaven was inaccessible to her, except as she might win it through some man's will. I found, to my surprise, that woman was made the companion and not the subject of man. She was the sharer alike of his joys and his sorrows. Morally, she was a free agent. Her husband's God was her God as well, as she could seek Him for herself, asking no mortal intercession. Motherhood took on a new sacredness, and the fatherly care and tenderness, brooding over a family, strengthening and defending it, seemed sadly sweet to me, used as I was to see children ignored by their fathers.

Seeing this, I began to comprehend a little why it was so difficult to make the state of affairs in Utah understood. The contrast was so very great that, unless it was seen, it could not be realized, even ever so faintly. I feel sometimes, both in speaking to audiences, and in private conversations, the thrill of shocked surprise which runs through my listeners' veins as I relate some fearful wrong, which has been suffered either by myself or some person known to me; but even then I know the enormity of the system which permits such things to be possible is but vaguely understood.

591 MEN THE MORMON SAVIORS.

I am accused sometimes of exaggeration. In reply to that accusation I would say, that is simply impossible, I could not exaggerate, since language is inadequate to even half unveil the horrors. There are events of daily occurrence which decency and womanly modesty forbid my even hinting at. No one can, even if they would, quite tear the covering away from the foul, loathsome, object, called "Celestial Marriage," reeking as it is with filth and moral poison; rotten to the very core; a leprous spot on the body politic; a defilement to our fair fame as a nation. I am compelled to silence on points that would make what I have already said seem tame in comparison. Not a word of all my story is exaggerated or embellished. The difficulty has been rather to suppress and tone down.

Women are the greatest sufferers. The moral natures of the men must necessarily suffer also; but to them comes no such agony of soul as comes to women. Their sensibilities are blunted; their spiritual natures deadened; their animal natures quickened; they lose manliness, and descend to the level of brutes; and these dull-witted, intellectually-dwarfed moral corpses, the women are told, are

What wonder that they, too, become dull and apathetic? Who wonders at the immovable mouths, expressionless eyes, and gray, hopeless faces, which tourists mark always as the characteristics of the Mormon women? What does life offer to make them otherwise than dull and hopeless? Or what even does eternity promise? A continuation merely of the sufferings which have already crushed the womanhood out of them. A cheering prospect, is it not? Yet it is what every poor Mormon woman has to look forward to. Just that, and nothing more.

Rich or poor alike suffer. Polygamy bears no more lightly on the one than the other. If they are poor, they have to work for themselves and their children, suffer every deprivation, submit to every indignity. If they are in more affluent circumstances, they have more time for brooding over their sorrows, more leisure time for the exercise of the natural jealousy which they cannot help feeling for the other wives. Happiness and contentment are utterly unknown to Mormon women; they are impossible conditions, either to dwellers in poverty or plenty.

A few years ago, a man and wife of the name of Painter, decided to cast in their lot with the Saints, and enroll themselves among the Lord's chosen people. The woman had been previously married, and her husband had died shortly after his conversion to the Mormon faith. The elders urged her marrying again, and, after a time, she found her heart adding its persuasions to the "counsel" of the brethren, and she married William Painter, an honest, kind-hearted fellow, who made her a good husband, and with whom she lived very happily.

As soon as possible they came to America, but that was not until their family had been increased by two or three children, who were alike the objects of the mother's care and the father's pride. Although they were poor, hard-working people, I have never known a happier family than this when they first came to Utah.

Like all new arrivals they were anxious to receive their Endowments, and it was shortly arranged for them to go through the rites. When they presented themselves at the Endowment House, Herber C. Kimball told the wife that she could only be sealed to her present husband for time. She must belong to her first husband in eternity, he having died in the faith. She was not at liberty to deprive him of his privileges, or to rob him of his kingdom.

The poor woman felt very badly for this man was the father of her children, and she felt that her claim on him should be the strongest; but the authorities refused to see the matter as she did, and insisted that the sealing should be only for time. There was no help for it, and the poor woman was obliged to submit. Neither was the husband

satisfied. It did not suit him to "build a kingdom on another man's foundation;" he must commence one for himself; and, in obedience to counsel, he looked about diligently for a wife "all his own." He was not long in finding one, and, greatly to his wife's distress, he brought home an ignorant young girl, who turned the house topsy-turvy in her endeavors to exercise the authority which she arrogated to herself. The first wife considered that she had some rights still remaining, and that, certainly, she might dictate somewhat concerning household affairs, as she had been so long the ruling power, and understood the manner of regulating and running the domestic machinery; but the new-comer claimed entire supremacy, declaring that she was "the only wife William had," her rival belonging to another man.

Strange as it may seem, the husband took sides instantly with the new-comer against the woman who had been a faithful wife for years, and was the mother of his children. She ruled the household affairs, the first wife, and even the husband and all were compelled to submit to her decision. She heaped every indignity upon the poor wife, even resorting to personal violence, and the victim could obtain neither sympathy or redress. She was compelled to live under the same roof with her rival, as her husband's means would not admit of two establishments, and for several years she endured her the misery silently. We all knew her to be very unhappy, and we pitied her extremely. She was our near neighbor, and the nearest approach to confidences which she ever made was given to my mother. But we did not know for a long time how very much she had to bear.

One cold day, in the midst of a dreary storm, the poor woman came rushing into our house, with her babe in her arms, crying bitterly. She sank into a chair, which my mother places for her near the fire; and in answer to the anxious inquiries, she sobbed out, "O, sister Webb, I have left my home and my husband. I have been compelled to do it. I can endure no more. If you knew all, I am sure you would not blame me!"

Mother inquired what it was that had occasioned this new rupture, and brought her to this final decision.

The poor, distressed creature replied, that her husband had taken Emma, the second wife, and gone on a visit of several days to some relatives, leaving her and the children utterly unprovided either with food or fire, and they were nearly perishing with cold and hunger. She had sent the other children to another neighbor's to get warm, and she and the younger ones had taken refuge with us.

In two or three days, the husband returned, and finding where his wife was, compelled her to come back to him, by threats of taking the children from her unless she did. After a few years he died, and what little property there was the young wife claimed. The first wife appealed to the church authorities, but they upheld the last wife's claims, and she was driven penniless away with her children. She had to support herself and them; but she used frankly to say, that she was happier than she had been for a years, and that her husband's death was a positive relief to her. I knew this woman well, and I knew that no more worthy woman lived than she. Polygamy blighted her life, and made a miserable dependent of one who would have been, in other circumstances, a happy wife.

About fifteen years since, a man by the name of Asa Calkins was sent by Brigham Young to preside over the Saints in the British Isles. He left two wives in Salt Lake, but on his arrival in England, he met with a young lady who completely fascinated him, and having obtained the permission of his Prophet to marry while on the mission, began paying her the most devoted attention.

He met with no difficulty in his wooing, and no obstacle was placed in the way of his speedy marriage. After the marriage, he informed his wives in Utah of the event, and they received the news with resignation, as they expected nothing different. But he was not so frank with the new wife. Brigham had told him, when he gave him permission to marry, to say nothing about his other wives, so the English lady supposed herself to be the only Mrs.

Calkins. About two years after the marriage, the first went to some of the Eastern states on a visit to some relatives. While there her health became impaired, and on being advised that a sea-voyage would benefit her, wrote at once to her husband in Liverpool, asking permission to join him in England.

He said, in reply, that she might come, if she was willing to pass as his sister, as he had all the wife there that the English law would allow. As she felt obliged to take the voyage on account of her failing health, she agreed to do as he desired.

On her arrival at Liverpool, she found her husband so infatuated with his new wife that he scarcely noticed her at all, and she almost regretted having crossed the sea; yet she saw no way of escape from the trial, as he was to remain there until her husband's mission was ended, which would not be for two years at least.

Mr. Calkins almost entirely ignored the existence of his first wife, and, taking Agnes, traveled all over Europe, introducing her everywhere as Mrs. Calkins, while the poor "sister" remained in Liverpool. He lavished every luxury of dress and ornament upon his idol, while the poor, neglected wife was supplied with the merest necessities of life.

In course of time, they all returned to Zion; but Agnes still remained the favorite wife. Calkins had always been one of the most prosperous Saints, but he returned from his mission a rich man. About the time of his return we heard we often heard rumors concerning his manner of obtaining this wealth, which were not altogether creditable to him, and, consequently, no one was surprised to hear brother Brigham apply the lash to the delinquent missionary the Sabbath after his arrival at Salt Lake, for what he was pleased to term a species of highway robbery. The Saints universally believed that the man merited the rebuke. But the surprise came the Sabbath following. Brigham changed his tactics, and put in a warm plea in the missionary's defense. He said that he had not distinctly understood all about Brother Calkins's course in England until some time during the previous week, when he had visited him, and explained matters to his entire satisfaction. He omitted to state that "Brother Calkins" not only visited him, but divided the spoils with him, his own share amounting to several thousand dollars.

Mr. Calkins was restored to favor. The English Mrs. Calkins was recognized as the chosen wife, and the other two were merely tolerated, and were obliged to see their husband's devotion and wealth lavished on her, while they starved for love and lacked for comforts.

These two cases show the workings of the polygamic system in the families of the rich and the poor. It is as hateful in the one case as in the other, and equally productive of misery in both.

I have yet to learn of one woman who is happy in it. Like Zina Young, they say, "The system must be right, I suppose; we are taught that it is. But if that is the case, we must live it wrongly; there is fault somewhere."

There is worse than that. There is positive sin; and in her heart of hearts, no woman of them all believes it to be right, although she may try, with all the sophistry at her command, to convince herself that it is. Her heart and her reason both give her arguments the lie, and she cannot help but heed them, even when she counts herself a sinner for so doing.

IN August, 1874, I returned to Salt Lake City; but not in the secret way in which I left it months before. I was met with every expression of good will, and congratulations and welcomes poured in on every side. A reception was held for me at the Walker House, and I had the opportunity of greeting again the friends who had so nobly assisted me in my struggles for freedom. Foremost of all, Judge McKean, the truest, most upright, and inflexible chief justice who had ever presided over the Utah

who could neither be bribed nor cajoled; who did right for the right's sake, and who consequently had gained the enmity of Brigham Young and his followers, but who was implicitly trusted by all lovers of justice; General Maxwell, too, who was so kindly acting for me in my suit; Colonel Wickizer, who lent his room for my trunk to be taken to, and otherwise assisted me in my flight from Utah; and Mr.

and Mrs. Stratton, the dearly beloved friends who had first shown me the possibilities of an escape from bondage and a life outside.

MY RECEPTION AT SALT LAKE CITY.

This welcome, hearty and spontaneous, touched me deeply, and I felt then that however much my interests might be drawn away from Salt Lake City, and my work lead me away from there personally, yet it was my home, its people were my people, and my heart would always turn lovingly toward it to the day of my death.

600 LECTURING IN THE TERRITORY.

And why should I not love it? I had grown with it, and there is not a building in it that I have not watched as it arose, not an improvement that I have not rejoiced in. I have seen a lovely city spring up in an alkali desert as if by magic. True, I have suffered there. Many of its associations are bitter. But that is the city as it has been—the Salt Lake of the past, not the Salt Lake of the future, as I hope its future will be.

During the summer, I lectured six times in the city, and several times in other towns in the Territory. Brigham did not attend any of my lectures, but he sent his daughters and daughters-in-law, and bade them sit on the front seats, and make faces at me. They filed the two rows nearest the platform, and, as I saw them there, my heart went out in pity toward them. I knew all of them; many of them had been my dear friends from girlhood, and I had known how unhappy they had been under the cruel system which I was fighting against. I had been in the confidence of several, and more than one had commiserated me upon my unhappy situation while I was their father's wife. Instead of annoying me, and causing me to falter and break down completely, and the prophet hoped, it only lent new strength to my purpose, new fire to my words. I knew that these women sympathized with me in every word I uttered, and that in their hearts they earnestly wished me success.

My father and mother were in my audience, too. It had required a great deal of persuasion to induce the latter to be present, but she finally yielded to us all, and went. Long before this she had lost her faith in Mormonism, and was ranked among the apostates. Brigham's attempts to ruin me had opened her eyes, and she at last saw him as he really was. I think no one rejoiced in my success more than she did, and certainly no one else has had power to imbue me with such fresh courage and strength. And now that she has abandoned Mormonism, when I think of her, away from all the old association, united in her old age to the friends of her childhood, happy in a home safe from the intrusion of polygamy, every shade of bigotry blotted out, her reason unfettered, her will free, I am happier than I ever can say; and if this result only were reached in the cases of the other women of the Territory, I should feel that my suffering and my labors had not been in vain.

Next to these lectures in Salt Lake, my most successful appearance was made at Provo, where I spoke under the auspices of the Rev. C. P. Lyford, the pastor of the Methodist church in that place, and one of the most inveterate foes of Polygamy and Brigham Young. Three years ago Provo was one of the most powerful of all the Mormon strongholds in Utah. Many deeds of violence had been committed there, and bigotry in its worst form ruled the people. Mr. Lyford, young, brave, and enthusiastic, determined to build a Gentile church there. He went into the work cheerfully and determinedly, although he was warned to leave the county, his life threatened, and every possible insult and indignity offered to him. But he could not be intimidated, and flatly refused to leave; and now he has a society fully organized, a church built, and a free school established. He has been one of my strongest allies and warmest defenders, and I owe to no one more gratitude than to him.

I have told my story as simply as I could. I have added nothing, but I have left much untold. Another volume, as large as this, would not contain all I could write on this subject. My life is but the life of one; while thousands are suffering, as I suffered, and are powerless even to plead for themselves, so I plead for them. The voices of twenty thousand women speak in mine, begging for freedom both from social and religious tyranny.

I take up papers, and I read letters from eastern correspondents who have visited Utah; and while I do not wonder at the enthusiasm which they display concerning the outward beauty of this city of the desert, I marvel at the

ness which fails to see the misery of the majority of its people. "Polygamy is on the decrease," they almost unanimously exclaim; "the ballot and education are its foes, and it cannot stand before them; the young people will not enter the system, and while polygamous marriages diminish in number, monogamous ones steadily increase."

This is not so. I have no doubt it is the story which is told to these strangers by Mormons. But that is an old trick. They have been accustomed, in other days, to repudiate polygamy while practicing it most extensively. They are only following "Brother Joseph's example. He denied it, to save the reputation of himself and his followers; and they do it still, when they wish to blind the Gentiles' eyes, and escape their criticism.

Last year, as the records will show, there were more polygamous marriages in Utah than there have been any previous year since the "Reformation." The Order of Enoch and Polygamy are, today, Brigham's two strongest holds on the people. By the first, he holds the men through sheer necessity; for all who have entered the Order have give themselves and their possessions so entirely to him, that they cannot, by any possibility, get free. By the other system, he holds the women in a crueler bondage still. He and Cannon may repudiate he "Celestial Marriage" as strongly as they choose, but they cannot change the facts. They are more shrewd, but not so honest as the fellow who was seen reeling through the streets of Salt Lake City, with a bottle under each arm, shouting, "I've taken a new wife today, and I'm not afraid of the Poland Bill." They do care for "the Poland Bill," or, rather, they care about public opinion very much, and they like the position which they might be obliged to resign if they ventured to claim the legality of Polygamy.

There is a strong working-power against it in its very midst, however, and it seems to me that it is a power which must prevail. The pulpit and press combined are dealing some heavy blows upon it, and it cannot always stand under it. Instead of the Mormon church being the only church in Utah, nearly every denomination is represented there now, and the most of these churches have schools connected with them—such superior schools, some of them, that a few of the more liberal and intelligent Mormons venture to send their children to them.

But the strongest power in the Territory against Polygamy—the most implacable and relentless foe to Brigham Young and his pet institution—is the Salt Lake City Tribune, the leading Gentile paper in Utah. It is owned by a stock company, composed of the leading Gentiles in the Territory; is ably conducted, and is hated and dreaded by the Mormons, although they all read it. It has been my constant friend, and has stood bravely by me ever since I turned my back on my false faith, and sought shelter and friends in “Babylon.”

In is a power in politics. When Governor Woods—although a loyal and brave officer of the government—was removed to make place for Axtell, who was a mere tool in the Prophet’s hands, the indignant utterances of the paper made themselves felt all over the country; and the supporters of the new governor in Washington grew ashamed, and he was removed to make room for Governor Emory, the present governor, who, as yet, has shown no disposition to assimilate with the saintly portion of his subjects.

Now, as I approach the end of my story, I turn longing eyes toward my old home, and my heart goes out in pitying tenderness to it and the women there. To them I want to say, Your cause is my cause, your wrongs have been my wrongs; and while you are still bearing them patiently, because you know there is no redress; hopelessly, because while your hearts are breaking, you see no avenue of escape, I am trying the best I know to make the way easy and plain to your eyes, dimmed with tears, and your feet, tired of wandering in broken paths. Many of you, I know, think that I am wrong; you believe, as I once did, that to fight against Brigham Young, and his will, is certain damnation. You mourn for me as one lost; you regard me with pity; but yet, in your hearts, you wish to believe that I am right; you would like to be convinced that I am. Some of you are certain of it, but you do not see your own way out. The darkness closes around you thicker and heavier, and, tired of groping about, you fold your hands and sit in an apathy worse than death, waiting until the dawn of eternity shall throw light upon your path. God help you dear sisters, one and all, and bring you out of the spiritual bondage in which you are held.

And you, happier women—you to whom life has given of its best, and has crowned royally—can you not help me? The cry of my suffering and sorrowing sisters sweeps over the broad prairies, and asks you, as I ask you now, “Can you do nothing for us?” women’s pens, and women’s voices pleaded earnestly and pathetically for the abolition of slavery. Thousands of women, some of them your country-women, and your social and intellectual equals, are held in a more revolting slavery today. Something must be done for them. This system that blights every woman’s life who enters it, ought not to remain a curse and a stain upon this nation any longer. It should be blotted out so completely that even its foul memory would die.

Yet, how is it to be done? I confess myself discouraged when I ask that question. Legislation will do no good, unless the laws can be enforced after they are once made. But if laws are to be framed, and the men who enforce them are to be removed as a punishment for their faithfulness, they are better not made.

But one thing is certain. If one voice, or one pen, can exert any influence, the pen will never be laid aside, the voice never be silenced. I have given myself to this work, and I have promised before God never to withdraw from it. It is my life-mission; and I have faith to believe that my work will not be in vain, and that I shall live to see the foul curse removed, and Utah—my beloved Utah—free from the unholy rule of the religious tyrant—Brigham Young.

INTRODUCTION

When the original edition of The God Makers was released in 1984, we prayed that it would be used of the Lord to open the eyes of the world to the truth about Mormonism. We had no idea that its impact would be truly global, and that it, along with the movie The God Makers, would change forever the way the world would look at Mormonism.

At the same time the book became a bestseller, the film was being shown throughout the country to standing-room-only crowds in churches of every Christian denomination. In Ed's home church in Bellevue, Washington, traffic was backed up for blocks in every direction as people worked their way to the parking lots.

In one church in Colorado Springs, more than twice as many people showed up for the film as the large church building could hold. Ed had to teach on the lawn those who couldn't get in, preparing them for what they would see in the film, while the film itself was being shown inside to the first crowd. When the film was over, the crowds switched and Ed provided a question-and-answer time for the first crowd.

From city to city throughout the country, the story was the same. At one time the film was being shown at over a thousand churches per month, and entire cases of The God Makers book were sold at almost every showing.

Controversy and revival exploded everywhere Ed or Dave spoke. Newspaper, TV, and radio coverage converged from every perspective and viewpoint. Ministries such as Saints Alive could not keep up with the calls, counseling, letters, and necessary follow-up for those Mormons and others who trusted in the true Jesus of the Bible.

The Mormon Church was taken by surprise by all this, learning that its carefully constructed masquerade was exposed once and for all to the light of truth, and this time by people who wouldn't back down to pressure, threats, and slander.

As you read through this revised edition, you will see that several critical heresies that were pointed out in the first edition have now been revised by the LDS Church to conform to an appearance of orthodoxy that is so essential in its counterfeit Christianity.

But these changes have had more resemblance to the metamorphic life cycles of the insect world than to the actions of a holy-Prophet-directed "only true Church." Sadly, no matter how many heresies receive a new coat of paint, this caterpillar will never turn into a butterfly any more than the victims of Mormonism will turn into gods and goddesses.

THE MORMON CHALLENGE

Intent upon researching and producing an unusual feature story, Denver Post staff writer John Farrell, accompanied by Post photographer Jim Richardson, spent 13 weeks during the summer and fall of 1982 traveling throughout "The Church State"¹ of Utah. Their assignment? To penetrate what has been called "The Zion Curtain"² erected by the Mormon Church to protect its vast wealth and influence. The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints so effectively controls one of the 50 American states, where it is "the largest private property owner,"³ that "the line between worship and government has become so blurred that some civil rights have evaporated."⁴ In this unusual state, "Jews are called Gentiles" and a "majority of non-Mormons" consider themselves to be "victims of discrimination."⁵

As anyone knows who has lived very long in Utah, far from encouraging freedom (as one might expect), the all-pervasive presence of the Mormon Church hangs like a heavy cloud of oppression that can't be escaped anywhere. One gradually acquires the uneasy feeling that "Big Brother" is always listening and watching. Farrell and Richardson discovered that in some ways conditions behind the Zion Curtain were uncomfortably similar to those that prevailed behind the Iron Curtain. This was particularly true concerning two of the rights that Americans have traditionally held most dear: freedom of speech and freedom of the press. In Utah these are not exercised without "widespread constraint" imposed upon everyone by the Mormon hierarchy's long arm that reaches everywhere.

These rights are further inhibited by the disturbing fact that "the state's largest evening newspaper and... leading TV station are owned by the church,"⁶ which has been described as "America's biggest, richest and strongest home-grown faith."⁷ Giving its official approval to the Church's trampling on human rights, in 1975 the Utah Supreme Court with its Mormon majority handed down a surprising decision, that, as summarized by the Denver Post-

The First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution-which guarantees freedom of speech, freedom of the press, freedom of assembly and freedom of religion-did not apply in Utah but was only a limitation on the federal government.⁸

The Foundation of Mormon Authority

John Farrell's assignment was "not an expose of the Mormon religion," but to give an honest picture of life inside Utah. Just as it was behind Marxism's Iron Curtain, however, so Farrell and Richardson discovered that in this bastion of capitalism and conservatism behind the Zion Curtain it was extremely difficult to find individuals who were willing to speak openly and freely in response to questions about the almost-omnipotent religious power that tolerates no interference in its control of the Church State. They soon learned that "the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints does not take kindly to dissent."⁹ For a resident of Utah to openly question the irresistible and self-serving influence exerted everywhere in Utah by the Mormon Church-or its activities, morals, or doctrines-could call down the wrath of a totalitarian power upon one's head. The results are sometimes frighteningly similar to those suffered by dissidents within the former Soviet Union or some other Communist country.

Dominating the skyline of downtown Salt Lake City, a huge 28-story office building, tallest in the state, houses the corporate headquarters of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints. Here, lawyers, accountants, and computer experts try to keep up with the day-to-day commercial activities involving the vast business interests and real-estate holdings of the multibillion-dollar worldwide financial empire of Mormonism. From his top-floor suite in the Church-owned Hotel Utah, the President of the Mormon Church (its "Prophet, Seer, and Revelator") exercises unchallenged control over the 9.7 million members ¹⁰ through a hierarchy of apostles, assistants, and advisers. Everyone entering the imposing Church headquarters is greeted by these emblazoned words:

The Course of Wisdom is the Course of Obedience.

How well Mormons know the truth of that slogan! It has been drilled into their consciousness since earliest childhood. And in Utah, the Church State, even non-Mormons feel the pressure to conform to a power that insists upon overriding both conscience and God. The authority which the Mormon hierarchy wields began with Joseph Smith's claim that every Christian on the face of the earth was following abominable creeds and was involved in a total worldwide apostasy that had completely destroyed the Church that Jesus Christ had founded. Smith claimed that he had been ordained to restore truth to the earth, and that as the modern founder of the true Church, he alone was the dispenser of God's revelation and will in this dispensation. That grandiose boast is the foundation of the absolute authority which the Mormon Presidents and Apostles claim as their divine right today. All who reject Joseph Smith's claims and do not submit obediently to his successors are "Gentiles" outside the true Church he founded and are without salvation.

Reversing the LDS Pro-Life Stand

In the 1993 Harvest House book The God Makers II, authors Ed Decker and Caryl Matrisciana wrote about the difficulties that faithful LDS members were having trying to balance their consciences with the dictates of The Brethren.

When Ed was in Utah premiering the new film, one of the TV stations did a news report on church disciplinary action that was being taken against some people who were pro-lifers. In a literally unbelievable turn of events, the LDS church has reversed its almost militant pro-life position and LDS Bishops are now counseling young women to have abortions! Twenty years ago such counseling would have caused a Bishop to be immediately excommunicated from the church for such behavior. Here is the actual transcript of the report, transcribed from KTVX, Salt Lake City, on December 11, 1993:

ANCHOR: The LDS Church says it has consistently opposed elective abortions, but some Mormons claim they are being disciplined for preaching the pro-life message. Paul Murphy has this exclusive report.

MURPHY: They say they are faithful Latter-day Saints, but claim they are being disciplined for their anti-abortion views.

SHARP: It is murder—the shedding of innocent blood, for which there is no forgiveness.

MURPHY: Sharp says he was excommunicated in July only over abortion. His Stake president says it was only one of four issues leading to the discipline. John Abney was a Ward clerk until he expressed his views against abortion. Now he and his wife are scheduled for a Church disciplinary court.

JOHN ABNEY: We do not want to have the blood and the sins of this generation to come upon our garments, either in or out of the Church.

- MURPHY: Roxanne Abney said she couldn't believe the conversation she recently had with her Stake president.
- ROXANNE ABNEY: One of the Lord's representatives, discussing abortion, me being against it, him being for it, and I'm on the wrong side of the fence.
- MURPHY: The LDS General Handbook now says that abortion is not murder, and is permissible in cases of rape, incest, or when the life or health of the woman is in danger, or the fetus is not likely to survive birth. But as recently as 1975, the LDS President said abortion is wrong, even in cases of rape. And Utah's Right-to-Life Director says she has received a lot of calls from girls who say their Bishops counsel them to have abortions.
- DIRECTOR: So it wasn't for rape and it wasn't for incest and it wasn't for fetal deformity...
- MURPHY: And the Bishop still counseled these girls to have an abortion?
- DIRECTOR: The Bishop is still advising them to have an abortion.
- MURPHY: These are confusing times for Sharp and the Abneys. They thought they were in line with Mormon doctrine. Now they find themselves on the way out. Paul Murphy, KTVX 4 News.
- ANCHOR: Tomorrow night, a group of pro-life Mormons will be meeting at the Copper View Community Center in Midvale to discuss their future in the LDS Church.

Theocracy: The Original Goal Still Intact

Aside from its vast commercial income, the Church probably receives more than four million dollars daily in tithes.¹¹ The billions of dollars it receives and controls are not accounted for by the Mormon hierarchy to the members who contribute so generously and sacrificially. The Mormon empire is a virtual theocracy. Its leaders claim to represent God to the people. Therefore they are accountable to no one on earth for anything. They only command, and their followers must obey without question. According to Apostle Boyd K.Packer:

Now, about the Church money, we've never published the income figures....

It's been a policy. A lot of organizations are that way.¹²

The original aim of founding Prophet Joseph Smith and other early Mormon leaders was to establish a theocracy that would eventually control the entire United States. Instead, the "Saints" were successively driven from Illinois and Missouri by "Gentiles," who didn't take kindly to such a goal nor to the attempts to accomplish it by trickery and force. Under the leadership of Brigham Young, Smith's successor, the persecuted Latter-day Saints traveled westward, where they established their "nation within a nation" in the territory of Utah. Threatened with collapse of their theocratic kingdom under the onslaught of Congressional laws passed in the late 1880s that outlawed polygamy and stripped the Mormon Church of its property and power, Mormon leaders finally decided in 1890 that they couldn't win a war against the United States Army, and so capitulated. Settling into a grudging but necessary peaceful coexistence with the other states in the Union and obeying federal laws to the extent necessary in the interim, Mormon leaders were then, and still are, biding their time until that prophesied day when their original goal will at last be accomplished.

That goal of establishing a theocratic rule over the United States and planet Earth is still an integral part of the Mormon faith and the underlying motivating factor in their desire to convert the world. Speaking of the uncomfortable adjustment that has been required in the meanwhile, Mormon author Samuel Taylor has written:

As we became accepted by the outside world, after decades of vilification and ridicule... we went to work busily on a new public image replacing the polygamous rebel with the gentle Saint who didn't use coffee....

They concocted a never-never land of Mormonism that presented a lovely, if unreal, facade for the outside world to admire and converts to embrace.¹³

Though he writes rather frankly, Samuel Taylor has remained a Latterday Saint. So have the publisher and staff of Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, from which this quote was taken. Many other Mormons, however, have been driven by conscience to leave their Church because of what they consider to be heresies and fraud too serious to overlook any longer. Battling with just the many obvious problems of the history of their faith, such as the inconsistent versions of the First Vision, outright fraud in Smith's pretended translation of Egyptian papyri as lost Scripture, and his ridiculous attempt to foist a similar translation of the deliberately faked Kinderhook plates, many Mormons have finally come to the conclusion that they can no longer be silent. Believing they are under a moral obligation to share their knowledge about the dark side of Mormonism with the world, many former Mormons have joined forces to accomplish this goal.

The Hidden Truth

In modern pursuit of Joseph Smith's original vision, the Mormon Church circles the globe with an aggressive missionary outreach. This global force has been numbering over 50,000 full-time missionaries in the 1990s. Mormon zeal is noteworthy and their motivation must be accepted as genuine. However, their methods include a great deal of misrepresentation.

Recently the LDS church has been changing its TV and radio advertising and public service announcements to mislead all but the very wary. TV viewers watching a Billy Graham crusade were treated with an invitation to call an 800 number and receive a free copy of the Bible, with no cost or obligation. We called for one and received the Bible as promised, with a letter from the LDS Church which read in part:

By reading this book and following the Savior's teachings found within it, your family will feel closer to each other and to Jesus Christ. You' ll also better understand God's plan for each of us. Imagine the satisfaction and peace of mind that offers.

If, after receiving The Bible, you would like to know more about how the teachings of Jesus Christ can help you and your family, please call 1-888-917-2828 and representatives of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints will gladly arrange a visit that is convenient for your schedule. They will also bring you a free copy of The Book of Mormon as mentioned below. May the message you read in The Bible help you find the greater love and happiness we all desire (italics in original).

A last note promises that the Book of Mormon "supports and clarifies the Savior's teachings in The Bible" (undated form letter from Stephen Allen, Public Programs, LDS Church).

This new public relations outreach of the LDS Church didn't just happen. Their PR experts knew that this was going to be a winner by testing it in a number of markets and then running it past select groups of their own membership first.

Ed received the following letter from an active Mormon who has worked through the problems of the LDS theology and has turned his life over to the real Jesus (He is about where I [Ed] was in my last days among The Brethren.)

Hello, brother Ed, it's again. Assuming I've not already worn out my welcome, I thought you might be interested in a couple of things I found out at church today.

While the rest of the Christian world was celebrating Christ's victory over death and sin [Easter 1997], our "three-hour block" concentrated on clerical affairs and "missionary work." Our Sacrament Meeting featured a farewell talk by the First Councilor in the Bishopric and his wife, and remarks summarized from the Church News by our Bishop. Apart from a musical number by the primary children, and three Christ-centered hymns (a rarity in LDS congregational singing, I'm sure you recall), one would have been hard-pressed to know or even suspect that today was a holy day.

Our third hour was a joint Priesthood-Relief Society meeting, and it introduced something I think might interest you. Our new Second Councilor, the retiring Stake Mission President, informed us that our area-the area-is part of a new missionary pilot program. Based on demographic research and (I'm not making this up) Nielsen ratings, the Church has inaugurated a new television campaign. It was introduced by an apparatchik from the Church's media department at a mission conference in Milwaukee, Wisconsin, a few weeks ago, and has been in progress and apparently is very successful.

We were shown five "homefronts"-television ads. The first two deal with the Book of Mormon and the next two with family home evening. I had seen all of them. However, the last was entitled "Truths Never Change" and it focused on three biblical principles: forgiveness, love, and peace.

At the end of the spot, the announcer informed the audience that it could call a toll-free number and receive-"without obligation," of course-a King James Bible (printed in the same marbled blue mass-paperback style as the Book of Mormon).

The departing Stake Mission President excitedly announced that the fifth spot was being tested in the Milwaukee area and four other areas worldwide, and that it has generated a tremendous response-more than twice the response of all the other spots combined! Furthermore, it was pointed out that 80 percent of those contacted via the Bible ad had received the first missionary "discussion," and 60 percent had gone on to the second. The members were urged to follow up on the ad within 24 hours of a broadcast (although it wasn't made clear how this was to be done).

Nearly everyone who commented on the Bible spot said that they "felt the Spirit much more strongly" in it than they had with the Book of Mormon and Family Home Evening commercials-but nobody stopped to examine the implications of this observation. Several others pointed out that the ad was not nearly as "off-putting" to the public, as it involved something familiar. It was also noted that the ad "positions" the Church well as a denomination that reads and accepts the Bible.

I just thought you'd find all of this interesting. The Mormon missionaries who are delivering the Bibles aren't Gideons; they are using the Bible as a pretext, which is at best dishonest.

It is interesting to note that even the Mormons recognized the difference between the Bible ad and the other ads and were strongly drawn in their own hearts to the first. What a terrible manipulation of truth! Ed did not call the 888 number, but several weeks after the Bible came, two Mormon missionaries appeared to see if it had arrived and if he had any questions they could answer. The Book of Mormon wasn't even mentioned. The Bible gave them a solid ground of compatibility with which they were apparently more comfortable.

Mormon missionaries claim to be bringing true Christianity to the world. The vast majority of converts to Mormonism are proselytized from Protestant denominations. When questioned, Mormons insist that their gospel comes from the Bible and that they have the same God and the same Jesus as Christians. In actual fact, they have a completely different God from what the Bible presents, a different Jesus, and a different gospel.

These differences are denied or glossed over by the missionaries, who are often evasive and unwilling to tell the whole truth to a prospective convert for fear of losing him. Moreover, much about Mormonism cannot be revealed to sincere seekers, because those who know what is involved have taken an oath of secrecy. This means that Mormonism's most sacred and important doctrines and practices are discovered only after getting in too deeply to turn back.

Just beneath the carefully groomed facade of "true Christianity" that Mormons present to the world is another story so bizarre that non-Mormons find it difficult to believe even when the irrefutable evidence has been laid out in front of them. It is this story-the shocking and incredible truth about Mormonism-that we want to tell. Our purpose is not to harm the Latter-day Saints, but to help them by exposing what many Mormons themselves don't yet know and might otherwise learn only too late. Everything in the following pages has been thoroughly researched and fully documented.

Unfortunately, Mormons have so often been told stories of the terrible persecution suffered by the "Saints" in the early days that they react to honest criticism as though they were being persecuted once again. The Denver Post team of Farrell and Richardson tried unsuccessfully to get LDS leaders in Salt Lake City to tell their side of the story. "The Mormon Church's hierarchy declined repeated requests for interviews" by Farrell. "Other Utahans, fearing they might be ostracized if they spoke freely... would talk only if granted anonymity." Farrell, however, used nothing from anonymous sources in his article.¹⁴

Sincere Response to the Mormon Challenge

We have found it almost impossible to enter into a friendly and meaningful dialogue with Mormons, especially those in positions of responsibility. This attitude is strange in view of the exhortation in Mormon scripture, Doctrine and Covenants 71:7-8, which urges all Mormons: "Wherefore, confound your enemies; call upon them to meet you in public and in private; and inasmuch as ye are faithful their shame shall be made manifest. Wherefore, let them bring forth their strong reasons against the Lord."

Both this book and a film of the same title represent a sincere attempt to meet this challenge. We will give overwhelming evidence concerning what Mormons really believe and practice, and the many reasons why Mormonism is not Christian at all but a revival of primitive paganism in a modified form. We only ask for an honest hearing-the willingness to face facts and admit the truth. It is not our desire to dissuade anyone from being a Mormon who truly wants to be one. On the other hand, we want everyone who is in the Mormon Church or is considering joining it to know what this commitment really means. We sincerely accept the challenge that Mormonism presents to the world today, which early Apostle Orson Pratt explained in these words:

The nature of the message of the Book of Mormon is such, that if true, no one can possibly be saved and reject it; if false, no one can possible be saved and receive it....

If, after a rigid examination, it be found an imposition, it should be extensively published to the world as such; the evidences and arguments upon which the imposture was detected should be clearly and logically stated, that those who have been sincerely yet unfortunately deceived may perceive the nature of the deception and be reclaimed... and that those who contribute to publish the delusion may be exposed and silenced, not by physical force, neither by persecutions, bare assertions, nor ridicule, but by strong and powerful arguments-by evidences adduced from scripture and reason.¹⁵

This we intend to do, avoiding bare assertions and ridicule. If it continues true to form, however, the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints may be expected, if not officially then through pressure at all levels, to discourage its members from reading this book. In good faith, we have accepted the challenge of Orson Pratt, Brigham Young, and other Mormon leaders to make the truth known-and that includes Mormonism's darkest secrets that those privy to them have sworn upon penalty of death not to reveal.

The refusal of any Mormon to consider honestly and openly the facts presented in this book can only indicate an unwillingness to face the truth in the manner urged upon LDS by their own Apostles. We challenge all who wish to know the truth to read on. It may change your life or the life of someone you love.

Tragically, the love and zeal Mormons exercise is toward a false god. Nevertheless, the true God loves them and gave His Son to die for their sins on the cross of Calvary. That truth is deliberately obscured by lying leaders and false teachers who are leading a whole people-group into eternal destruction. Christians need to face the real issue: the urgent need to speak the truth in love to set the lost free.

Let the words of Scripture awaken our concern:

The ancient and honorable, he is the head; and the prophet that teacheth lies, he is the tail. For the leaders of this people cause them to err, and they that are led of them are destroyed.

Therefore the Lord shall have no joy in their young men, neither shall have mercy on their fatherless and widows; for every one is a hypocrite and an evildoer, and every mouth speaketh folly. For all this his anger is not turned away, but his hand is stretched out still (Isaiah 9:15-17).

A FASCINATING QUESTION

Jim and Judy were typical converts to the Mormon Church. Although they had been active in a mainline Protestant denomination for years, they felt that something was still missing from their lives. Somehow they had never found that deep personal relationship with God that they sensed they needed and longed for.

In the course of his business, Jim came into contact with an active and zealous member of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints. Feeling themselves drawn to this man and his beautiful family, Jim and Judy gradually became more and more involved with them socially. There were so many good qualities evident in the relationships in this Mormon home that Jim and Judy began to wonder whether these people might not have found the answer to that hunger for God that still gnawed deep within their own hearts.

"These people seemed to be Christians," Judy told us. "Any people that I'd ever been around that I had felt were really Christians had the same attributes. They were fine, good, loving, family-oriented people."

Not only were the relationships of family members extremely close and loving, but they noticed something else: They took their religion very seriously. This made Jim and Judy think that perhaps these people really did have what they had been seeking.

Could Such Good People Be Wrong?

"Everything they did revolved around their Church," continued Judy. "That was appealing to us, especially since we felt pretty empty as far as our own religious experience was concerned. Something was missing from our lives that we couldn't quite explain. Looking at this family we thought, 'Boy, they really do have something!' We wanted to know what that something was, so we began to ask them questions: 'What is a Mormon? What do you really believe?'"

Jim picked up the story at this point. "At our friends' request, the missionaries came to see us and we began to take the lessons. As they would leave each night, they would encourage us to read the Book of Mormon and to pray that we might know whether it was true. At the end of the six lessons, we were encouraged to be baptized into the Mormon Church. However, these two precious young men told us that they weren't going to ask for a definite answer that last night. Instead, they would wait until the following night to see what we had decided. In the meanwhile, most of the Mormons in Mesa, Arizona, would fast and pray that our answer would be the right one."

"They were so sincere about this," added Judy. Her voice reflected both an appreciation and a sadness. "The next day Jim and I each received so many calls! Mormons we'd never met phoned me at the apartment and Jim at work. The voice on the line would say, 'This is brother and sister so-and-so. We're fasting and praying for you that your answer will be the right one' We were sure impressed that they were a very loving people. When the missionaries came back to ask us if we wanted to be baptized, we couldn't help but say yes!"

It was only after several years that Jim and Judy began studying the Bible and asking God's guidance and only then realized what they were really involved in. The experience almost cost them their marriage. The true facts about Mormonism were entirely different from what they had been led to believe. Joining had been easy, reinforced as it had been with so much love. Getting out was something else. What they had thought was genuine love expressed over and over by Mormons who had become their closest friends suddenly turned to a severing of relationships and false accusations.

There are so many thousands of other people just like Jim and Judy. As many of them related their stories to us, it became clear that the real challenge of Mormonism involved far more than questions of religious doctrine and rituals. There are millions of lives involved-and if, as Apostle Orson Pratt declared, "no one can possibly be saved and receive" a false prophet and false gospel, then the stakes are high indeed.

Documenting the Evidence

It was in response to this side of the Mormon challenge that the documentary film titled The God Makers was produced. Three years in the making, it was premiered on the night of December 31, 1982, to an overflow audience of about 4000 at Grace Community Church in Sun Valley, California. After reviewing and approving the movie earlier, the internationally respected pastor of Grace Community Church, Dr. John MacArthur, had said: "This film is dynamite, the most powerful thing I've seen! Get your Mormon friends to view it!"

Those packed into the large auditorium that evening seemed to agree with Dr. MacArthur's appraisal. Long periods of stunned silence were broken intermittently with loud gasps of astonishment and utter disbelief. The documented evidence presented such a different picture of the Mormon Church from that which most people have always accepted that the audience was left in a state of shock, from which it recovered only slowly during the question-and-answer period that followed the movie and is standard at all showings.

The film centers around a dramatized reenactment of an attempt by two former members of the Mormon Melchizedek priesthood, Ed Decker and Dick Baer, to persuade a top Los Angeles law firm to file a class-action suit against the Mormon Church. The suit is proposed on behalf of numerous victims who, like Decker and Baer themselves, had seen their marriages and families destroyed, strangely enough, by the Mormon doctrine of "eternal marriage," which is a prerequisite for reaching every worthy Mormon's ultimate goal of becoming a god or goddess.

The unusual proposal is met with incredulity by the attorneys. The senior partner in the law firm demands, "Mr. Decker, Mr. Baer, just what are we dealing with here?"

Ed Decker replies, "I was involved in this group for 19 years... and I consider it to be one of the most dangerous and deceptive organizations in the world!" Pulling a stack of papers from his briefcase, he adds, "I've got documentation here that ties them into occultism and Satanism... and that's just the tip of the iceberg."

Making no attempt to hide his complete rejection of such an obviously fanatical statement, the young lawyer sitting in on the conference cuts in quickly: "Mr. Decker, I don't doubt your sincerity, but I find this very hard to believe. These people are known for family togetherness and a very conspicuous form of moral rectitude."

Ed's vehement response seems only to add to the disbelief of the lawyers and further staggers the already-stunned audience viewing the dramatization: "That's part of an incredible deception... and that's why we have to expose it!"

As the director of Saints Alive (also known as Ex-Mormons for Jesus), Ed Decker speaks from a conviction growing out of years of experience dealing both with committed Mormons and with those who are disillusioned and want to leave the Church but don't know how.

Reactions from the "Saints"

To say that this film has aroused a strong reaction from Mormons and an explosion of interest among non-Mormons would be a classic understatement. There have been death threats against some of those who have dared to show the film, as well as against Ed himself, who has perhaps taken the brunt of much of the hate and anger. Mormons have demonstrated against the movie, tried to have it banned, and pressured television stations not to air it. Frequently they have tried to break up the showing or to disrupt the discussion afterward. All of this has only served to increase the interest of those who want to know the truth, and it has strengthened the determination of the film's distributors to let nothing prevent its free circulation.

In order to give the Mormon leaders an opportunity to express their objections and point out any errors, invitations were both mailed and handdelivered to Church leaders for them or their representatives to attend a private afternoon showing of The God Makers in the downtown Salt Lake City theater where the film's public premiere was scheduled that evening. "We are very sincere in our desire to receive a serious response from the Mormon Church to this film," Ed Decker told 25 to 30 Mormons, none of them top leaders, who came to the showing. (They appeared to be attorneys and executives from Church headquarters.) Other than some whispered comments among themselves, the only response to Ed's plea for dialogue was stony silence and a hasty exit as soon as the film ended.

The Mormon Church has purchased several video copies of The God Makers and presumably has studied the film very carefully. So far, after over 15 years of countless showings and probably close to 100,000 video copies sold or distributed, there has been no official reaction, which we would expect if there were any factual errors. Certainly the reaction of the "Saints" so far has not been in keeping with idealistic statements from Brigham Young and Orson Pratt about welcoming investigation and confounding their "enemies" in public and private with the truth.

One time and one time only, the LDS Church agreed to have two of its official representatives meet Dave and Ed head-on. It was shortly after a showing of the film The God Makers on Channel 38 TV in Chicago. The LDS participants watched the film again in a private showing and spent the better part of the day in preparing for the open forum, accompanied by several men who appeared to be coaching them. Immediately after the debate, which was moderated by Channel 38 director Jerry Rose, they made a veritable rush for the door. There has never been another offer to debate the issues.

Mormons attending various showings of the film in order to publicly refute it during the open discussion time that always follows have invariably charged that it is full of lies. When asked to be specific, they have just as invariably failed to substantiate their accusations. One would think that if the Mormon Church, which has been carefully examining the film for so many years, had been able to find any inaccuracies it would have published an official refutation instead of remaining silent. No doubt the tremendous impact the film has had came as a surprise to the Church.

Neither the producer of the movie nor the authors of this book have any vendetta against the Mormon Church or against Mormons as individuals. Certainly there is no desire to deny or to lessen the right of any individual to be a Mormon if he or she freely chooses to be one. Our issue has always been with the doctrines of Mormonism, never with the people who are the victims of its deceit. The God Makers was intended to encourage freedom of choice on the part of those within the Mormon Church and those outside, who may be considering membership or are approached by Mormon missionaries in an attempt to persuade them to become Mormons.

No one, however, can really exercise a genuine freedom of choice without the facts upon which to base an intelligent decision. The truth alone sets free. The purpose of both the film and this book is to present the truth so that Mormons and non-Mormons alike can make a truly free choice.

Stranger Than Fiction

It has often been said that "truth is stranger than fiction." In no instance is this more apparent than when the carefully worn mask is peeled off and the truth revealed concerning the Mormon Church. That truth is so bizarre that its very "stranger-than-fiction" quality makes it difficult to believe. This is all the more so because the truth about Mormonism has been so effectively concealed by its leaders.

After months of investigation, the Denver Post team of Farrell and Richardson concluded that "the Reader's Digest image" of Mormonism most people accept "is all done with mirrors. The signs of strain inside the Mormon nation are real enough." Although Mormons pride themselves upon their abstinence from alcohol and tobacco, a government study conducted in 1973 indicated that "church members take more non-barbiturate sedatives, tranquilizers, anti-depressants, stimulants, pep pills, heroin, cocaine, and LSD" than non-Mormons. In the words of John Farrell, this fact seems to throw "some doubt on the claim that Church members only get 'high on life' ".¹ Other startling facts that the Post investigation uncovered include the following:

Utah's divorce rate has always been higher than the national average... [and] 20 is the most common age for women in Utah to get divorced....

Utah's child murder rate is five times the national average.

Half of all babies born in Utah have teenage mothers, and seven out of ten of these children are conceived out of wedlock....

But because of the fierce pressure to remain "respectable" in Utah, seven months has become the most common interval between marriage and childbirth.

Mormons tend to replace vices like cigarettes and alcohol with a demanding sweet tooth. A hefty 46 percent of all adults in Utah are overweight, compared to a national average of 19 percent ²

The Mormon Church has worked very diligently and successfully not only to project worldwide a wholesome family image, but also to present itself as the only true representative of Christianity upon earth. Though most people reject that claim as extravagant, they are left with the impression that Mormonism is simply an extreme form of Christian fundamentalism. Nothing could be further from the truth. On the contrary, Mormonism is a modified 'form of paganism which is so carefully camouflaged with a facade of Christian terminology that it even deceives most Mormons. Paganism is the universal naturalistic religion of the human race. It usually involves communication with spirits, a hierarchy of many gods, and appeasement of these powerful beings through occult rituals leading to the mastery of forces inherent in nature. Though seemingly diversified, all pagans are united in their antagonism against biblical Christianity.

How a religion that, as we shall see, is so closely linked to basic Hinduism and occultism could have managed to pose as Christian for over 150 years is a fascinating story. No less fascinating is the devout belief that the Mormon Church will rescue the United States from destruction by taking over the reins of government during a coming great crisis and that only then can Jesus Christ return to this earth-accompanied, of course, by Joseph Smith. ³

More Than Coincidence?

Most critics of Mormonism regard Joseph Smith as a fraud who deliberately deceived his followers into joining a church of his own making whose doctrines and rituals were borrowed from Freemasonry and other pagan religions and embellished by his vivid imagination to suit his giant ego. Though partially correct, that explanation fails to account for all of the facts. Careful investigation indicates that Joseph Smith was in touch with a suprahuman source of revelation and power that has been the common inspiration behind all pagan religions down through history. Mormonism's uniqueness is in the fact that it was the first really successful attempt to pass paganism off as Christianity; and it thereby set the pattern for much that is happening on a broad scale today.

Joseph Smith's belief that men could turn themselves into gods was generally considered not only the rankest heresy but an absurdity in his day. Today, however, this once-radical idea permeates not only psychology, science fiction, popular films, television shows, and many other areas of secular society, but it is at the heart of an awakening religious consciousness that is sweeping the world. It is the foundation of hundreds of popular new religious movements such as Scientology, est (Erhard Seminars Training), and TM (Transcendental Meditation). It lies at the heart of humanistic and transpersonal psychologies as well as the entire human potential movement, holistic medicine, and holistic (New Age) education and secular humanism.

How could Joseph Smith have anticipated these modern developments-or did he? Could there be something more sinister involved than even most ex-Mormons suspect? This is the most fascinating aspect of Mormonism, and a question we will seek to answer in the following pages.

Visitors from the Unseen World

One has only to look at what Joseph Smith himself claimed happened at that "sacred Grove" where Mormonism supposedly began to answer the question of demonic inspiration in the birth of Mormonism.

In the LDS scripture The Pearl of Great Price, Joseph Smith describes the circumstance of his seeking to know which church was true:

15 After I had retired to the place where I had previously designed to go, having looked around me, and finding myself alone, I kneeled down and began to offer up the desires of my heart to God. I had scarcely done so, when immediately I was seized upon by some power which entirely overcame me, and had such an astonishing influence over me as to bind my tongue so that I could not speak. Thick darkness gathered around me, and it seemed to me for a time as if I were doomed to sudden destruction.

16 But, exerting all my powers to call upon God to deliver me out of the power of this enemy which had seized upon me and at the very moment when I was ready to sink into despair and abandon myself to destruction-not to an imaginary ruin, but to the power of some actual being from the unseen world, who had such marvelous power as I had never before felt in any being-just at this moment of great alarm, I saw a pillar of light exactly over my head, above the brightness of the sun, which descended gradually until it fell upon me.

17 It no sooner appeared than I found myself delivered from the enemy which held me bound. When the light rested upon me I saw two Personages, whose brightness and glory defy all description, standing above me in the air. One of them spake unto me, calling me by name and said, pointing to the other-This is My beloved Son. Hear Him!

18 My object in going to inquire of the Lord was to know which of all the sects was right, that I might know which to join. No sooner, therefore, did I get possession of myself, so as to be able to speak, than I asked the Personages who stood above me in the light, which of all the sects was right (for at this time it had never entered into my heart that all were wrong)-and which I should join.

19 I was answered that I must join none of them, for they were all wrong; and the Personage who addressed me said that all their creeds were an abomination in his sight; that those professors were all corrupt, that: "they draw near to me with their lips, but their hearts are far from me, they teach for doctrines the commandments of men, having a form of godliness, but they deny the power thereof" (Pearl of Great Price, Joseph Smith History 1:15-19, emphasis added).

Please take a moment and slowly read over the bold-faced sentences again. Note that Joseph Smith is talking about some spiritual power from the unseen world which Smith describes as having such marvelous power as I had never before felt in any being. Just as he was ready to sink into despair and abandon myself to destruction-not to an imaginary ruin, but to the power of some actual being, two personages of light emerge from a shaft of light and tell him that he must join none of them, for they were all wrong; and the Personage who addressed me said that all their creeds were an abomination in his sight; that those professors were all corrupt.

Joseph Smith accepted this advice and later discovered that he would be the vessel through whom the personages would bring the real truth in the last days. Had Joseph Smith had any true biblical knowledge, he would have recognized these personages for who they really were. They certainly weren't God the Father and Jesus. And they weren't angels bringing a message from God, as an earlier version of the First Vision proclaimed. So who were they?

First, the one could not be God the Father, because the Bible tells us that Jesus is all the fullness of the godhead bodily: "For in him dwelleth all the fullness of the Godhead bodily" (Colossians 2:9). Second, this physical personage could never be God, for God is not a man. In speaking to His disciples about the nature of God, Jesus said, "God is a Spirit, and they that worship him must worship him in spirit and in truth" (John 4:24). Jesus appeared to the disciples after his death and they were frightened. He said, "Behold my hands and my feet, that it is I myself; handle me and see, for a spirit hath not flesh and bones, as ye see me have" (Luke 24:39). At another time Jesus said this about His Father: "... Blessed art thou, Simon Barjona, for flesh and blood hath not revealed it unto thee, but my Father which is in heaven" (Matthew 16:17).

Jesus not only declared that God is not a man, but spirit, but He later confirmed that a spirit does not have flesh and bones. To Peter, Jesus clearly stated that His Father does not have flesh and blood.

Shockingly, the LDS Church claims exactly the opposite: "The Father has a body of flesh and bones as tangible as man's, the Son also; but the Holy Ghost has not a body of flesh and bones, but is a personage of Spirit. Were it not so, the Holy Ghost could not dwell in-us" (Doctrine and Covenants 130:23).

While all this should make all but the most foolish or ignorant of investigators run from the missionaries, this foundational error of Mormonism is deeply hidden from sight during the wooing process. Why so? Because Mormonism was founded on the purported visit of two personages of light who brought a different gospel, a different Christ, and a different spirit. The Bible itself identifies these two beings who appeared to Joseph as he fell under the marvelous power of that unseen being from another world: They were beings who were the enemies of God.

But I fear, lest by any means, as the serpent beguiled Eve through his subtilty, so your minds should be corrupted from the simplicity that is in Christ. For if he that cometh preacheth another Jesus, whom we have not preached, or if ye receive another spirit, which ye have not received, or another gospel, which ye have not accepted, ye might well bear with him.... For such are false apostles, deceitful workers, transforming themselves into the apostles of Christ. And no marvel; for Satan himself is transformed into an angel of light. Therefore it is no great thing if his ministers also be transformed as the ministers of righteousness, whose end shall be according to their works (2 Corinthians 11:3,4,13-15).

According to Smith's testimony, that of Jesus, and that of the Bible itself, Joseph Smith was visited by Satan masquerading as God and pronouncing his curse upon the Christian church and the creeds of Christendom.

THE PAGAN CONNECTION

To the average person who only knows the mask that Mormonism wears and not the real face behind it (and this includes many Mormons), it is staggering to hear a beautiful and seemingly intelligent young woman express the incredible hopes she has as a Mormon wife. After Jolene comes on the screen in The God Makers and begins to tell her astonishing story, the audible gasps all through the audience voice the sudden shock felt by most viewers of this hard-hitting expose. Then the gasps turn into embarrassed laughter. How could any intelligent person really think like that? Is it a joke? Yet Jolene is obviously sincere and deeply emotional as she says:

Ever since I was a little girl, I was taught that my primary purpose was to become a goddess in heaven so that I could multiply an earth.

I wanted that. I wanted to become a goddess with my husband... to be eternally pregnant and look down on an earth and say, "That's mine, and all those babies down there, I had!"

If that sounds bizarre, then Janet's testimony assures us that Jolene was not the only Mormon woman who took seriously the promise of becoming an eternally pregnant goddess. Disillusioned with Mormonism, Janet had decided to leave the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, when something changed her mind. It wasn't the fact that leaving the Mormon Church would cost her lifetime relationships and cause her closest friends to treat her like an enemy that made Janet decide to stay in Mormonism. Remembering very vividly, and with astonishment now, what happened when she attended that Relief Society meeting for what she had determined would be the very last time, Janet told us:

That day they were teaching on how fortunate and privileged we were to become goddesses. I had all the qualifications, including a white skin.

I thought to myself, "Wow, what I almost gave up! I can become a goddess, and I almost gave it up!"

After that, I was back in the Church and I was stronger and more active than ever... [for] three more years....

It didn't seem at all unfair to Janet that people with skins darker than her own didn't have the same opportunity. She had believed the Mormon doctrine that all humans had lived in a premortal state before coming to this world. Janet had also accepted the teaching about Lucifer leading a rebellion among the spirits in that bygone era.¹ It made her proud to know, although she could remember none of it, that she had fought valiantly against the Devil on the side of Jesus. That was why she had white skin. She had earned it and the right that came with it: her worthiness to become a goddess.

There were others who had not been willing to fight in this crucial battle. Whether they had been cowards or just lazy, their failure to be valiant in the preexistence had brought the curse of a dark skin and disqualified them for the Mormon priesthood, which was a stepping-stone to godhood.² Since it was their own fault, they deserved that penalty. Although it became expedient for The Brethren to open the Priesthood to blacks in 1978, that alleged "revelation" did not change the Mormon explanation of the origin of a dark skin. It was also in direct contradiction to established Mormon doctrine to the effect that blacks could not have the Priesthood until after all whites had experienced "their resurrection from the dead." Brigham Young had explained it clearly in these words:

Shall I tell you the law of God in regard to the African race? If the white man who belongs to the chosen seed mixes his blood with the seed of Cain, the penalty, under the law of God, is death on the spot.

This will always be so.³ Cain slew his brother... and the Lord put a mark upon him, which is the flat nose and black skin.

... That curse will remain upon them, and they never can hold the Priesthood or share in it until all the other descendants of Adam have received the promises and enjoyed the blessings of the Priesthood and the keys thereof.⁴

When all the other children of Adam have had the privilege of receiving the Priesthood, and of coming into the kingdom of God, and of being redeemed from the four quarters of the earth, and have received their resurrection from the dead, then it will be time enough to remove the curse from Cain and his posterity...⁵

They will go down to death. And when all the rest of the children have received their blessings in the Holy Priesthood, then that curse will be removed... and they will then come up and possess the Priesthood...⁶

John Taylor, the third Prophet and President of the Mormon Church, had this to say about the African-American in Journal of Discourses 22:304: "After the flood we are told that the curse that had been pronounced upon Cain was continued through Ham's wife, as he had married a wife of that seed. And why did it pass through the flood? Because it was necessary that the devil should have a representation upon the earth as well as God.....

Gods-in-Embryo, Spirits-in-Waiting

As any Mormon will gladly testify, being one of the Latter-day Saints (LDS) with a "white and delightsome"⁷ skin is something very special. With membership in "the only true Church" comes the added bonus of rediscovering one's own potential deity. Mormonism declares that we are all uncreated "gods-in-embryo" who have been progressing eternally upward in various forms and stages of ever-higher development in the spirit realm. Though literal sons and daughters of a "Mother and Father God,"⁸ for some inexplicable reason we aren't "gods" by birth, but were required to come to this earth to take on a physical human body in order to prove ourselves worthy of godhood. Infinite numbers of our spirit ancestors have successfully earned their full godhood in this same manner and now rule as gods and goddesses over untold trillions of worlds like ours.⁹

Although the farthest reaches of the universe are now allegedly peopled with gods and goddesses with physical, resurrected bodies that were once mortal, Mormonism teaches that there are still multitudes of full-grown adult spirits out there waiting for bodies to inhabit so that they too can become gods.¹⁰ President Joseph Fielding Smith taught that there is "possibly no greater sin" than any form of birth control.¹¹ This is why it is the duty of every righteous Mormon husband and wife to produce as many babies as possible. Only then can these waiting spirits come to earth to earn their full and rightful deity. The famous Osmond family has testified to their belief in this cardinal LDS doctrine in their signed, published statement of Mormon faith:

We, as Mormons, believe that man is an eternal being, an individual of spiritual substance. We believe that we lived before coming to this earth and that in that premortal state we developed many of the attributes or qualities that our spirits now possess....

It also seems natural to us that our heavenly parents would want us, their offspring, to become like them. For that purpose, it was necessary for us to obtain physical bodies of flesh and bone and to become mortal as we are now.

Consequently, our coming to earth at a given time or place is no accident. God does indeed control the coming to earth of the spirits born and reared in heaven.... He selects the most suitable locations for our birth on earth....

Thus, the earth was created that we might leave our heavenly parents to experience a school of challenges and to exercise our individual liberty and agency to show, through the conduct of our lives, that we fully appreciate and respect our relationship to God, our Heavenly Father, and his Son, Jesus Christ.

"How do we do this?" you ask. By obedience to the laws and principles of the gospel as taught by the Savior during his period of mortality, as well as by word of his prophets.¹²

Although unable to remember anything of this fabled "preexistence" in the spirit world, every true Mormon must nevertheless believe in it because he has sworn to uphold Mormonism's founding Prophet, Joseph Smith. It was Smith who claimed he had received revelations about this premortal state from god-men who allegedly put us here and live on a distant planet near a giant star called Kolob. According to young Joseph, one of his extraterrestrial visitors, a god-man with a physical body (sometimes called "Elohim"), claimed to be the very Father of the spirits of all humans, and that we had lived with him on his home planet before being sent to earth for the purposes the Osmonds describe.

Strangely enough, the children which the gods give birth to are not gods themselves. According to Joseph Smith's "revelation," the explanation for this is stranger yet: "Gods" have bodies, but their children don't. For some peculiar reason that Joseph Smith didn't divulge, the physical womb of a mothergoddess made pregnant by her god-husband produces babies that are composed only of "spiritual substance," as the Osmonds state. So although one must have a physical body to be a god, the gods can only get their bodies from humans; for it is humans, not gods, who give birth to children with bodies. Although this may sound contradictory, this is why the Church believes that every "god-to-be" must come to an earth and take on a human body in order to become a god. For although we are all the literal children of "god-parents," we must first prove ourselves as humans before we can claim our rightful heritage as gods.

The LDS Church teaches that it was in the preexistent world that Jesus and Lucifer, two elder "brothers"¹³ (sexually begotten sons of God as we all are),¹⁴ vied before the "council of gods" for the honor of becoming the Savior of mankind. The plan that Jesus proposed was approved by the council's majority vote. In anger, Lucifer drew one-third of the brothers and sisters into rebellion against the council's decision. He then became the Devil, and his followers the demons.¹⁵

Mormons believe this amazing tale because of their "testimony" that Joseph Smith was a true Prophet inspired by visiting god-men. Those who have some doubts would not be very likely to admit it, for that would cost them their passport to heaven. Most Mormons rest happily in the confidence that the amazing eternal future that Joseph Smith promised is no less certain than the fabled eternal past he described (that they have completely forgotten). Why is nothing of the preexistence remembered? Early Mormon Apostle Orson Pratt explained:

When all these spirits were sent forth from the eternal worlds, they were, no doubt, not infants; but when they entered the infant tabernacle [body], they were under the necessity, the same as our Lord and Savior, of being compressed, or diminished in size so that their spirits could be enclosed in infant tabernacles.

... When Jesus was born into our world, His previous knowledge was taken from Him. This was occasioned by His spiritual body being compressed into a smaller volume than it originally occupied.... When this spirit was compressed, so as to be wholly enclosed in an infant tabernacle, it had a tendency to suspend memory...

So it is with man. When he enters a body of flesh, his spirit is so compressed and contracted in infancy that he forgets his former existence.. ..¹⁶

Paganism Revived

To understand Mormonism it is necessary to recognize, first of all, that it represents a revival of ancient pagan myths and practices under Christian labels. This we will document. Strangely enough, rather than being ashamed of the obvious fact that Mormonism is paganism revived, leading Mormons have pointed this out themselves. They even look upon it as proof of the truthfulness of Mormonism, in spite of the fact that the Bible so clearly denounces and condemns paganism as a satanic seduction to rebellion against the only true God.

Leading Mormon authority Milton R. Hunter has written:

Mormon Prophets have continuously taught the sublime truth that God the Eternal Father was once a mortal man, who passed through a school of earth life similar to that through which we are now passing. He became God-an exalted being-through obedience to the same eternal Gospel truths that we are given opportunity today to obey.

The Mystery Religions, pagan rivals of Christianity, taught emphatically the doctrine that "men may become Gods."

Hermes declared: "We must not shrink from saying that a man on earth is a mortal god, and that God in heaven is an immortal man."

This thought very closely resembles the teachings of the Prophet Joseph Smith and of President Lorenzo Snow ¹⁷

So Mormonism openly aligns itself with what its own leaders identify as "pagan rivals of Christianity." It even boasts that its gospel of men becoming gods is an ancient pagan belief. How then can Mormons claim to be the only true Christians upon earth? Simply because Joseph Smith said so. How do they know he told the truth? By a feeling called the "burning in the bosom," which is the Mormon's ultimate criterion for judging truth:

But behold, I say unto you that you must study it out in your own mind; then you must ask me if it is right, and if it is right I will cause that your bosom shall burn within you; therefore you shall feel that it is right.¹⁸

This subjective "feeling" that could be produced by suggestion and the desire to experience it convinces Mormons by the millions that Joseph Smith was a true Prophet (regardless of his many false prophecies); that the Mormon Church is the only true Church; and that whatever its top leaders say must be accepted without question no matter how obviously wrong or contradictory of what the Bible, the Book of Mormon, or even earlier LDS Prophets have said.

The central belief both in Mormonism and paganism is the ancient dream that men can become gods. This universal and popular delusion began with Satan's impossible and self-contradictory ambition to be equal with God: "I will be like the Most High!"¹⁹ How many Most Highs can there be? Satan lured Eve into joining his mad rebellion against the one true God by promising that she too could become a god. Evidence that this story in Genesis 3 is not myth but history is found everywhere.

Like Mormonism, Hinduism embraces and unites numerous pagan traditions, teaching that humans are gods who have always existed and have "forgotten" who they really are. The purpose of Yoga is "self-realization"-to realize one's rightful godhood through religious practices and rituals (which, as we shall see, is the secret function of Mormon Temples). Scientology, which is a combination of Hinduism and psychology, is based upon a similar belief that we are uncreated gods called Thetans, who have forgotten our true identity. It offers a psychotherapeutic process while connected to an "Emeter" that allegedly enables individuals to peel off "engrams" picked up in prior lives and eventually return to the realization and experience of their true "Thetanhoo." The similarity between pagan religions and Mormonism cannot be explained away as coincidence, but is evidence of a common source of inspiration.

One of the most primitive forms of paganism is animism-the fear that even inanimate objects are inhabited by spirits and thus are alive. In keeping with much pagan mythology, Joseph Fielding Smith, who became the tenth President of the Mormon Church in 1970, taught that the earth is a living creature. The late Apostle Bruce R. McConkie affirmed this basically Hindu occult concept that attributes life and intelligence to the entire universe, including inanimate things:

... This earth was created first as a spirit, and it was thereafter clothed upon with tangible, physical element... [and] is passing through a plan of salvation.²⁰

Paganism, Mormonism, and the Fall of Man

Jesus called Satan "a liar and the father of it"²¹-i.e., the father of the lie. No greater lie could be conceived than that humans could become gods. Eve was deceived by the Serpent's seductive offer of godhood. Adam wasn't deceived, but he nevertheless joined the rebellion instigated by Eve's seducer because he didn't want to lose his wife.²² The Bible makes it clear that this sin of disobedience destroyed both Adam's and Eve's relationship to God, thereby bringing instant spiritual death and eventual physical death upon them and all of their descendants.²³ None of us can complain, however, because we have each rebelled against God in our own way, and we deserve the penalty: "The wages of sin is death."²⁴

In contrast to the consistent teaching of the Judeo-Christian Scriptures, pagan/occult traditions consider the seduction of Eve to be a blessing in disguise. This allegedly made it possible for Adam and Eve to have children and unlocked the door to godhood for them and their descendants. Here again in the interpretation of the fall of man we have another connection between paganism and Mormonism.²⁵ The similarities are too many and too close for coincidence. Sterling W. Sill, Assistant to the Council of the Twelve Apostles, expressed Mormonism's agreement with pagan/occult mythology when he wrote:

Adam fell, but he fell in the right direction... toward the goal... he fell upward ²⁶

It is astonishing how thoroughly Mormonism has embraced Satan's promise of godhood! In LDS doctrine the ancient lie that destroyed the human race has metamorphosed into the central truth. On the afternoon of June 8, 1873, preaching from the pulpit of the Mormon Tabernacle in Salt Lake City, President Brigham Young declared:

The devil told the truth... I do not blame Mother Eve.

I would not have had her miss eating the forbidden fruit for anything in the world....

They must pass through the same ordeals as the Gods, that they may know good from evil... ²⁷

The belief that Satan told the truth and that Adam and Eve did the right thing in following him instead of God comprises the very heart of Mormonism. This is only one of many ways that Mormon doctrine takes what the Bible says and turns it inside out. However, since Mormonism isn't based upon the Bible, hardly anyone notices the glaring contradictions. Embracing the lie is not an innocent mistake of theology hidden away in some obscure teaching. It is loudly trumpeted by the Mormon General Authorities again and again. Former President Joseph Fielding Smith stated it in these words:

The fall of man came as a blessing in disguise.... I never speak of the part Eve took in this fall as a sin, nor do I accuse Adam of a sin....

We can hardly look upon anything resulting in such benefits as being a sin... ²⁸

It seems unbelievable that the highest authorities of the Mormon Church would not only praise Adam and Eve for disobeying God by eating the forbidden fruit, but would base Mormonism upon the "truth" with which the Devil seduced Eve! The Bible makes it crystal clear that Adam's sin brought banishment from the Garden and death upon the entire human race, necessitating the eventual death of Jesus Christ upon the cross in payment of sin's penalty. Yet no Mormon would be concerned about such obvious and serious contradictions between Mormonism and the Bible, because Mormon doctrine and practice is not based upon the Bible or even the Book of Mormon. It is based instead upon whatever the Prophet who happens to be alive at the time declares to be the "truth" that everyone must believe.

Having accepted the fall of man as necessary and beneficial, both Mormonism and paganism honor the lie that seduced Eve and avidly pursue the "godhood" which the Serpent promised. The central purpose in occultism is to achieve mastery of various psychospiritual techniques (meditation, Yoga, formulas, rituals, mediumship, etc.) that lead to "realization" of the godhood that the Serpent promised. Mormonism has its own formula, but it is basically derived from the same ancient Luciferian pagan traditions. Again, as we just remarked a page earlier, the rituals and formulas for the deepest secrets of Mormonism are given their reason for existence by Lucifer himself at the start of the LDS Temple ritual... that we may be gods and goddesses.

The Mormon path to godhood involves secret rituals introduced by Joseph Smith that must be performed repeatedly in the Mormon Temple. This is the very heart of Mormonism; yet no one is allowed to know what it involves until he has committed himself blindly to it. In his interview in the film The God Makers, Dr. Harold Goodman, former Brigham Young University professor and then President of the Mormon Mission in England, declared:

As one of our great prophets and President of the Church has indicated, "As man is, God once was; and as God is, man may become."

So you can see why the Temple is so important to the LDS [man]: because if he is worthy to go into the Temple and there receive the sacred ordinances and covenants and keep them, he can eventually grow into becoming a god himself.

Mormonism, Mythology, and Evolution

No one explained better than early Apostle Orson Pratt Mormonism's teaching about the preexistence of humans as eternal, uncreated intelligences that have gone through an endless cosmic evolutionary process. The terms he used left no doubt concerning the intimate relationship between Mormon doctrine and pagan mythology's ancient occult traditions. Pratt's explanation is still foundational to the most basic Mormon beliefs. The Mormon variation on Hinduism's doctrines of karma and reincarnation involves the transmigration of uncreated intelligences that existed from eternity in the form of "particles of spirit" composed of the "same materials of which our spirits are composed...." Apostle Pratt explained:

A transmigration of the same particles of spirits from a lower to a higher organization is demonstrated... growing out of the earth in the shape of grass, herbs and trees.... these vegetables become food for celestial animals and these same particles... [move up to] form the spirits of animals.

Here then is apparently a transmigration of the same particles of spirit from an inferior to a superior organization....

Who shall set any bounds to this upward tendency of spirit... who shall say that it will not progress until it shall gain the very summit of perfection? ²⁹

There is a clear relationship between this Mormon doctrine of preexistence and the theory of evolution, which also has existed in various forms in paganism since the beginning of time. When modern science in the early nineteenth century began seriously to seek fossil evidence to substantiate the myth of evolution, it was one of the first indications that science was at last returning full circle to its ancient occult roots. The attempt to ascend the scale of cosmic evolution through one's own efforts by achieving higher states of consciousness and the dream of a quantum leap to godhood are as old as occultism itself. One of the foremost experts in occultism, Manly P. Hall, has said:

The occultists of the ancient world had a most remarkable understanding of the principle of evolution. They recognized all life as being in various stages of becoming. They believed that grains of sand were in the process of becoming human....

The ancients... maintained that the universe was a great [living] organism not unlike the human body, and that every phase and function of the Universal Body had a correspondence in man....

Greek mystics believed that the spiritual nature of man descended into material existence from the Milky Way-the seed ground of souls-through one of the twelve gates of the great zodiacal band. ³⁰

The mythologies of almost every culture, along with the occult traditions preserved around the world by numerous secret societies, from Greece and Rome to Africa and the South Pacific, embellished the core of evolutionary doctrine with wondrous tales of a multiplicity of gods, all of whom had once been mere men and had earned their right to godhood. Here again, Mormonism faithfully follows this ancient tradition. Apostle Pratt wrote,

If we should take a million of worlds like this and number their particles, we should find that there are more gods than there are particles of matter in those worlds. The Gods who dwell in the heaven have been... exalted also, from fallen men to Celestial Gods to inhabit their Heaven forever

This has been the consistent teaching of Mormonism since Prophet Smith first publicly proclaimed it more than 150 years ago; and it is the very essence of Mormonism today. In 1974, former Mormon President Spencer W. Kimball declared:

In each of us is the potentiality to become a God-pure, holy, true, influential, powerful, independent of earthly forces.... We were in the beginning with God....

Man can transform himself.... He has in him the seeds of Godhood that can grow. He can lift himself by his very bootstraps.³²

In Mormonism, contradictions and surprises abound. Transforming oneself into a god turns out to be rather more complicated than former President Kimball made it sound. Somehow the "seeds of godhood" that are supposed to be in every human by virtue of being a literal son or daughter of the god of this earth just don't "grow" without considerable time being spent in secret Mormon Temple rituals. And in spite of Kimball's statement that any man "can lift himself [into godhood] by his very bootstraps," the fine print says it can't be done alone, but only in partnership with a spouse to whom one has been married in the Temple "for eternity." This is discouraging for dedicated bachelors, though not nearly as much so as the declarations by Joseph Smith and Brigham Young that only polygamists could become gods.¹

Kimball has emphasized that no one becomes a god without a special Temple marriage for eternity, no matter how valiantly he pulls on his bootstraps. Says Kimball: "Only through celestial marriage can one find the strait way, the narrow path. Eternal life cannot be had in any other way. The Lord was very specific and very definite in the matter of marriage."² Of course, the "Lord" never said anything of the kind in either the Bible or the Book of Mormon; this was a "revelation" that Joseph Smith received from the Lord of Kolob, the "Heavenly Father" of Mormon preexistence. When asked about it, Jesus declared that marriage is only for earth, and not for heaven.³ Nevertheless, the Mormon is obligated to believe whatever Mormonism's Prophet, Seer, and Revelator living at the time says, no matter if it contradicts the Bible or even Joseph Smith. On camera, Dr. Harold Goodman, LDS Mission President in England at the time, said this about eternal marriage:

... With our intellect and with our discipline... we can continually grow and develop and become a god if we have received in the house of the Lord the sacred ordinances as man and wife.

This [achieving godhood] has to be done by companions. It is not an individual pursuit.

The Strange Fruits of Eternal Marriage

Strangely enough, it is the doctrine of eternal marriage itself that is causing so many divorces among Mormons. Achieving the coveted godhood is the consuming goal for every Latter-day Saint. Since this can't be accomplished alone, but only with a marriage partner, any zealous Mormon whose spouse's interest in becoming a god or goddess wanes must get divorced so that another "eternal marriage" can be performed in the Temple with someone who is willing to do whatever is necessary to reach this goal. Jolene described the heartbreaking tragedy of her divorce:

He was raised a Christian and I was raised a Mormon. We had a beautiful relationship and two small children; but it always came back to Mormonism, and the fact that I had to convert him....

After two-and-one-half years of trying very hard, it was clear that I would never be able to persuade him.

I loved my husband Greg very much... but I couldn't give up my goal of Temple marriage. I went through a very emotional time of inner turmoil.

Greg and I both cried and cried during those months of struggle... but the lure of a Temple marriage and the godhood it promised helped me block out my love for him.

My family was happy with my decision. They were very strong Mormons and convinced me that my love for the Church could overpower my love for my husband.

I went to my bishop and he advised me that it would be best to get a divorce....

Greg considered the ambition to become a god both an impossible, ridiculous dream and an affront to the one true God. As much as he loved Jolene, there was no way he could pretend to believe that anything as obviously pagan as Mormonism was really Christian, much less join Jolene's absurd grasping after godhood. The destruction of his family, in spite of the love they had for each other, seemed like a nightmare. As Greg relates:

Jolene came to me and said she wanted a divorce. She said that either I drove her to her mother's or she would walk, but she was leaving.

So I took my wife, seven months pregnant at the time, and my little boy, and drove them to her parents' home. It was almost more than I could do to leave them there.

As I drove away, weeping convulsively, and praying to God that somehow in His mercy he would bring us back together again, I struggled to comprehend the incredible contradiction.

Here was a Church that boasts of the family togetherness it stands for... and yet it was this Church that had destroyed our marriage!

Born in Germany, where she was raised in a Christian home, when Erica moved to Utah, she thought the Mormons were Christians. That was what they claimed to be. It was too late to escape tragedy when she discovered the truth. Erica is a beautiful and talented singer. The Mormon Church, whenever possible, keeps its members so busy that they have no time to think for themselves. At first Erica felt like a celebrity, singing all over Utah, sometimes with some of the Osmond family:

I met and fell in love with a wonderful Mormon man, convinced he was a Christian. I didn't know Mormon beliefs... but my new Mormon friends accepted me and literally loved me into their Church.

After we were married and I was in the Church, I began to realize that Mormonism was entirely different from Christianity.

They have a different God, a different Jesus... in fact, almost every Mormon belief is very different from what the Bible teaches. I was shocked!

We did have a wonderful marriage. In fact, everyone thought we had the perfect marriage. My husband and I were very compatible. We had the same interests and we had a wonderful life together.

Wanting to be obedient and respect his religious beliefs, I continued to go with him to the Mormon Church, even though I felt an uneasiness there and an emptiness.

I even went to the Temple with my husband to prepare for our sealing for eternity. That was too much. I couldn't believe what went on in there. I hadn't thought that Christians would do such things. I was so horrified that I told my husband I would never go back in there again.

As I began to understand things better, I realized that I was standing in the way of his becoming a god. This made me feel so sorry for him that I could hardly bear it.

Finally he asked me, "Why don't you leave the Mormon Church?"

"Do you really mean it?" I replied, surprised he would even suggest it.

"Yes, I wish you would!" he insisted.

So I had my name removed from the Church roles.

As soon as I did that, he divorced me so he could pursue his goal of godhood.

Horror Stories-Unbelievable But True

In the film The God Makers, Brian Grant, LDS Publications Director for Great Britain, assures us that a Mormon Bishop would never counsel couples to divorce except in extreme cases. Critics of the film have pointed out that many Mormons have nonmember spouses and their marriages seem to be happy. That is true. However, as soon as the nonmember spouse becomes a Christian, the relationship is almost always doomed, in spite of the fact that Mormons claim to be Christians. The evidence for this seeming paradox is overwhelming.

Many of those who have experienced the breakup of their families because of the doctrine of eternal marriage are still afraid to have us use their real names. There is "Scott," whose unforgivable mistake was to become a born-again Christian. Although he had never become a Mormon, the marriage had gone well. With no conviction of his own, Scott had allowed his wife to raise their son in the LDS Church. After becoming a Christian, Scott tried to share with his wife and son the joy and wonder of knowing Jesus Christ personally as Savior and Lord, and the good news that they could receive eternal life as a free gift of God's grace. There had been no problem while Scott was an agnostic; but when he became a Christian, his Mormon wife began to talk of divorce. One sad night he came home to an empty house. His wife, son, and furniture had all disappeared, with the help of zealous Church leaders. It took several years of prayer, frustration, and mounting legal fees to find his son in Utah.

"Steven" also came home one day to an empty house. His Mormon wife and two children had vanished with the help of Church members. That was over 20 years ago. He hasn't seen them since. All he has left is one faded picture of his little son, who would now be 28.

"Bill's" wife became a Mormon after they had been happily married for years and had several children. When he wouldn't convert to Mormonism, the local LDS leaders assisted "Diane" in divorcing and relocating in Utah, where she was quickly married to a "righteous" LDS widower. When attempts by both the husband and Diane's family were made to see the missing children, the LDS family disappeared to Alaska.

"Chuck" was a typical Mormon with a gang of children and a busy wife. The whole family was enthusiastic and active in the Mormon Church. Then he discovered that there was a group of Christian men where he worked, who met weekly for Bible study. Joining in, he soon discovered that the Bible disagreed with almost everything the Mormon Church had told him was true Christianity. One day Chuck opened his heart and received as his personal Lord and Savior the Jesus of the Bible, who was definitely not the Jesus of Mormonism. Everyone noticed the change after Chuck was born again. The Bishop overseeing his local chapel demanded that Chuck sign an agreement not to listen to Christian radio programs, not to attend the Bible study or meet with Christians, and not to read his Bible outside Mormon gatherings. When Chuck refused, the local Mormon Elders came one day when he was at work and emptied the house of everything, taking furniture along with his wife and children. Of course, she divorced him in order to remarry a worthy Mormon working his way to godhood. In the beginning of the film, the actor standing in for him expresses Chuck's thoughts:

I think the worst thing for me has been the way they turned my own beautiful children against me....

You know, the brainwashing techniques of this organization are incredibly effective!

It Sounds Like Science Fiction

It was hundreds of tragic stories like these, coming by letter and phone from all over the world, that motivated Ed Decker and Dick Baer to consult a leading Los Angeles law firm about filing a class-action suit on behalf of the victims. Having suffered through similar experiences themselves, Ed and Dick had some understanding of the heartache involved. Ed tells the lawyers:

There is no doubt that my motivation in all of this stems partly back from my own personal experience.

I look back on my own life, seeing a Bishop counsel me to divorce my wife, being separated from my five children, whom I raised in the Mormon Church, and spending all these years just trying to reestablish those relationships....

Dick and Ed didn't know the law, but were confident that somewhere within the American legal system there had to be a remedy for those who had suffered so much. It was extremely difficult, however, for them to get the attorneys to believe what was happening, notwithstanding the mountains of evidence. The lawyers found it too much to believe that intelligent, educated people in the space-age 1980's could really be serious about attaining godhood.

"Gods and goddesses... it sounds like Von Daniken [Chariots of the Gods] or science fiction," remarked the younger attorney with an uncomfortable laugh. From the twinkle in his eyes and the tone of his voice, it was apparent that he was having difficulty taking these two ex-Mormons seriously. After giving it further thought, he added with a resigned sigh, "Gods and goddesses just won't fly in the jury room, gentlemen. Juries feel a responsibility to be skeptical. You need to feed them information that has a taste of truth to it. And what you're telling us... I really don't think they're going to swallow it, do you?"

Ed and Dick were in for a long day. As difficult as it was to get the attorneys to take the Mormon goal of godhood seriously, it was no easier to convince them that brainwashing was involved. The Mormon Church has not only brainwashed its own members, but almost everyone else into viewing the Church as just another middle-class fundamentalist Christian denomination. Yet in actuality Mormons never refer to themselves as Christians but take pride in using the term "Saints," believing themselves to be far superior in enlightenment, truth, and knowledge to those Christians lost in deep apostasy.

Joseph Smith, Foundation of the Mormon Church

It's not too hard to understand that Mormons would be willing to surrender their minds to Church leaders in exchange for the coveted prize of godhood. This is why the Mormon dare not flinch in his loyalty to the Mormon Church, its founder Joseph Smith, and his successors who now control it.

Jesus never offered godhood to anyone. Instead, He called His disciples to deny self and take up the cross to follow Him.⁴ No wonder Joseph Smith is more popular among Mormons than Jesus Christ Himself.

Many former Mormons tell how strange it now seems that for years they never noticed that the testimonials in the regular "Testimony Meetings" are always about the Mormon Church and Joseph Smith; almost never is there even a mention of Jesus Christ, except as part of the name of their Church. As it is with every ordinary Mormon, so it is with famous Mormons, such as the Osmonds. Their published "testimonial" is not about Jesus Christ, but is all about their Church. And that Church is founded entirely upon Joseph Smith's claim that he is the Prophet through whom god-men chose to "restore" true Christianity to planet Earth. Mormonism rests upon the "revelations" which Smith allegedly received from visiting humanoid space travelers from "Kolob."

In spite of the name of Jesus Christ being on the Church letterhead, it is to Joseph Smith that the Mormons look for their redemption. He, not Jesus, holds the key to the eternal destiny of every person now upon earth. Former Mormon President Joseph Fielding Smith made that clear when he wrote:

[There is] no salvation without accepting Joseph Smith. If Joseph Smith was verily a prophet, and if he told the truth when he said that he stood in the presence of angels sent from the Lord, and obtained the keys of authority, and the commandment to organize the Church of Jesus Christ once again upon the earth, then this knowledge is of the most vital importance to the entire world.

No man can reject that testimony without incurring the most dreadful consequences, for he cannot enter the kingdom of God.⁵

It is therefore not surprising that the Mormons' praise and testimony centers upon Joseph Smith and the Church he founded. Not only are Mormons taught that without Joseph Smith's approval no one can enter heaven, but also that Joseph Smith will be in charge on this earth once again "dictating plans and calling forth his brethren..."⁶

In the Melchizedek Priesthood manual for 1984, titled Come Unto Christ (see pages 126-32), it was really Joseph who the members were to come unto:

If we get our salvation, we shall have to pass by him [Joseph Smith]; if we enter our glory, it will be through the authority that he has received. We cannot get around him.

Joseph Fielding Smith was only affirming what Brigham Young, second President of the Mormon Church and Joseph Smith's successor, had earlier declared:

... No man or woman in this dispensation will ever enter into the Celestial Kingdom of God without the consent of Joseph Smith.

From the day that the priesthood was taken from the earth to the winding-up scene of all things, every man and woman must have the certificate of Joseph Smith as a passport to their entrance into the mansion above where God and Christ are-I with you and you with me.

I cannot go there without his consent. He holds the keys to rule in the spirit world and He rules there triumphantly, for he gained full power and a glorious victory over the power of Satan while he was yet in the flesh.⁷

The Christian praises God and testifies to his faith in Jesus Christ, but the Mormon praises Joseph Smith, who sits among the gods, his sacrificial blood to "plead our cause" above. This is the message of several popular Mormon hymns, which offer the glory and honor to Joseph Smith that the Bible says belongs only to God. One of the favorites includes the following lines:

Praise to the man who communed with Jehovah! Honored and blest be his ever great name! Great is his glory and endless his priesthood. Earth must atone for the blood of that man. Hail to the Prophet, ascended to heaven! Mingling with Gods, he can plan for his brethren; Death cannot conquer the hero again.... Long shall his blood which was shed by assassins Plead unto heaven while the earth lauds his fame."⁸

In the same hymnal, in the hymn "Joseph the Seer" he is given the status of savior:

He pleads their cause in the courts above... He died, he died for those he loved... He reigns, he reigns in the realms above... Unchanged in death with a Saviour's love, he pleads their cause in the courts above... The Saints, the Saints, his only pride, for them he lived, for them he died.

The Living Oracles

Next to the Temple in Salt Lake City is the fabulous Tabernacle, home of the world-renowned Mormon Tabernacle Choir. Twice each year, from all over the world, Mormons stream in through the gates of Temple Square and hurry to their seats inside their beloved Tabernacle for the crowded, exciting sessions of another General Conference. With eager anticipation they look forward to hearing something new and inspiring about the kingdom, something they may be able to share in reverent awe as firsthand witnesses. For it is here that the top echelon of the Mormon hierarchy, known as the General Authorities, regularly deliver revelations from their "God" to his "chosen people." President

Harold B.Lee confirmed the eternal significance of the LDS General Conference when he declared during the general session on April 8, 1973:

If you want to know what the Lord has for this people at the present time, I would admonish you to get and read the discourses that have been delivered at this conference; for what these Brethren have spoken by the power of the Holy Ghost is the Mind of the Lord, the Will of the Lord, the Voice of the Lord, and the Power of God unto Salvation.⁹

President Joseph Fielding Smith made it clear that "at every General Conference of the Church" the speakers are giving forth Scripture that is equal to anything in the Book of Mormon or the Bible. "It is just as much Scripture as anything you will find in any of... the standard works of the Church."¹⁰ These men at the top of the Mormon Church are not ordinary religious leaders exhorting and teaching from the Mormon scriptures. They are the Living Oracles of Mormonism, the First Presidency and the Apostles of God, affectionately referred to by the masses as The Brethren. The eternal destiny of every listener depends upon absolute obedience to what these men proclaim. Of course, the people "may accept or reject what the Lord offers to them." However, "Acceptance brings salvation; rejection brings damnation."¹¹ President Heber C.Kimball made it crystal clear that the obedience required is blind and unreasoning, when he said in an address to the Priesthood:

... Learn to do as you are told, both old and young; learn to do as you are told for the future....

If you are told by your leader to do a thing, do it. None of your business whether it is right or wrong.¹²

Speaking before the student body of Brigham Young University at a BYU devotional held at the Marriott Center assembly hall on February 26, 1980, and broadcast live on station KBYU-FM, President Ezra Taft Benson, who briefly succeeded President Spencer W.Kimball as Prophet of the Church, made it clear again that the "Living Oracles" wield absolute authority over every faithful Mormon: "Keep your eye on the President of the Church. If he ever tells you to do anything, and it is wrong, and you do it, the Lord will bless you for it." Titled "Follow the Prophet," his address with its 14 points emphasized that the utterances of the President of the Church, who is Prophet, Seer, and Revelator, take precedence over all else, including the Bible and Book of Mormon and whatever past Prophets, even Joseph Smith, may have said. As evidence that this has long been the official position of the Mormon Church, Benson said:

Brigham Young took the stand and took the Bible, the Book of Mormon and the Doctrine and Covenants and laid them down. Brother Brigham said:

"When compared with the Living Oracles, those books are nothing, to me; those books do not convey the word of God direct to us now, as do the words of a Prophet or a man bearing the Holy Priesthood in our day and generation.

"I would rather have the Living Oracles than all the writing in these books."

Brother Joseph said to the congregation, "Brother Brigham has told you the word of the Lord, and he has told you the truth."¹³

Christians consider the Bible to be the final authority in everything. Even among Christian groups that believe in prophecy for today, it is recognized that God does not contradict Himself, so anything that purports to be a "revelation" from God must be in harmony with what genuine prophets in the past have said under inspiration of the Holy Spirit in the Bible. Concerning those who claim to be speaking for God, the great Hebrew prophet Isaiah gave this warning:

To the law and to the testimony: if they speak not according to this word, it is because there is not light in them.¹⁴

The Mormons, however, are unwilling to apply this standard test to their Prophets. The Mormon "God" is free to contradict himself; and the Latterday Saints have been brainwashed to accept this as quite normal. For example, at a Brigham Young University fireside meeting on May 5, 1974, when Elder S.Dilworth Young, an LDS General Authority (one of the Living Oracles), was asked to define modern revelation, he responded:

Modern Revelation is what President Joseph Smith said, unless President Spencer W.Kimball says differently.¹⁵

Joseph Smith and his successors have stacked the deck so that not even the Bible can call them into question. Mormons are taught to parrot the LDS Eighth Article: "We believe the Bible to be the Word of God as far as it is translated correctly." How does one know where it is not "translated correctly"? By very definition, that is wherever the Bible conflicts with Mormon doctrine (which is almost everywhere), in which case the latter is followed. This places Mormons at the complete mercy of The Brethren who rule them. It is not to the written Scriptures that these men point for authority, but to themselves as the sole representatives and spokesmen for their God. They are the God-speakers, whose utterances must be accepted as the latest words of God Himself, even though contradictory to what "God" supposedly said yesterday. President Wilford

Woodruff explained that "the Bible, the Book of Mormon and Doctrine and Covenants... would scarcely be sufficient to guide us for 24 hours.... We are to be guided by the Living Oracles."¹⁶ During the April 1961 General Conference, President Marion G. Romney declared:

This Church is the literal Kingdom of God in the earth. We did not come to argue, to jockey for position, to compromise differences and establish policies.

We came here to hear and learn the Word of God as he has and does now reveal it through his appointed servants, and to take it back and teach it to our people.¹⁷

If you look at this in context, to the member there is nothing to test Mormonism against except itself. And any questioning is considered a sign of weakness, a lack of testimony that will quickly separate the inquirer from the fellowship of those who hold the keys to truth and heaven. None but the most desperate are willing to take the chance.

Joseph the Greatest

Here again, in the absolute authority which the "Living Oracles" wield, Mormonism betrays yet another connection with paganism. Although the God of the Judeo-Christian Bible has always spoken through chosen prophets, the moral responsibility of every individual is always kept intact. A prophet is to be obeyed if and only if his message 1) fits into and agrees with what proven prophets of God have previously said, and 2) does not contradict God's witness in the individual conscience. In paganism/occultism, however, the "revelations" of the spirit medium, fortune-teller, medicine man, witch doctor, shaman, Living Master, or guru are independent of and thus may contradict both conscience and other prophets.

One of the marks of pagan cults is the fear and bondage which absolute authority and contradictory revelation breed. The spiritist is elated or in deep depression, depending upon what the "spirits" have most recently uttered through the medium; the believer in astrology is at the mercy of the stars and planets and those who interpret them; millions of secretaries, businesspeople, scientists, teachers, and politicians base life's decisions upon which way the tarot cards or yarrow sticks in I Ching have just fallen. In like manner, the faithful Mormon must blindly follow the latest dictates of The Brethren.

In keeping with thousands of years of pagan tradition, Joseph Smith established himself as the sole authority over all those who were willing to let him interpret "truth and the will of God" for them. Mormons obtain a "testimony," not that Jesus Christ is their personal Savior and Lord, but that Joseph Smith was a true Prophet of God and that the Mormon Church is the only true Church upon the earth. This Mormon "testimony" is not based upon reason, conscience, or agreement with the Bible, but upon a subjective feeling called the "burning in the bosom." When anyone accepts this feeling as the evidence of authenticity, he automatically thereafter accepts whatever Joseph Smith or his successors said or say.¹⁸ On this basis, Joseph Smith was able to convince his faithful followers that he was even greater than Jesus Christ. He said:

I have more to boast of than ever any man had. I am the only man that has ever been able to keep a whole church together since the days of Adam. A large majority of the whole have stood by me.

Neither Paul, John, Peter, nor Jesus ever did it. I boast that no man ever did such a work as I!

The followers of Jesus ran away from Him; but the Latter-day Saints never ran away from me yet.¹⁹

It is upon this astonishing boast that Mormonism was founded and either stands or falls today. Every faithful Mormon must believe that the work which Jesus established failed and had to be "restored" in the last days through Joseph Smith, whose work will not fail. Joseph, not Jesus, holds the "keys" to the "last dispensation." It is this Church, founded by Joseph Smith, that will continue in the fullness of the exclusive authority he possessed until the millennial reign of Christ. The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints will allegedly be the mechanism through which Christ, in apparent partnership with Joseph Smith, will govern the world during His 1000-year reign. The LDS people must believe that Mormonism is the kingdom of God, and that it is through the administration of this kingdom "restored" under the authority of Joseph Smith that every righteous Mormon who attains perfection will be exalted to godhood.

The Mormon Path to Godhood

As it was with Jolene and Janet when they were still part of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, so today the fond hope and ambition of every "righteous" Mormon is to become a god or goddess ruling over a new planet Earth. On each of these new earths there will be another Adam and Eve, another Lucifer and Jesus (who are spirit brothers), another fall, another redemption, another round in this process of god-making that has been going on from eternity past and will never end. Mormonism is but one more variation of an ancient pagan theme, another mythology faithfully echoing thousands of years of occult tradition that has preserved this ancient myth since it was first recited to Eve.

Within pagan traditions down through the centuries, many secret rites have been developed as the means of achieving godhood. So it is in Mormonism. For Latter-day Saints to realize this fantastic goal, there are a great many complex rules and secret rituals that are faithful to the core of pagan traditions. Among the most important are secret ceremonies in the Mormon Temples. These will be described in detail later.

The Mormon path to godhood is administered by the First Presidency and Apostles of God-The Brethren-who sit at the top of an elaborate Mormon hierarchy of power and wealth. No Mormon can become a god without complete and unquestioning submission to these leaders. This has been proclaimed again and again, such as when President Brigham Young leaned over the pulpit not long after the Tabernacle had been completed, and boasted:

I know just as well what to teach this people and just what to say to them and what to do in order to bring them into the Celestial Kingdom as I know the road to my office....

I have never preached a sermon and sent it out to the children of men that they may not call Scripture....

The people have the oracles of God continually.²⁰

The Ward teachers' (now called home teachers) lesson for June 1945 dealt with the subject "Sustaining the General Authorities of the Church." It explained that while no one is forced to obey the authorities, to disobey brings damnation. This lesson, which was taught in Mormon homes around the world by the home teachers, declared:

Any Latter-day Saint who denounces or opposes, whether actively or otherwise, any plan or doctrine advocated by the "prophets, seers and revelators" of the Church is cultivating the spirit of apostasy. One cannot speak evil of the Lord's anointed and retain the Holy Spirit in his heart.

It should be remembered that Lucifer has a very cunning way of convincing unsuspecting souls that the General Authorities of the Church are as likely to be wrong as they are right.... He wins a great victory when he can get members of the Church to speak against their leaders and to do their own thinking. What cunning!

When our leaders speak, the thinking has been done. When they propose a plan, it is God's plan. When they point the way, there is no other which is safe. When they give direction, it should mark the end of controversy.

God works in no other way. To think otherwise, without immediate repentance, may cost one his faith, may destroy his testimony, and leave him a stranger to the kingdom of God.²¹

There are many gurus who, like the Mormon leaders, demand total submission and blind obedience from their followers, and offer godhood in exchange. In Mormonism it is The Brethren who occupy this position, holding absolute control over the lives of the faithful. They are accountable to no one but themselves, and everyone else is accountable to them. No one among the nearly ten million Mormons who hopes to become a god dares question the authority of The Brethren... for they are The God Makers.

THE MORMON DILEMMA

At the cost of about 12 million dollars (small change for a Church with annual income of about $6 billion and $30 billion in assets),¹ the Mormon Church ran a series of advertisements in the Reader's Digest that presented a picture of Mormons as almost angelic in perfection. The portrayal of "have-it-all-together" families comprising a uniformly happy, godly, and triumphant membership living ideal lives was more than misleading. The hidden truth about Mormons and what Mormonism really represents is a far cry from what one sees in magazine ads and television commercials or at the Visitor's Center at Salt Lake City's Temple Square.

Jerald and Sandra Tanner are former Mormons who have established an international reputation for their research into early Mormon writings. Based in Salt Lake City, for more than 30 years they have been searching out, reproducing, and publishing historic documents that Mormon leaders have hidden in a desperate effort to suppress the truth about Mormonism's past. The Tanners' work has demonstrated beyond any reasonable doubt that an astonishing number of extremely embarrassing skeletons are buried in the closet of Mormon history. Jerald and Sandra have been largely responsible for bringing international attention to the fact that the Mormon Church has deliberately hidden the diaries of its early Church leaders and has engaged in an elaborate cover-up of its history that has even included the extensive alteration of its early publications. Sandra Tanner declares:

Mormon leaders are deliberately keeping from Church members the true history of their religion, because they know that the members would have a hard time believing that it is from God if they saw how it really was all put together.

It's obvious that God's hand couldn't be in it, because the leaders have had to go back and rework, rewrite, cover up, change, delete, and add all the way through on all their books. Everything has been reworked.

They suppress their diaries, because these things show the confusion and the man-made nature of the theology and the

I believe that some of the strongest "anti-Mormon" literature, if you want to call it that, is some of the early publications of the Church.

If the average Mormon were able to look at these things, it would destroy his "testimony."

We will explore the murky depths of Mormonism's past in due time. First of all, however, there are many skeletons in the closet of the present that need to be brought out into the open in the interest of a truth ful evaluation of this explosively growing organization that wields an influence far out of proportion to its size.

'All Is Well! All Is Well!'

These words from the popular Mormon hymn "Come, Come Ye Saints" represent an attitude that is created and nourished in Mormons by what can only be described as a brainwashing process par excellence. It is essential not only to live a "righteous" life to achieve godhood, but equally necessary to keep a positive attitude in representing Mormonism to outsiders. At all cost, non-Mormons must see Latter-day Saints for what Joseph Smith said they are: members of the only true Church on earth, who live holy and pure lives that cause them to stand out in an otherwise-corrupt world. Blemishes must be covered over and truth must be suppressed in the interest of spreading the "restored gospel." When one is convinced that he is really a god-in-embryo, denial of human weaknesses becomes an unconscious habit. It is extremely difficult for a person who is building his future godhood upon his own worthiness to admit that he is a lost sinner, no matter how obvious that is to other people.

Something radical and hard-to-describe takes place in one's self-image when he believes he is destined to become a god and rule over an entire universe that he will someday manufacture out of an apparently inexhaustible storehouse of self-existent matter and intelligence. It is no less transforming to the Mormon woman to believe that she may eventually become one of the many goddess wives of a new "god." In this exalted motherhood she will be privileged to bear millions and perhaps billions of her god-husband's "spirit babies," who will eventually gain bodies to people the new earths that he will busy himself planning and forming. Whether in a male or a female body, just to believe that one has always existed as an eternally progressing uncreated intelligence brings an awesome sense of one's own proud heritage and infinite potential.

A large percentage of Mormons have been lifetime members. Many come from families with four and five generations of Mormon tradition behind them. To the LDS, their proud Mormon heritage is as much a way of life as it is a religion. As the very foundation of everything they think and do, as well as the only permanent reality in a changing world, their Mormon faith molds their character, determines their social outlook and attitudes, gives them their prejudices, and to a remarkable extent insulates them from the influence of the world around them. Truth is synonymous with the teachings of The Brethren guiding the Church; error is all else. There is an ironclad understanding that no science or knowledge of any kind exists that could call into question the dogmas of the only true Church. Its President is the very oracle of God; when he speaks, God has spoken. Work and play, family activities, and life itself all center in and revolve around the Church. Even those who have become inactive, called "Jack Mormons," are still bound to Mormonism as though it were bred into their very blood.

The twelfth child in a family of six boys and six girls, Gwen Meyer is an example of how deep and influential Mormon roots can be. Her mother was the fifteenth child of a woman in a polygamous marriage. Her grandfather was one of the original pioneers that came to Utah. His wife, who was 30 years younger than he and a convert from Wales, followed in one of the handcart companies. As one of the many former Mormons interviewed for the film, Gwen began on-camera by reminiscing about her youth:

When I was a child, we lived in a town that was nearly all Mormons. I can only think of two families that weren't LDS.

I really felt that people who didn't belong to the Mormon Church were a completely different species... like we would think today of somebody from another planet.

I was very shy and afraid to be around these people.

To the "Gentiles," as the Mormons call the outside world, LDS people proudly and carefully project an image of wholesomeness, industry, and happiness that most people automatically associate with Mormons. There is a built-in feeling of superiority that comes with the name "Latter-day Saint," a subtle arrogance deserving of gods-in-embryo, an urgency to excel in order to gain "exaltation" and prove to the world around them who they really are. For they are the people, the only true Christians, the salt of the earth; and they grow up feeling responsible to do their Mormon heritage proud. In spite of the assurance in that favorite Mormon hymn, however, all is not well in Zion.

A Corrupting Seduction

The proud ambition to be a god turned one of the most beautiful and powerful angels in God's heaven into Satan. It is not surprising, then, that those whom the Serpent seduces by this same selfish dream are corrupted and eventually destroyed by it. Grasping after godhood breeds pride and arrogance, and warps one's thinking in a multitude of subtle ways. Though it sounds godly, the ambition to become a god is merely a "Saintly" expression of the same basic human selfishness that lies at the root of all evil. The devastating effects of this corruption of the will are at work just beneath the seemingly unblemished complexion of the face that Mormonism turns to the outside world. Mormonism's religious self-centeredness produces the same sins that plague secular society.

In 1980 the State of Utah, which is about 70 percent Mormon, ranked thirteenth in child abuse among the 50 states² The Church wields such wide political control and has so often engaged in cover-ups to maintain its shining image that there is reason to suspect many other cases of child abuse that have never become part of the statistics.

"It is contrary to the teachings of the Church to artificially curtail or prevent the birth of children."³ Beyond this official Mormon statement on birth control, LDS couples are encouraged to produce as many children as possible for reasons already explained. Utah's family size is twice the national average⁴ Certainly the pressure to marry young and have large families to provide bodies for the many spirits out there in the premortal state waiting to come to this earth could cause tensions in growing families that would contribute to child abuse and many other conflicts.

The June and July 1983 Utah Holiday magazine carried a two-part series titled "Sexual Politics." Dealing in depth with the frightful crime of sexual child abuse, the authors contended that the involvement of LDS Church officials was often counterproductive to justice. The Church continually sought to protect the male offender if he was a Mormon in good standing.

Sometimes a cover-up is impossible, but even then justice is perverted. For example, Mormon radio host Lloyd Pond, a highly visible spokesperson for the Mormon Church who decried the decay of family values and the evils of sexual abuse on his nationally syndicated radio show, pled guilty to molesting a 14-year-old girl and resigned on November 22, 1996.

The terrible details are compounded by the fact that Pond walked out of the court after two counts of first-degree forcible sodomy were amended to one count of second-degree forcible sexual abuse. He was given adult probation and parole and then released on his own recognizance. Attorneys explained his behavior as a form of midlife crisis. Once again, an LDS "Elder" walked away from sexual child abuse in Utah.

Less Than Candid

Elder Price, a retired Air Force colonel serving with his wife as a missionary guide to the Hawaii Temple, was less than candid in explaining the goals of Mormonism to our film crew: "We believe that we are here to work out our salvation," he told us, "to learn, to grow, to develop the talents that God has given us. And if we are faithful and diligent in doing these things, then we will receive the appropriate reward."

When asked to explain the "appropriate reward" for ultimate achievement in the Mormon Church, he still was evasive: "The Bible tells us that we are to become perfect, even as the Father in heaven is perfect. That's what we're working toward-to become more Christlike in everything that we do."

The Bible doesn't tell us to become perfect, but to be perfect, which would indicate that whatever this "perfection" is, it can be had immediately and is not something that is eventually attained in a future state. Jesus and His apostles made it clear that the Christian's Christlikeness comes not from developing a potential perfection inherent within himself but from having received Jesus Christ as Savior and Lord into this heart and then allowing Christ to take charge in every area of his life.

When God tells us to be perfect, He isn't demanding that we become God, which is impossible. A perfect man isn't a god any more than a perfect plant or a perfect animal would be. "Perfection" in man is simply being what God expects of us as humans. This is described in the Bible as a "perfect heart"-that attitude which sincerely wants to be all that God wants us to be, and accepts by God's grace the life of Christ and power of the Holy Spirit to accomplish in us what we cannot do ourselves. The Christian life is not a struggle for self-improvement, but the denial of self and a surrender to Jesus Christ that allows Him to live His life in and through us.

For most Mormons, the constant battle to become worthy of godhood is an eternal and hopeless struggle that they never seriously intend to pursue. Knowing that as a consequence they will have to settle for second-class citizenship in heaven, about 70 percent of Mormons have never qualified to enter the Temple to begin the secret rituals that are prerequisite to becoming gods. This is a startling fact that outsiders would never suspect from the less-than-candid image which the Mormon Church presents to the outside world.

An outsider cannot begin to comprehend the depth of despair that Mormons often go through, knowing that their best is always less than perfection. For those few Mormons who do feel worthy to become gods

(and that number makes up a strange minority), a great difficulty comes in knowing that an imperfect wife or husband will not be there in celestial exaltation with them. That fact creates an alienation that pulls the "good one" out of the path of perfection unless he or she divorces the spouse and marries another worthy Mormon to join the quest for godhood.

The Disappointments of Do-It-Yourself Godhood

While the promise that a person can become a god is extremely inspiring to some people at first, the gradual realization that godhood must somehow be earned becomes understandably discouraging. The Bible offers eternal life to everyone who is willing to admit he can't earn it, and accepts it as a free gift of God's grace made possible because Christ paid the full price for our sins through His death upon the cross in our place. In contrast, Mormonism teaches that eternal life is exaltation to godhood and must be earned by the good works of those who thereby prove they are worthy. As Dr. Harold Goodman told us:

The goal of every Latter-day Saint is to be married as a family unit in the house of the Lord and there receive these sacred blessings that will allow us eventually, if we're worthy, to dwell and be in the presence of our heavenly Father.

A person has to be worthy; he has to receive a satisfactory interview from his Bishop and from his Stake President.

That is the only way that we can be with Him [our heavenly Father] to rule and reign with Him. Otherwise, we could not be in His presence.

For the average Mormon, the strain of keeping several thousand commandments in order to prove his worthiness of exaltation to godhood becomes a burden too great to bear. For example, only 50 percent of the approximately ten million Mormons are considered active members by Church standards. According to Church statistics, only half of those who are active have ever been through the LDS Temple ritual,⁵ the most important step in the Mormon plan of "exaltation." Moreover, of those who have made it to that plateau of worthiness, only about half remain worthy enough to continue their secret Temple rituals for the dead that are an essential part of Joseph Smith's Mormon gospel. Even more revealing is the fact that only an inner core of this worthy few actually continue more than briefly to participate in the Temple work that is so necessary for their own righteousness and final exaltation into godhood⁶ frustration of real people who are trapped by loyalty to a "Prophet" whose "restored" gospel eventually proves to be anything but the good news it is supposed to be. A hopeless dilemma confronts the more than 90 percent of Mormons who finally admit-but usually only to themselves in rare moments of honesty regarding their religion-that it is beyond their ability to reach the prescribed level of perfection through righteous obedience to the many laws and ordinances that distinguish Mormonism from Christianity. Afraid to abandon Prophet Smith and the Church he founded, because his endorsement is essential for entrance into heaven, the Mormon finds himself at the same time unable to prove himself worthy of what Mormonism offers. Thus the Mormon dilemma: Outside the Church is no salvation,⁷ yet inside the Church there is no hope either, for no one who is honest with himself could ever pretend to meet its impossible standards of personal righteousness.

These are more than mere statistics. They reflect the heartache and

It is therefore not surprising that Mormonism, in spite of the bright smiles and happy image projected in magazine ads and TV commercials, creates a growing feeling of guilt and frustration that festers just beneath that manicured facade. There are sad and seemingly surprising statistics that dredge up hidden reality and expose it to the light. For example, suicide is the third-highest cause of death in Utah, and teen suicide is consistently above the national average. Wife-beating and child abuse are serious problems. A major portion of clinical psychiatry is devoted to the LDS woman. Half of all Utah births are by teenage mothers; seven out of ten of these births are conceived out of wedlock, and abortion is a serious problem. Recently, in a conversation with a young girl who had just graduated from high school in a small Utah town, we learned that one-third of the girls in her graduating class had been pregnant and unmarried. Salt Lake City has twice as many reported rapes as other cities its size across America.⁸

Mormon Women

In Hinduism, the woman has the opportunity to build up enough good karma to be reincarnated as a man and after that to reach godhood. In Mormonism, however, the woman doesn't have that opportunity. She can never become a god, only a goddess, eternally bearing children as one of many wives to a god-husband. That may be why so many young Mormon women opt for childbearing as their career here and now. A 1978 survey showed that only 30 percent of the women entering Brigham Young University finished, whereas 80 percent of the men completed their four years. After marriage, however, they soon find it necessary to get a job in spite of their growing families and the fact that in Utah during the 1980s the working woman was paid 53.5 cents for every dollar a man earns for the same job.⁹ Utah still has a high incidence of scams and bankruptcies, and one of the lowest per capita incomes of any of the 50 states. So although the Church clearly and emphatically teaches that the Mormon woman's place is in the home, out of apparent necessity more than 50 percent of the women in Utah work outside the home, which is above the national average.¹⁰

The pressure from the Church and Mormon doctrine upon the LDS woman is staggering. Until the recent changes in the LDS Temple ritual, each Mormon woman was required to swear an oath of total obedience to her husband in the Temple. She must be perfect. Each wife who has been through the Temple has a secret name that only her husband and she know. He uses this to call her out of the grave on the day of resurrection; and there seems to be no remedy for her if he purposely or forgetfully fails to do so.

Ed Decker was once a guest on a popular radio talk show in a major city. The phone lines were so jammed with calls from intrigued listeners that the host kept him on for another hour. That ran until a program featuring a busy psychiatrist in that city was to come on the air. He was so interested in the lively call-in discussion that he invited Ed to share his program also. Everything was going smoothly until a particular call caused Ed to turn to his host and ask him about depression among Mormon women.

The reaction was sudden and startling. Silently and swiftly the psychiatrist signaled the technician to cut the microphones and go to a station break. As soon as the mikes were dead, he confided in Ed that it would destroy his large practice if such a subject were discussed. Most of his patients were Mormon women, he explained. By the time the station break was over, Ed had been gently but firmly removed from the broadcast room.

The oppression of Mormon women and the many problems arising as a result don't exist in only a few isolated cases, nor is this something dreamed up by fanatical activists. It's real, alive, and prevalent all over Utah. Articles such as "Loving in Violence-The Betrayal of Battered Wives"¹¹ and "Mormon Women and Depression"¹² have only scratched the surface of problems that the Mormon Church is unwilling to admit and face.

An Exploding Church

In spite of the many problems that Mormonism's pagan doctrines and practices (and dictatorial control over lives and minds) eventually generate, multitudes are being drawn into the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints. For those who haven't yet learned its dark secrets, the Mormon Church with its social and welfare programs and emphasis upon wholesome family living seems an ideal place to make friends and raise a family. And even if the goal of becoming a god or goddess seems a bit farfetched at first, after a few years of brainwashing it begins to make sense to most Mormons, even to some of the very well-educated and sophisticated.

At the time of the publication of this book, the Mormon Church is one of the fastest-growing religious groups in America, as well as one of the wealthiest business corporations. From log cabins to massive skyscrapers, from handcarts to jumbo jets, the LDS Church is now exploding across the globe. It took 117 years for the Mormon Church to reach one million members, 19 years to add a second million to worldwide membership, nine years to add the third million, and a mere five years to add its fourth million. In 1984, it had climbed quickly to a membership of 5.2 million, with the expectation that it would now be doubling in size every ten years.

From 1984 to 1997 the LDS Church grew to approximately ten million members worldwide, the growth of Mormonism in the United States, where this book and the film peeled back the LDS veneer of deceit, is now of less than three percent per year. Obviously we cannot credit all that to this work, but The God Makers book and film were surely a catalyst that launched a strong ex-Mormon movement that swept across the country for an entire decade. Today there are scores of books and films on the subject.

The greatest growth rate of the Church is in those countries where the wholesome image of the missionaries is readily observed and a serious lack of apologetics materials is present. Today, with the Internet crossing every worldwide communications barrier that existed 20 years ago, the documentation to deal with Mormonism is exploding in nations everywhere. Just in May of 1997, Ed's website, <http://www.Saintsalive.com>, had almost 30,000 pages of information downloaded in over 50 countries!

Projections by Rodney Stark, University of Washington sociologist, indicate that "in about 83 years, worldwide Mormon membership should reach 260 million."¹³ To accommodate this phenomenal growth, new Church buildings (Mormons call them chapels) are being constructed at the rate of nearly two each day around the world.

A major factor in this exponential expansion is the vast missionary training program that sustains an international proselytizing campaign built on the motto "Every member a missionary." In actual fact, however, only about 20 percent of the young Mormon men (and even fewer of the young women) ever go on the traditional mission.¹⁴ Yet this produces a formidable missionary force far beyond anything created even by much larger churches, such as the Southern Baptists, who by comparison have 14 million members but only about 7000 missionaries worldwide. In 1983 the LDS Church operated about 190 missions with approximately 28,000 full-time missionaries. Very few of these are supported by the Church, in spite of its vast wealth. All expenses during the "mission" are met by the individual missionary, his family, or other members.

Until recently, each missionary was called to the field for a period of two years. Skyrocketing mission expenses due to inflation placed an increasing load upon the missionary and his family at a time when President Spencer W. Kimball, head of the Mormon Church, was calling for a substantial increase in the missionary force. Consequently, the former two-year mission period had been reduced to 18 months in order to induce more young Mormons to respond. Young ladies, who had formerly been quietly "accepted" in the mission field, are now actively encouraged to seek a mission calling, as are retired couples. In addition to the full-time missionaries, scores of thousands of local Church members are organized as "stake"¹⁵ or part-time missionaries, working at their calling evenings and weekends. Under current Mormon President Gordon B. Hinckley, expansion of missionary effort and financial investment outside the United States has been greatly accelerated, and the missions term moved back to two years.

Mystery of the Missing Missionaries

In spite of the promised glory of godhood and increasing pressure from The Brethren which filters down through the Mormon hierarchy, at first the Church had fewer missionaries proportionately than before the new program. The actual count in 1984 was down to about 26,500 from well over 30,000 a few years earlier.¹⁶

By 1995, however, when the Church established a flat monthly cost that made the experience a lot less difficult for the average Mormon family, the count resurged past 50,000. Yet, even among Mormons, the once-shining image of an army of invincible missionaries has been tarnished by the disillusioning fact that about 25 percent of the missionaries are abandoning their mission before the end of their term.¹⁷ In spite of such a revealing rate of loss, however, the missionary program is a substantial statistical success. The Church estimates that the general conversion rate is seven converts per missionary year,¹⁸ a rate high enough to more than compensate for even the hypothetical loss of every missionary sent out.

A high percentage of returning missionaries enroll at Brigham Young University, which has a student body of 26,000, a second campus in Hawaii, and study centers in such far-flung places as London, Jerusalem, New Zealand, and Samoa. At the entrance to "the Y," as most Mormons call BYU, the visitor is greeted by the slogan "The Glory of God Is Intelligence." As one drives through the campus, the perfectly groomed lawns and equally groomed students create an atmosphere of respectful awe. One walks around the campus speaking and even thinking in a library whisper. There is not so much as a piece of paper out of place. That is the outward image of BYU which the Church cultivates and which it expects its students to represent to the "Gentile" world.

The Pagan Connection Again

As C.S.Lewis and a number of other experts have concluded, there are only two religions in the world: Christianity and Hinduism (paganism).¹⁹ One teaches that we are separated from the one true God by sin, and God became a man to die for our sins; the other declares that men are not separated from God, but that each person has within himself the power to overcome evil and thus to become God or at least a god. Hinduism or paganism embraces and absorbs everything except biblical Christianity, which is its only genuine rival. Although it uses Christian language to disguise its paganism, Mormonism is less Christian than it is Hindu. The basic dilemma faced by every Mormon is a direct result of its Hindu roots. In the Baghavad-Gita, Krishna declares that he comes forth to save the righteous and to condemn the sinners.²⁰ This is just the opposite of the biblical Christ, who came to save sinners.²¹ The great complaint of paganism and all secret occult societies is that whereas one must be "worthy" to join them, Christianity deliberately embraces the unworthy.

Ed was speaking at a church when a local Mormon official stood during question-and-answer time and proclaimed that Ed was doing the Church a service by getting rid of its dead wood, those who could not live up to the standards of the Church. "You are just getting our refuse, our garbage," he shouted. "Who would want them anyway?" Ed answered, "I want them, and so does Jesus." While the church was excited with the answer, it went right over the head of the Mormon official. He had absolutely no concept of grace.

In Mormonism there is a constant struggle to prove one's worthiness. Like Krishna, the Mormon Jesus saves only the righteous. Mormon doctrine declares that without righteousness, there is no forgiveness of sin; and without forgiveness of sin, there is no personal salvation.²² This places the Mormon squarely on the horns of the same dilemma that occupies the pagan in endless rituals that never bring real peace-for it is sinners, obviously, who need salvation. Jesus said, "I came not to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance."²³ In Mormonism, however, sin is overcome by gritting one's teeth and living righteously-a task that the Bible says is impossible: "For there is not a just man upon the earth that doeth good and sinneth not."²⁴

Jesus declared, "None is good, save one, that is, God."²⁵ The Mormon is taught, however, that he can become a god by living up to the standards of perfection and righteousness set forth in the Mormon "restored gospel." Pulling oneself up by one's bootstraps, however, proves as impossible in the spiritual realm as it so obviously is in the physical.

The Tragic Dilemma

Thousands of Mormon families seem among the finest in America. They live entire generations with hardly a visible blemish to tarnish the accepted image of the perfect home life and Church. However, as Ed Decker and Dick Baer became known, a flood of information began pouring in to them as overwhelming evidence that the Mormon Church is full of hurting people who are smiling on the outside but sobbing and dying on the inside. We were not made to become gods. There is only one true God, and beside Him all gods are pretenders who are grasping after godhood but can never reach it. That is why Mormonism simply doesn't work, and why those who struggle to prove their worthiness either develop a hard shell of blind pride or else become so frustrated that they want to give up but cant. So they stay, entangled in the web of deceit set out for them by those same personages of light, those demons of darkness that reached out and laid hold of Joseph Smith 150 years ago.

According to a number of reliable sources, psychiatrists in Salt Lake City and throughout Utah are kept busy working with Mormons who know that Mormonism isn't true and want to get out but can't escape. It isn't easy to leave the Mormon Church, especially in Utah; yet keeping one's real feelings inside for fear of the consequences that would result if the Church found out what one is thinking can become a horrible burden. Mormons are warned against having a personal relationship with Jesus Christ, so they have no one else they can confide in except a psychiatrist. At least doctors won't betray confidences to The Brethren. Mormons sometimes confide in ex-Mormons, knowing they would understand. It is not unusual for Mormons to slip into the home of Jerald and Sandra Tanner in Salt Lake City to share their disillusionment. Sandra told us:

In Utah it's very hard for someone to leave the Church and make it public. There is, first of all, the threat for one's job. He may have a Mormon employer and this could seriously threaten his work position.

Many of the people I see work for the Church itself, and are afraid of losing their positions. Some are afraid of divorce.

I know people in high positions who don't believe Mormonism. I've talked to a Mormon Bishop who told me he didn't believe Mormonism at all.

The motivation for many of them is that Mormonism is a nice way to raise your family. It's the easy road. If you're already here and you're already in it, then why upset things?

This is the tragic dilemma that many Mormons face. It isn't easy to keep up that saintly facade when inside you hate yourself for being a hypocrite. But to tell the truth is so costly that many Mormons find themselves trapped by circumstances and fear. Jim told us:

Recently, the husband in a Mormon family we know began asking me questions.

Then he called one night and said, "I know that what you're saying is true. There's no doubt in my mind. I can't punch any holes in it.

"But I'm scared to death," he added, "that I'm going to lose my wife and children and my business....

"If I let out what I really believe now, what I've discovered... I'll lose it all!"

There are thousands of people like this, and they need help desperately. One of the best things we can do is to show them that the situation is even more tragic than they realize. It isn't just a question of mind control by The Brethren, false prophecies, misrepresentation, and heresy. There is something deeper involved, and understanding that deeper issue is the only thing that compels these hurting people to do what needs to be done.

AN ASTONISHING LEGACY

At the very center of the LDS faith are the Temples with their secret pagan ceremonies. While Mormons believe that the "Prophet" is the link between man and God, the Temples are the link between man and godhood. Only in the Temple can the Mormon gain the secret knowledge and perform the occult rituals that allegedly bridge the chasm from human finiteness to eventual godhood. Strangely enough, these magnificent sanctuaries are used mainly "to redeem the dead"; and they stand as monuments honoring Satan's lie that death is neither real nor final.

God warned Adam and Eve that the penalty for rebellion is death. Mormonism teaches that its reward is godhood. The Bible clearly teaches that death is final, and that those who die have no further chance to be saved: "... It is appointed unto men once to die, but after this the judgment."¹ We learn why this must be so from the story that Jesus told of the rich man who died and went to hades. The tormenting thirst he experienced there as a result of his separation from God was so great that it would have been impossible for him to respond rationally to God's love and the gospel. He was so obsessed with getting out of the horrible place that it was now too late for him to be able to make a decision based solely upon truth.

For those who die without having received Christ as Lord and Savior, it is forever too late to be saved. Jesus said, "If ye believe not that I am he, ye shall die in your sins... [and] whither I go ye cannot come."² Blatantly denying this, Mormonism teaches that, just as the Serpent told Eve, "You wont really die." In Mormonism, those who die aren't really dead but can still communicate with the living and join the Mormon Church beyond the grave.

Mormonism, thus, contradicts not only the Bible but its own scriptures. Another of the great ironies of Mormonism is that their scripture declares just the opposite of this second-chance-after-death doctrine. The Book of Mormon clearly lays this out:

And now, as I said unto you before, as ye have had so many witnesses, therefore, I beseech of you that ye do not procrastinate the day of your repentance until the end; for after this day of life, which is given us to prepare for eternity, behold, if we do not improve our time while in this life, then cometh the night of darkness wherein there can be no labor performed. Ye cannot say, when ye are brought to that awful crisis, that I will repent, that I will return to my God. Nay, ye cannot say this; for that same spirit which doth possess your bodies at the time that ye go out of this life, that same spirit will have power to possess your body in that eternal world.

For behold, if ye have procrastinated the day of your repentance even until death, behold, ye have become subjected to the spirit of the devil, and he doth seal you his; therefore, the Spirit of the Lord hath withdrawn from you, and hath no place in you, and the devil hath all power over you; and this is the final state of the wicked (The Book of Mormon: Alma 34:33-36).

A further irony is found in the fact that very little of Mormonism's peculiar doctrine comes from the Book of Mormon. Most of it comes from additional "revelations" received by Joseph Smith and his successors. These are found in such books as Journal of Discourses, Doctrine and Covenants, Teachings of the Prophet Joseph Smith, and others.

A Church for the Dead

Mormon Temples are among the most beautiful and awe-inspiring buildings in existence. No expense is spared in making each Temple a showplace of beauty and elegance. For most Mormons, the Temple is so sacred that anything said or done within its walls must be of God. What many Mormons themselves don't realize is that most of the Temple rituals are performed for disembodied spirits.

The ordinances practiced in Mormon Temples are of two types: those for the living, and the identical rituals done by proxy for the dead. The latter allegedly enable those who have been waiting in "spirit prison" for the millennium to become Temple Mormons. If the departed spirits choose to accept the proxy rituals, they are then allowed (contrary to the Book of Mormon) to go to the place called "Paradise," the home of all worthy Mormons who have died. The central importance of these ceremonies in Mormonism is emphasized in LDS scriptures. For example:

And now, my dearly beloved brethren and sisters, let me assure you that these are principles in relation to the dead and the living that cannot be lightly passed over, as pertaining to our salvation.

For their [the dead's] salvation is necessary and essential to our [the living's] salvation....³

Although the Bible specifically warns us to avoid genealogies,⁴ the Mormons are obsessed with them. President Joseph Fielding Smith declared: "... The greatest commandment given us and made obligatory, is the Temple work in our own behalf and in behalf of our dead."⁵ This hardly agrees with what Jesus said. When asked, "Which is the greatest commandment in the law?" the Lord replied: "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind. This is the first and great commandment."⁶ Yet the most important part of Mormonism concerns the dead. Joseph Smith said: "The greatest responsibility in this world that God has laid upon us is to seek after our dead."⁷

Faithful to Joseph Smith and in direct disobedience of biblical warnings to avoid genealogies, the Mormons operate the largest genealogical center on earth. Located in Salt Lake City, it is staffed with more than 600 trained experts, who sort and catalog incoming census rolls, church registers, wills, and deeds gathered from all over the world. This information is transferred to microfilm and stored in an underground vault deep inside the towering granite Wasatch Mountains 20 miles south of Salt Lake City. These bombproof vaults have the capacity to store the equivalent of 26 million volumes of genealogical material.

The Mormon Genealogical Library in Salt Lake City contains the family tree records for more than one billion names. In addition, it is linked with a worldwide network involving about 400 branches containing further records of the dead. While genealogy is a hobby for the many "Gentiles" who use LDS facilities for research, it is serious business to the Temple Mormons. Their very salvation depends upon it.

Heber J. Grant, seventh President of the Mormon Church, once stated: "I am deeply interested in genealogical work.... I have in my employ a sister who devotes all her time to the preparation of genealogical records... pertaining to the families to which I belong in direct descent and through marriage."⁸

Typical of the stories that are circulated among Mormons in order to arouse their diligent attention to this vital subject is the following about a Mrs. Triptow:

... One day last month... she found the names of four new ancestors for whom she had searched 15 years.

She spotted their names and christening dates in the Bedlington (England) parish register printout at the Genealogical Society library.⁹

Another Pagan Connection

While making it clear that "after death comes judgment" without hope of salvation, the Bible contains one verse that does refer to baptism for the dead. Pointing to this, Mormons say, "The Bible teaches baptism for the dead, and we baptize by proxy for the dead in our Temples. This proves that the Mormon Church follows the Bible and all other churches don't, so it must be the only true Church." Reading this verse in context, however, it becomes clear that baptism for the dead was not practiced by Christians, but by pagans. The fact that Mormons baptize for the dead is one more link in the long chain of the pagan connection.

In 1 Corinthians 15, Paul uses the pronouns "we" and "us" for 28 verses in speaking of and to Christians. Then in verse 29 he suddenly changes the pronoun to "they" when he says, "Else what shall they do who are baptized for the dead? If the dead rise not at all, why then are they baptized for the dead?"

It is quite evident that Paul is not referring to Christians but to the non-Christian pagans of his day, because he refers to them as "they," indicating some group other than the Christians to whom he has been speaking and addressing as "we" or "us." In verse 30 he changes the pronoun back again when he says, "And why stand we in jeopardy every hour?" Clearly the "they" in verse 29 refers to someone other than the "we" in verse 30. Since the latter, as is clear from the context, obviously includes himself and the Christians he is writing to, the former must refer to non-Christians-i.e., the pagan worshipers of Paul's day. Clearly, Paul is using the fact that the mystery religions practiced baptism for the dead as evidence that even the pagans believed in life after death, which is what he now begins to argue for by other examples. Far from teaching baptism for the dead, the Bible points out that it is a pagan and not a Christian practice.

In our modern world, it is the Mormons' well-intentioned though pagan program for evangelizing the dead and performing secret rituals by proxy for them that is one of the major distinctives between Mormons and other religious groups. Indeed, the Mormons often point to this with pride. John Taylor, third President of the Mormon Church, stated: "... We are the only people that know how to save our progenitors.... We in fact are the saviours of the world, if they ever are saved...."¹⁰ Mormons themselves have admitted the pagan connection by implying that their seeking after the dead is very much like ancestor worship. At the 146th General Conference of the Church, Adney Y. Komatsu of the First Quorum of Seventy stated:

... A young couple who were members of the Church in Japan... joined with others in seeking out their ancestors and in planning to have the temple work done for them.

The girl searched diligently through shrines, cemeteries and government record offices, and was able to gather 77 names....

As this young couple joined their family members... they displayed their book of remembrance... [and] discussed with those relatives assembled their ancestral lines and the importance of completing the genealogical research.

It was difficult for their non-member families to understand the reasons for a Christian Church teaching principles such as "ancestral worship," for this was a Buddhist teaching and tradition....

Through genealogical research and through doing temple work for their progenitors, and especially with a Temple now becoming available in Tokyo, members can so live that the gospel will yet be embraced by many more in the Orient.¹¹

During the April 1982 General Conference, Elder W. Grant Bangerter, a General Authority in the First Quorum of the Seventy, emphasized the importance of LDS Temple work for the dead. At the same time he reinforced the Mormon acceptance of the idea that there is no death when he said, "Temple work is for the redemption of the dead.... And may we always remember that we perform the temple ordinances for people and not for names. Those we call 'the dead' are alive in the spirit and are present in the temple."¹² Not only do Mormons seek their dead, as Joseph Smith taught them, but their dead allegedly seek them and even gather in the Mormon Temples to encourage those performing the rituals to carry on in their behalf. Wilford Woodruff, fourth President of the Mormon Church, declared:

The dead will be after you, they will seek after you as they have after us in St. George [Temple]. They called upon us, knowing that we held the keys and power to redeem them.¹³

I will here say before closing, that two weeks before I left St. George, the spirits of the dead gathered around me, wanting to know why we did not redeem them."

Prisoners at Large

One of the strangest things about the Mormon Temples' functioning for the dead is the fact that these dead are supposed to be in a Mormon purgatory called the "spirit prison." It seems rather odd that spirits confined to a prison could at the same time be present in Mormon Temples, seeking the living and calling upon them to save them. Supposedly, the spirits of Mormons who have died are in Paradise awaiting the resurrection, and in the meanwhile they journey in the spirit world as missionaries to this "prison" to preach the Mormon gospel to the inmates there. Accepting this gospel, however, would hardly seem the basis for releasing or even paroling anyone from spirit prison to attend Mormon Temples and appear to Mormons elsewhere to assure them that the Mormon Church is the only true Church. At least on the basis of statements by leading Mormons it would seem that confinement in this prison continues until the end of the millennium. President Joseph Fielding Smith declared:

It is decreed that the unrighteous shall have to spend their time during this thousand years in the prison house prepared for them where they can repent and cleanse themselves through the things which they shall suffer.¹⁴

Apostle Heber C. Kimball, a Mormon General Authority and member of the First Presidency under Brigham Young, called this "prison" hell. Its purpose is apparently to torture the wicked in payment of their sins, and there is no indication that this process can be shortened by believing the Mormon gospel. In spite of the similarity between the Mormon "spirit prison" and Catholic purgatory, there is nothing in Mormonism comparable to Catholic "indulgences" for shortening the time of punishment. On the contrary, it isn't believing the Mormon gospel but enduring the necessary punishment that brings eventual release from the "spirit prison." Apostle Kimball declared:

That is loving the wicked, to send them there to hell to be burnt out until they are purified.

Yes, they shall go there and stay there and be burnt, like an old pipe that stinks with long usage and corruption, until they are burnt out, and then their spirits may be saved in the day of God Almighty.¹⁵

You have often heard me speak about my kindred.... Will they be saved? Yes, they will, but... they will first go to hell and remain there until the corruption with which they are impregnated is burnt out....

The day will yet come when they will come to me and acknowledge me as their savior, and I will redeem them and bring them forth from hell to where I live and make them my servants; and they will be quite willing to enter into my service.¹⁶

It all sounds confusing. In Mormonism there is no hell, and yet there is one after all; but it isn't really hell-it's a "spirit prison" where the dead pay for their own sins, although the Bible says that only the death of Christ could pay that penalty. Equally strange, while the spirits are confined to this "prison" they are somehow able to visit their Mormon relatives on earth and call upon the living to "save" them. While suffering in the Mormon "hell," they are nevertheless mysteriously at large and able to attend Mormon Temples to observe the pagan rituals that are being performed for them there. One would expect that since the most important work that Mormons have to do involves "saving" their dead, they would have worked out some more consistent teaching on the subject. The finite details of this important doctrine remain buried in a sort of fuzzy folklore that brings an aura of mystery and intrigue, making the members nervous enough to avoid a detailed study of the facts in the matter.

Mormon Necromancy

Although two apparent exceptions are given,¹⁷ the Bible teaches that the spirits of the dead are either in hell or heaven and cannot return to earth to communicate with the living. This is also clearly taught in the Book of Mormon, which says:

And there is a place prepared, even that awful hell... wherefore the final state of the souls of men is to dwell in the Kingdom of god, or to be cast out....

... Ye cannot suppose that such [sinners] can have place in the Kingdom of heaven; but they shall be cast out, for they are the children of the Kingdom of the Devil....¹⁸

If the spirits of the dead are either in heaven or hell, then appearances in Mormon Temples, as in seances, can only be demons impersonating the dead to foster belief in Satan's denial of death.¹⁹ This is why attempted communication with the dead, which is called necromancy, is absolutely forbidden in the Bible.²⁰ Here again, in open rejection of the Word of God, Mormonism not only encourages but boasts of alleged contact with the spirits of the dead. At the same 1982 General Conference mentioned above, Elder A.Theodore Tuttle, another General Authority, proudly declared:

On the third of April 1836, one week after the dedication of the Kirtland Temple, the monumental event occurred-the Savior appeared and accepted the Temple!

Moses and Elias also came. Then, Malachi's prophecy was fulfilled, for Elijah the prophet stood before them...²¹

In an LDS Sunday school lesson comparing the lives of "Two Great Men," Joseph Smith and John Wesley, Elder Paul L. Harmon remarked: "As Latterday Saints we have the highest regard for the integrity and courage of John Wesley. We sing many hymns written by him and his brother, Charles. We believe John Wesley was in the group of fifty eminent men who appeared, along with the signers of the Declaration of Independence, to President Wilford Woodruff in the Saint George Temple in 1877 and requested that baptism be performed in their behalf."²² Mormons glory in the tales of such spirit appearances, which they consider to be irrefutable evidence that theirs is the only true Church. (Similar phenomena are common among various occult and satanic groups.)

Numerous books have been written on the subject, chronicling everything from divine aid in doing genealogy to visitations of spirit people right in the Temples themselves. Joseph Heinerman's book Temple Manifestations (Salt Lake City: Magazine Printing and Publishing, 1974) and its companion, Spirit World Manifestations (Salt Lake City: Magazine Printing and Publishing, 1978) are most notable among such publications.

Describing this gathering of the dead in his own words, President Woodruff said:

These were the signers of the Declaration of Independence, and they waited on me for two days and two nights.

... I straightway went into the baptismal font and called upon brother McCallister to baptize me for the signers of the Declaration of Independence, and fifty other eminent men, making one hundred in all, including John Wesley, Columbus and others....

I then baptized him for every President of the United States, except three; and when their cause is just, somebody will do the work for them.²³

Stories of such spiritual visitations are common in the oral tradition or folklore of the Mormon Church. Many times it is alleged to be a dead relative who appears to a Mormon, to state that he or she has converted to Mormonism in the spirit world. The demonic apparition will often declare that "the Mormon Church is the only true Church," and ask to have its genealogical work completed on its behalf in the Temple so it can join the Mormon Church "on the other side." This was the case when a demon appeared in the form of the great-grandmother of Joanna and convinced her by this "sign" that Mormonism was true.²⁴ These appearances are very real and extremely convincing, and usually accomplish the satanic deception intended.

The many references to "light" in the stories about these apparitions that circulate among Mormons seem especially significant in view of what the Bible says about Satan transforming himself into an "angel of light."²⁵ Moroni, the key messenger who "restored" truth for Joseph Smith, is usually described as an "Angel of Light."²⁶ Interestingly enough, the reference for "Angel of Light" in the late LDS Apostle/scholar Bruce McConkie's encyclopedic work on Mormon doctrine reads "See Devil." Moreover, the "Personages of light" that brought revelations to Joseph Smith (later identified as the heavenly Father and His Son) are reminiscent of the "being of light" that convinces the "clinically dead" that they aren't really dead and that there is no judgment but only acceptance and love. The similarity between this idea and Satan's lie to Eve that she wouldn't really die is clear.

During the dedication of the Mormon Temple in Manti, Utah, personages of light, halos and circles of light, auras of light about the speakers, strange melodious music, and other manifestations from the "spirit world" were noted and considered signs that the Lord had accepted the Temple.²⁷ One of the most common kinds of Temple stories involves the alleged repeated appearances of Christ, very much like appearances of the Virgin to Catholics. For example, LDS President Lorenzo Snow claimed that, at the time he was President of the Council of the Twelve Apostles, Jesus appeared to him in the Salt Lake Temple. He told how on September 2, 1898, Jesus stood three feet off the floor, floating on a plate of solid gold, and spoke to him. This was supposedly in response to the secret signs of the Mormon Priesthood made by President Snow as he stood in the Temple dressed in his Priesthood robes.²⁸

Although it is the living who perform the occult rituals, Mormon Temples are primarily Temples of the dead. There the living must take upon themselves the oaths of the dead in order to "redeem" them. Thousands of pagan ceremonies are performed each day in Mormon Temples around the world for the dead, so that they too can receive the benefits of Mormonism. The Latter-day Saints are encouraged to have encounters with the alleged spirits of the dead in and out of the Temple. It is their belief that these encounters, though absolutely forbidden in the Bible, are the most sacred evidences that Mormonism is the only true religion.

"Mormo" and the Mormons

Not only Mormons, but many others also, in defense of these "good moral people," sincerely object to any attempt to show a satanic inspiration behind Mormonism. It is often insisted that the considerable evidence for this is circumstantial only. That is the reaction Ed Decker and Dick Baer meet from the attorneys in the film The God Makers.

Opening a copy of Anton LaVey's Satanic Bible to the page listing "Infernal Names," Ed says, "Look at this. The god of the *ghouls is named 'Mormo.' His followers would be Mormons."

"That's just the kind of conclusion we can't jump to!" retorts the older attorney sharply. "It could be just a coincidence."

"Except for the fact," adds Ed, "that Mormons are obsessed with genealogies and Temple rites and rituals for the dead, who they believe can visit the living, and who can convert to Mormonism even in the grave."

Dick Baer cuts in to reinforce what Ed is saying. "In Chinese, Mormon means 'gates of hell: That's why the Mormon missionaries seem to have some problems in Hong Kong, for instance. They have to avoid using the word Mormon in trying to convert the Chinese.'"

The lawyers are becoming increasingly uncomfortable. "That could be just another coincidence!" is the instant and irritable response of the older attorney.

He is almost scolding Dick and Ed at this point for offering what he considers to be the flimsiest of circumstantial evidence. When one examines Mormonism carefully, however, the proof of satanic inspiration becomes overwhelming.

More Than Circumstantial

As would be expected, Mormons take great offense at any suggestion that Satan could have influenced Joseph Smith in any way. It is an insult to them that such a possibility would even be raised. There is no escaping the fact, however, that a surprisingly pagan and anti-Christian influence is woven like a web through Mormonism, leaving a legacy of doctrines and practices that bear the unmistakable fingerprints of Lucifer himself. This is a common denominator in almost all of the mystery religions; and Mormonism (which boasts of its similarities to them) is no exception.

A major portion of the secret rituals that take place in Mormon Temples is called the Endowment. Part of it involves a "creation drama" that puts most Temple patrons (those going through the ceremony) to sleep. This is followed by a reenactment on film or stage of events in the Garden of Eden. After he and his wife, Eve, have been expelled from the Garden into the "lone and dreary world," Adam builds an altar and cries out, "O God, hear the words of my mouth!"

When he has repeated this three times, an arrogant voice responds offstage, "I hear you!" Lucifer then enters the scene. Sauntering over to Adam, he asks, "What is it you want?"

"Who are you?" demands Adam in surprise.

"I am the god of-this-world," replies Lucifer.

Strangely enough, when confronted with the fact that there are trillions of gods in Mormonism (even more than in Hinduism, which has only about 300 million), the average Mormon will invariably try to deny the polytheistic nature of his religion by insisting, "But we only worship the God of this world." Of course, he doesn't intend to admit that Lucifer, who identifies himself as "the god of this world," is his "god" when he says that.

However, the very multiplicity of Mormon "gods," who allegedly exercise dominion over innumerable earths, necessitates identifying the "god" that Mormons worship as "the god of this world." The beliefs that Joseph Smith left his followers force them to identify their "god" with the very title that the Bible gives to Satan.²⁹ This is only part of an astonishing Luciferian legacy that permeates Mormon beliefs and practices. It is just another spiritual hook awaiting the unwary.

Lucifer's Power and Priesthoods

Earlier in the Garden of Eden sequence, Mormons going through the Temple (i.e., the Temple patrons) watch the unfolding drama as Lucifer instructs Adam and Eve that there is no way for them to gain the knowledge to become "as gods" except to disobey "Father" and eat of the forbidden fruit.³⁰ In Mormonism, Lucifer is not a fallen angel, as the Bible teaches, but the literal (though rebellious) son of God and the actual brother of Jesus. As we have already seen, Mormonism also teaches that Satan told Eve the truth, that Adam and Eve didn't sin in disobeying God, and that the "fall" was really a "blessing in disguise" that opened the door to godhood for the human race. At this point in the Temple ceremony, the Luciferian legacy is reinforced by a fascinating sequence of events.

Lucifer has appeared on the scene wearing an embroidered apron very similar to the one Masons wear in their secret rituals. Partaking of the forbidden fruit and having now become "wise," Adam notices Lucifer's apron and asks him what it means.

Satan then replies, "It is the emblem of my power and priesthoods." Having said that, Lucifer directs Adam and Eve to fashion similar aprons for themselves. He excitedly and slyly cries, "See, you are naked. Take some fig leaves and make you aprons. Father will see your nakedness. Quick! Hide!"

In this flurry of activity, the unwary Temple patron may miss the subtle truth just revealed. The very emblems that Lucifer claims are the emblems of his power and priesthoods are sewn into the Temple undergarment that each patron is now wearing under all the Temple clothing, sewn to the navel, knee, and breasts of this "magic underwear" acquired in the washing-and-anointing ritual in the basement of the Temple.

As obedient to Satan as they were disobedient to God, Adam and Eve follow the instructions of "the god of this world." What follows after that is so astonishing as to be unbelievable. Yet it is repeated thousands of times in Mormon Temples around the world, confirming again and again the Luciferian legacy. As soon as Adam and Eve have tied their Luciferic aprons about them, the ceremony narrator instructs the Temple patrons to place their own fig-leaf aprons (part of the Temple costume brought with them or supplied) over their beautiful Temple clothing.

As obedient to Satan as Adam and Eve have been, each Mormon going through the Temple solemnly puts on the fig-leaf apron. In contrast, the Bible indicates that God refused to accept Adam and Eve's fig-leaf aprons as a covering for their nakedness. Instead, He clothed them in the skins of animals that He had sacrificed for them as a symbol of the sacrifice Christ would one day make upon the cross for the sins not only of Adam and Eve but of the whole world.

With this emblem of Lucifer's "power and priesthoods" covering the elaborate pleated robes of the Mormon Priesthood they are wearing, the patrons proceed through the entire Endowment Ceremony that is so sacred and important on the Mormon path to godhood. Astonishing as it may seem, Temple Mormons are married and buried in this fig-leaf apron that their own doctrine identifies as the symbol of Lucifer's "power and priesthoods." This is only part of the fascinating legacy that Lucifer has succeeded in bequeathing to the Mormon Church.

Ed was in Fairbanks, Alaska, teaching a seminar series at a civic center a few years after this book was first released. As he relates this story, you will see the chilling reality of what this Luciferian ritual is really all about.

I was sharing about how I used to stand at the veil at the conclusion of the ritual, with my arms inserted into the slits in the veil that matched the slits in my undergarment as I embraced the man portraying the Lord on the other side. As I would stand there, foot to foot, knee to knee, hand to back, mouth to ear, I would whisper, "Health in the navel, marrow in the bones, strength in the loins and sinews, power in the Priesthood be upon me and my posterity...."

As I reached that point in my narration, it suddenly dawned on me for the very first time that in this Temple ritual I had been up to my armpits in the very same emblems that were on Lucifer's apron in the Garden of Eden scene at the beginning of the Temple ceremonies. They were the same emblems that were on the sacred garments I would wear under my clothes! Yet Lucifer had clearly said that these were the emblems of his power and his priesthoods!

It was like the scales finally came off my eyes. I realized that the "power in the priesthood" that I had received as a Mormon at the veil was not the power of the Melchizedek priesthood as I had always thought. I already had that power or I couldn't even have gotten a Temple recommend. It was Lucifer's power and priesthood! Not only did I have my arms stretched through these Luciferian emblems, but those same emblems were on my breast as I was going "breast to breast" with the Temple worker on the other side of the veil (who also had the same emblems on his "garment"). Further, I was pronouncing this Luciferian power over my posterity-my children and my children's children!

As quickly as I could get out of the meeting, I hurried to a phone and called my wife, Carol, in Seattle. "You won't believe what happened to me 45 minutes ago!" I exclaimed. She cried back, "You won't believe what happened in this house here 45 minutes ago!"

It seemed that at the same time I discovered this heinous spiritual trap that I had fallen into as a Mormon, my two sons, Jason and Joshua, began to go into something like convulsions, rolling on the floor in a fetal position, vomiting and crying.

"What did you do?" I asked my wife. She replied that she had stood over them and commanded the demons that were attacking them to leave them and the house and our property immediately, in the name of Jesus. Our children immediately calmed down and were now in bed, sleeping quietly.

I realized then the awful power of the dark side of Mormonism. I flew home the next day and we prayed as a family to break those spiritual ties to the occult power of Satan that I had been bound to in the LDS Temple ritual.

What God Is This?

The Mormon "god" Elohim comes upon the scene (in the Temple drama) and discovers that Lucifer has beguiled Adam and Eve. He is shocked and outraged, in spite of the fact that He not only knew in advance of this plan to entrap Adam and Eve into mortality, but also helped arrange it. After all, in Mormonism this was all necessary and good, for without the prearranged "fall," humans could neither have children nor reach godhood. Strangely enough, Elohim says nothing about the fig-leaf aprons that His creatures are wearing. And equally strange, Mormon Temple patrons by the thousand go through these pagan ceremonies again and again without ever questioning why they all do it clothed in the symbol of Lucifer's power and priesthoods. Having clothed Adam and Eve and the participating Mormons in fig-leaf aprons, Lucifer is clearly in charge of the proceedings.

Thundering with rage, Elohim curses Lucifer to crawl on his belly, eat dust forever, and have his head crushed-but He remains silent concerning the symbol of Satan's power and priesthoods that all of His creatures now wear in obedience to "the god of this world," whom they clearly follow. Unimpressed by Elohim's dire pronouncements, Lucifer arrogantly defies the Mormon "God" to His face, vowing to "reign with blood and horror on the earth." He then goes about his business, apparently unaffected by Elohim's curse, since he never changes his conduct or bodily functions. One can only wonder who "Elohim" really is, since His rebellious son, Lucifer, is obviously so much stronger than He.

Rather than being a coincidence, as the attorneys believed, it seems instead to be quite in keeping with the above that "Mormo" is the god of the ghouls in the Satanic Bible. This is the kind of slyly perverse evidence that Satan would leave of the Luciferian legacy he has bequeathed to Mormonism. Nor is this all. Mormonism denies the existence of hell, but in Chinese, Mormon means "gates of hell." Here we have another perverse twist that is consistent with Satan's character. There is still more. Joseph Smith was reported to have said: "Hell is by no means the place this world of fools suppose it to be, but on the contrary, it is quite an agreeable place...."³¹

Having taught that hell is agreeable, Smith described heaven as a place of everlasting burning where the throne of God is encompassed in flames.³² This reversal of biblical truth is the classic attempt by Lucifer to switch places with God that is found in all Luciferian/occult religions.

Elaborating upon Joseph Smith's remarkable teachings about heaven and hell, early Mormon Apostle John A. Widtsoe wrote: "The meanest sinner will find some place in the heavenly realm.... In the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, there is no hell. All will find a measure of salvation.... The gospel of Jesus Christ has no hell...: "³³ Yet at the same time, the Book of Mormon itself identifies this belief as yet another Luciferian legacy, for it declares that Satan is the one who will lead the unsuspecting into hell by denying that it exists:

And others will he pacify, and lull them away into carnal security, that they will say: All is well in Zion, yea, Zion prospereth, all is well... and thus the Devil cheateth their souls and leadeth them away carefully down to hell.

And behold, others he flattereth away, and telleth them there is no hell... and thus he whispereth in their ears, until he grasps them with his awful chains from whence there is no deliverance.³⁴

The Classic Shell-Game Switch

It should be abundantly clear by now that Mormonism is based upon neither the Bible nor the Book of Mormon. At the very heart of Mormon doctrine is the teaching that there is no hell; thus death is not final, and the "dead" can repent and be baptized into the Mormon Church in the spirit world. Not only is this contrary to what the Bible teaches, but the Book of Mormon (as we have seen) also explicitly declares that there is absolutely no chance to repent and be saved once a person has died. Indeed, the Book of Mormon teaches that it is Satan himself who deludes people into thinking they will have another chance after death.

For behold this life is the time for men to prepare to meet God... for after this day of life which is given us to prepare for eternity, behold... there can be no labor performed.

Ye cannot say, when ye are brought to that awful crisis, that I will repent, that I will return to my God. Nay, ye cannot say this....

For behold, if ye have procrastinated the day of your repentance even until death, behold, ye have become subjected to the spirit of the devil, and he doth seal you his; therefore, the Spirit of the Lord hath withdrawn from you, and hath no place in you, and the devil hath all power over you; and this is the final state of the wicked.³⁵

If, as the Book of Mormon itself teaches, Satan is luring unsuspecting souls into hell by saying it doesn't exist and that they will be able to repent and join the Mormon Church even after they die, then it is clear that Mormonism, which teaches this, is Satans religion. If Mormonism doesn't tell the truth about hell, can its teachings about heaven be trusted? What about the Mormon "heaven"? Here the Luciferian legacy becomes even more astonishing.

The lie that there is no death is intimately linked with the next thing Satan said to Eve, that she could become a god. These two lies were the theme of Joseph Smith's famous "King Follett Sermon" preached before 20,000 of his followers in April 1844, which Mormons consider to be "his greatest sermon and one of the greatest sermons ever delivered by mortal man."³⁶ In it Joseph Smith's description of heaven sounds suspiciously like hell.

... And you have got to learn how to be Gods yourselves... the same as all Gods have done before you... from exaltation to exaltation, until you attain to the resurrection of the dead, and are able to dwell in everlasting burnings....

How consoling to... know that although the earthly tabernacle is laid down and dissolved, they shall rise again, to dwell in everlasting burnings... [as] a God and ascend the throne of eternal power the same as those who have gone before.³⁷

Is the Mormon god really Lucifer, and as a consequence is the "heaven" that Mormons are working so hard to gain really hell? Such a diabolical twist would seem very much in character for Lucifer, who has every right to claim Mormons as his own, since they so willingly and proudly wear the special emblem of his power and priesthoods in life and in death.

MYTHS, ZION, MECCA, AND MAGIC

Mormons have held some very strange beliefs. Brigham Young taught that the spirits of the wicked would be "thrown back again" into some primitive state "like brother Kimball's old pottery ware, to be ground up, and made over again."¹ Apostle Orson Pratt taught that each vegetable and animal "has a living intelligent spirit capable of feeling, knowing, and rejoicing" and existed in the premortal state and will be redeemed and resurrected;² and that a "transmigration of (their) particles of spirit from a lower to a higher" form and onto eventual "godhood" takes place similar to the transmigration of souls in Hinduism.³ Joseph Smith taught that when "Gentiles" were baptized into the Mormon Church, their Gentile blood was literally taken out of their veins by "the Holy Ghost" and replaced with Jewish blood. This is why Jews are called "Gentiles" in Mormonism, and Latter-day Saints of whatever nationality are considered to be the real "Jews." As Joseph Smith said:

... The effect of the Holy Ghost upon a Gentile is to purge out the old blood, and make him actually of the seed of Abraham.⁴

The founding Prophet of the Mormon Church also declared that the moon was inhabited by people about six feet tall who dressed like Quakers and lived to be a thousand years old.⁵ Smith's successor, Brigham Young, came forth with an even more amazing revelation-that the sun is also inhabited.⁶ Many Mormons shrug off these absurdities by saying that Smith and Young were really not speaking as Prophets when they made these statements, but only venturing their personal opinions. Other Mormons, however, even well-informed ones, seriously say that our astronauts didn't explore the entire moon and that there may be things we don't know yet about the suna form of doublethink that allows them to remain loyal to both science and their religion. One's loyalty to Prophet Smith and a "testimony" that he founded the only true Church must be retained at all cost.

In a classic mishandling of truth and fantasy, Brigham Young declared:

We are the smartest people in the world... the best people that ever lived upon the earth.... I do not say this boastingly, for I believe that this truth is evident to all who are willing to observe for themselves.

I want you to... tell all the great men of earth, that the Latter-day Saints are to be their redeemers....

Believe in God, believe in Jesus, and believe in Joseph his Prophet and in Brigham his successor. And I add, if you will believe in your heart and confess with your mouth that Jesus is the Christ, that Joseph was a Prophet, and that Brigham was his successor, you shall be saved in the kingdom of God.

Every spirit that confesses that Joseph Smith is a Prophet, that he lived and died a Prophet and that the Book of Mormon is true, is of God, and every spirit that does not is of anti-Christ⁷

The Myth-Makers

The gullible belief in such myths as inhabited suns and moons was quite general among early Mormons. Joseph's brother Hyrum taught that "every Star that we see is a world and is inhabited... the Sun and Moon are inhabited, and the Stars... are inhabited the same as this Earth."⁸ There were even commonly accepted fantasies among the early Mormons about taking trips to these other worlds out in space. Oliver B. Huntington claimed that Joseph Smith's father had prophesied over him at Kirtland in 1837 that he would preach the Mormon gospel "to the inhabitants of the moon...."⁹ A record has been found of a December 15, 1836, blessing that Joseph Smith, Senior, gave to Lorenzo Snow (who later became President of the Church):

Thou shalt have power to translate thyself from one planet to another; and power to go to the moon....¹⁰

Although these marvelous journeys never occurred, the early Mormons took such ideas quite seriously. It is therefore not surprising that they had little trouble believing Joseph Smith's story about being visited by god-men from a distant planet near a giant star called Kolob, or that these extraterrestrials had ordained him to restore true Christianity to this earth. Joseph Smith claimed numerous visits from "glorious Personages," including: "God the Father and His Son Jesus Christ, John the Baptist, Peter, James, John, Moses, Elijah, Elias [Joseph Smith mistakenly thought that these were two separate prophets, because of the difference between the Hebrew and Greek spellings in the Old and New Testaments], Michael, Raphael, Nephi, Moroni, Mormon and possibly others."¹¹ Even though, as his mother and others attested, Joseph Smith had always been an unusually talented teller of tall tales, at least some of his visions of heavenly beings may have been as real as the apparitions in haunted houses and Mormon Temples, and from the same demonic source.

Moon Trips and Gold Plates

A group of people who believed that their missionaries would soon be preaching the Mormon gospel on the moon and distant suns would have little difficulty accepting Joseph Smith's tale that he had discovered golden plates with hieroglyphics on them or that he had translated this ancient language with a "seer stone." What about the 11 men who claimed to have seen and handled those mysterious plates of gold? Doesn't that give the story credibility as an actual event? That the tale of the gold plates fits in with the other myths is evident from the statement of the "witnesses" that the ancient history recorded in gold was "shown unto us by the power of God.... An angel of God came down from heaven, and he brought and laid before our eyes... the plates... ." ¹² Later LDS scriptures claim that the plates were "seen by faith."¹³ It is clear that they were not bearing witness to an actual physical seeing and handling of the gold plates, but to a mythical event of the same kind as visions of angelic beings and visits from god-men.

The further testimony of one of those "witnesses" to the gold plates (a staunch supporter of Joseph Smith from the start named Martin Harris) is very significant in understanding the nature of this event. Harris claimed "that he had actually visited the moon" and explained that it "was only the faithful who were permitted to visit the celestial regions."¹⁴ Like visiting the moon, there were only a select few of the faithful who were permitted to see the fabled gold plates. One can only assume that the visit of the angel from heaven, who showed the "witnesses" the mysterious gold plates, was of the same nature as Harris's visit to the moon.

By originating their own myths, Joseph Smith and the other early Mormon leaders took the most strategic and effective steps possible to found a new religion. Had Mormonism been merely an aberrant form of Christianity, it would probably have remained very small or dwindled to almost nothing, as scores of other heresies that have come and gone. With its own mythology, however, the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints has given its members a basis for feeling that they are completely different from historical Christianity and all the churches around them.

Joseph Smith told tales so fantastic that in order to believe them it took a definite leap of faith, a solid commitment to him as a "Prophet." Having taken this specific step, not on the basis of Scripture or reason but of a subjective feeling called the "burning in the bosom," the convert is not likely to turn back.

The Mormon "Zion"

Strangely enough, Salt Lake City, headquarters of Mormonism, is not the most sacred place to Latter-day Saints. Nor is it in North Carolina, where official Mormon publications have claimed that Noah built his ark. It is found in Jackson County, Missouri, where Joseph Smith declared that the Garden of Eden was located. This is despite the fact that the Bible says four rivers flowed out of Eden, one being the Euphrates; that one of the other rivers flowed into Ethiopia and another into east Assyria,¹⁵ all of them an ocean and a continent away from Missouri. Discrepancies such as that were never a problem to Joseph Smith, nor apparently to his followers. As proof of his "revelation," Smith pointed to some rocks near Spring Hill, Missouri, and declared them to be remnants of a stone altar upon which Adam had offered a sacrifice to God after being expelled from the Garden of Eden!

There isn't one non-Mormon archaeologist or historian who would consider that idea anything but fantasy. Yet this wild claim that locates Eden 10,000 miles from the Euphrates region is still devoutly believed by Mormons today, because they have a "burning in the bosom" that proves Joseph Smith was a true Prophet of God. This holy Mormon site is known as Adam-On-di-Ahman to the LDS, who believe Joseph Smith's "revelation" about it recorded in their scriptures:

It is the place where Adam shall come to visit his people, or the Ancient of Days shall sit, as spoken of by Daniel the Prophet.¹⁶

Prophet Smith declared that at His second coming, Jesus Christ would return to Independence, Missouri, in spite of the clear statement in the Bible that He will come back to the Mount of Olives outside Jerusalem.¹⁷ The Bible makes it clear that Jerusalem is Zion. That didn't sway Joseph Smith, however, who stuck by his "revelation" that "Zion" is really Independence, Missouri. Unfortunately, the site that Prophet Smith "divinely chose" for the Zion Temple that must be built prior to Christ's return is owned by the Church of Christ-Temple Lot. This is only one of approximately 100 rival splinter groups that have come out of Joseph Smith's Mormonism.

In view of this, the self-righteous accusation by Mormons that the many denominational differences among Christians prove them all wrong seems hypocritical at best. However, the many Mormon denominations are united on at least three points: They all believe that 1) Joseph Smith was a true "Prophet" who "restored" true Christianity; 2) they all accept various writings of Joseph Smith as extrabiblical scripture; 3) each one claims to be the "only true Church" and accuses all the others of being apostates.

Claiming to be the only true followers of Prophet Smith, the Temple Lot Church is hardly likely to sell the site to those nicknamed the "Brighamites" or "Utah Mormons"-those who followed Brigham Young instead of Joseph Smith's son after Joseph Smith's death. An original historic document has recently come to light which makes it clear that Mormonism's founding Prophet passed on his "authority" to his son Joseph Smith III, whom he named as his successor. This substantiates the claimed authenticity of the Reorganized Church, whose Prophets have all been descendants of Joseph Smith-and it adds great significance to the rebaptism and reordination of his followers that was carried out by Brigham Young.¹⁸

In part the handwritten document dated January 17, 1844, and signed by Joseph Smith just five months before his death declared:

Blessing given to Joseph Smith III by his father Joseph Smith, Junior.... Blessed of the Lord is my son Joseph who is called the third.... For he shall be my successor to the Presidency of the High Priesthood; a Seer, and a Revelator, and a Prophet, unto the Church; which appointment belongeth to him by blessing, and also by right.

From the evidence, it would appear that the followers of Prophet Young have no priesthood authority, because they broke the line of succession from Prophet Smith, who allegedly obtained this "restored authority" from heavenly visitors. Nevertheless, under Brigham Young's dynamic leadership the "Utah Mormons" quickly outstripped all rival groups in size and influence. Today the word Mormon has come to mean the Utah-based Church, which claims that its Prophets and Apostles are the true successors of Joseph Smith, in spite of the rebaptisms under Brigham Young.

The Mormon Mecca

From every one of the 50 states and from scores of foreign countries, a continual parade of about two million visitors a year converges upon Salt Lake City's impressive Temple Square. Most of these are faithful LDS on periodic pilgrimages to Mormonism's Mecca. Walking through the beautifully landscaped, expansive grounds to view the impressive monuments inside those high, impenetrable brick walls and huge iron gates, one has the peculiar feeling of having stumbled upon an ancient monastery cloistering some mystical order of monks. This unique place, with its haunting sense of history, has become an international attraction that draws like a magnet from the ends of the earth more tourists than even the Grand Canyon.

Pausing thoughtfully nearly anywhere in the Square, one can almost hear the distant echo of Brigham Young's prophetic words spoken in 1847. Travel-weary and half-dead from tick fever, he raised himself up on his bed on that far-off rocky promontory overlooking the desolate Valley of the Great Salt Lake and inspired his band of trusting followers with the long-awaited declaration: "This is the place!"

Visitors to Temple Square, eager to learn early American history, unwittingly become captive audiences for the sharp Mormon guides, whose canned presentations are cleverly intertwined with soft-sell persuasions calculated to convince unwary listeners that the only true Church is the Mormon Church. Any questions to which an honest answer would be embarrassing to the Mormon Church are skillfully turned aside. The one place that every tourist would like to see is inside the Temple. That mysterious sanctuary, however, is closed to all visitors, including most Mormons. Only that small, select number who have been declared "worthy" may enter.

Classic Tourist Trap

Mormondom's Mecca is a classic tourist trap where visitors are propagandized and come away with more than they intended. Typical of the "historical" pamphlets that one somehow acquires in going through Temple Square is one featuring a large picture of the Christ statue located at the Visitor's Center. In bold print that almost jumps from the page, the greatest historical event in centuries, according to Mormonism, is announced: "IN 1830 THE ALMIGHTY GOD RESTORED HIS CHURCH TO EARTH AGAIN." On the facing page this bold declaration continues:

The restored church is known as The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, with headquarters in Salt Lake City.

It possesses the divine priesthood of God. It is headed by prophets and apostles as was the church in the days of Peter and Paul.

It invites all men to receive its message, for it is a message of salvation for everyone, whether Jew or Gentile, bond or free.¹⁹

Everything in Temple Square is carefully calculated to give the impression of truth supported by legitimate history. Knowing well, however, that much of the Church "history" it spends millions to promote runs the full range from sly half-truths to outright lies, the Mormon hierarchy closely guards early diaries and other documents that would reveal the sordid facts:

In the past few years the hierarchy has taken a series of repressive steps designed to crack down on Mormon scholars who weren't afraid to follow the truth.... [Dr. Leonard J.] Arrington, the first independent professional to fill the office of church historian, was replaced and his successor appointed from among the ranks of church authorities. Important church archives were sealed.²⁰

Time recently reported:

In 1993 the church capped a harsh campaign of intellectual purification... with the excommunication of D.Michael Quinn, a leading historian whose painstaking work documented Smith's involvement with the occult and Church leaders' misrepresentation of some continued polygamy in the early 1900s.²¹

As Lawrence Foster, historian and Mormon-watcher from Georgia Tech, puts it: "The extent of the Mormon hierarchy's control over its adhering society seems without parallel in U.S. history."²² Leading Mormon liberal Sterling McMurrin says:

... The Mormon religion is tied to Joseph Smith. You ask will it ever free itself? Not in the foreseeable future.

They don't want to. They'd rather distort history.²³

The impression that one gets in Temple Square and in the literature handed out at the elaborate Visitor's Center is that everything is aboveboard, fully substantiated by legitimate scholarship. Nothing could be further from the truth.

As we have observed the ever-changing face of the Temple Square Visitor Center over the years before and since The God Makers and other books and videos were released, we have noticed that many of the blatantly heretical presentations have either been removed or been softened. Most seem to be tied to an effort to make Mormonism look as Christian as possible to the unwary visitor.

On one trip we noticed that many of the guides were attractive young women dressed in casual, comfortable clothes. One of our friends accidentally dressed like a Mormon going to church. He asked one of the few older gentlemen what was going on. "Why are there these young women out here and just what has happened to some of these displays?"

he asked.

The man responded that The Brethren had decided to remove much of what the average Christian considered controversial, and to bring in the young ladies to change the atmosphere to one considered more comfortable. "We get more referrals now in a month than we used to in a whole year," he confided with a grin.

The Visitor Center is still touting Meso-America as the center of the Book of Mormon lands. Although archaeologists within its ranks confess that not one shred of evidence has been found to support the Book of Mormon, the Mormon Church persists in the fraudulent claim that archaeology substantiates it as a true history of early America. Recognized as an expert on pre-Colombian civilizations in the Americas by the Smithsonian Institute, archaeologist Michael Coe has said:

... There is not one professionally trained archaeologist, who is not a Mormon, who sees any scientific justification for believing the [Book of Mormon] to be true, and... there are quite a few Mormon archaeologists who join this group....

The picture of this hemisphere between 2000 B.C. and 421 A.D. presented in the book (of Mormon) has little to do with the early Indian cultures as we know them, in spite of much wishful thinking....

The bare facts of the matter are that nothing, absolutely nothing has ever shown up in any New World excavation which would suggest to a dispassionate observer that the Book of Mormon, as claimed by Joseph Smith, is a historical document relating to the history of early migrants to our hemisphere.²⁴

The Myth-Defenders

Mormonism would gain a measure of respectability if only some credible evidence could be found to support at least one of Joseph Smith's claims. Since the Book of Mormon is supposed to be an actual history of real people, places, and events on the North and South American continents, archaeology would seem the best hope for establishing Smith's credibility. Although events in the Bible go back much further in time than most of the Book of Mormon, the world's great museums contain huge quantities of evidence uncovered by archaeologists that verify biblical history to the minutest detail. Yet not one pin or coin or piece of pottery has ever been found related to the Book of Mormon.

The Mormon Church is to be commended for financing, beginning in 1952, "the largest and most ambitious archaeological project ever funded by a religious institution (including the Vatican)... ." ²⁵ Known as the New World Archaeological Foundation, its first field directors were non-Mormons. As a result of the work sponsored by this foundation, much valuable evidence has been uncovered that has increased knowledge about the early history of the Americas-but none of it comes even close to verifying anything related to the alleged peoples, places, or events recounted in the Book of Mormon.

In spite of this, Mormon missionaries around the world continue to spread the myth that the authenticity of the Book of Mormon has been established on the basis of archaeological evidence. Some of the most popular speakers at Mormon "Firesides" around the country are amateur archaeologists showing slides and giving lectures about "scientific proof" for the Book of Mormon. This is great stuff for bolstering the faith of the average Mormon, and though not always actively encouraged by the Church leaders, it is rarely discouraged.

John C. Sorenson, chairman of Brigham Young University Anthropology Department, has called such "faith-building" pronouncements by amateur "experts" "worse than useless." ²⁶ He described some of the most popular books among Mormons on the subject of archaeology and geography (by Dewey and Edith Farnsworth, Jack West, and Paul Cheesman) as "naive," as "harmful," and as "cut-and-paste" efforts. His further comments in this particular article are significant:

All this criticism may be too narrow. There is plenty of evidence that the Latter-day Saints are gullible on many subjects, not just this one.

President Harold B. Lee expressed impatience with the rumor-mongering which is endemic among Mormons. The too-generous standing ovations at BYU are becoming legendary.

Salt Lake City has earned a nationwide reputation as a center for stock fraud, and Douglas Stringfellow beguiled Utahans for years. ²⁷

The Brokers of Fraud

While gullible enthusiasm for archaeological "evidence" within the Church remains high, fanned frequently by stories about "new finds," professional archaeologists, geographers, and historians within the Church have become discouraged about ever substantiating the Book of Mormon. Many of them are convinced it is a fraud. Those with professional integrity admit the facts, though often only in private. Referring to the ongoing propaganda within the Church about "evidence" for the Book of Mormon, J.N.Washburn, a Mormon writer, has said, "Much that is cited as evidence is, in my mind, wishful thinking."²⁸ Joseph E.Vincent gives some insight into the problems this myth has created:

At one time when I was a member of a ward bishopric, one of the counselors said to me: "Why is it we have accurate maps of Palestine and not of the Book of Mormon lands? Why do we know so well where Jerusalem, Bethlehem and Nazareth are and do not know where Zarahemla, Bountiful and Cumorah are? Does that mean that actually those places are fictitious as the non-Mormons say they are?"²⁹

Vincent tried to assure this man that "all is well in Zion," but it wasn't easy. Respected Mormon archaeologist Professor Dee F.Green has said:

The first myth we need to eliminate is that Book of Mormon archaeology exists.... If one is to study Book of Mormon archaeology, then one must have a corpus of data with which to deal. We do not.

... No Book of Mormon location is known with reference to modern topography. Biblical archaeology can be studied because we do know where Jerusalem and Jericho were and are, but we do not know where Zarahemla and Bountiful (nor any location for that matter) were and are.

... A concentration on geography should be the first order of business, but we have already seen that twenty years of such an approach has left us empty-handed.³⁰

The admission by Mormon archaeologists and anthropologists that no one knows the location of even one Book of Mormon city or geographical site, including the famous Hill Cumorah, is absolutely fatal to the claims of the Mormon Church and exposes The Brethren as brokers of fraud. The Hill Cumorah is allegedly the location where at least a half million warriors died in the last great Book of Mormon battle; where Moroni buried the fabled gold plates; and where Brigham Young claimed that inside the hill was a huge cavern filled with wagonloads of gold plates. Yet the small hill near Palmyra, New York, which the Church identifies as Cumorah, has never yielded so much as one scrap of evidence of this great battle, nor has anyone ever been able to unearth even one gold plate (which would be one of the world's greatest archaeological finds and would prove the Book of Mormon).

Though divided on much, most (if not all) Mormon archaeologists agree on one thing: The real Cumorah, if there ever was one, definitely was not located where Joseph Smith claimed he discovered the gold plates. If the Book of Mormon events took place anywhere, it could only have been in the Yucatan Peninsula of Central America. That is where Mormon archaeological activity has been centered for years. Yet The Brethren continue to sponsor the annual pageant in Palmyra that draws huge crowds to the misnamed hill with its monument and huge lettering along the hill's entire side identifying it as "Cumorah."

The Book of Mormon contains a photograph of this alleged Hill Cumorah. If it indeed is Cumorah, then The Brethren should stop sponsoring archaeological teams searching for it in the Yucatan or anywhere else. If it is not Cumorah, then to continue to represent it as such with thousands of photographs and the annual pageant is the most blatant fraud conceivable. Yet Mormon missionaries continue to sell Mormonism door-to-door around the world based upon this kind of misrepresentation.

The Dilemma of Disillusionment

The Brethren are caught in a trap from which there is no escape except repentance. If Joseph Smith was a true Prophet, why did he mistakenly identify the wrong hill outside Palmyra, New York, as Cumorah? And how did the gold plates get there when they were buried by Moroni (if this was a real event) in the Yucatan? Mormonism stands or falls with Joseph Smith, and we need no further evidence than Cumorah that he was an impostor and that The Brethren are the modern brokers of his pitiful fraud.

Strangely enough, the obvious fact that the Book of Mormon is a fraudulent document seldom causes those who know this to leave the Church. Even Professor Green has said:

I find that nothing in so-called Book of Mormon archaeology materially affects my religious commitment one way or the other, and I do not see that archaeological myths so common in our proselytizing program enhance the process of true conversion....³¹

The founder of the Church-supported New World Archaeological Foundation was another highly respected Mormon scholar, Thomas Stuart Ferguson. At one time known among LDS as one of the staunchest defenders of the Book of Mormon (having written three books on the subject), Ferguson surprised Jerald and Sandra Tanner with a visit to inform them that after "25 years of trying to prove Mormonism, [he] had finally come to the conclusion that his work had been in vain. He said that his training in law had taught him how to weigh evidence and that the case against Joseph Smith was absolutely devastating and could not be explained away."³² Under pressure from the Mormon hierarchy to affirm his loyalty, Ferguson wrote a letter in which he said, "My relationship and membership with the Church has never been terminated."³³ However, he has lost his confidence in Mormonism as a religious faith.

Why would anyone continue on as a member of the Mormon Church if he was convinced that Joseph Smith was a fraud? Unfortunately, most Mormons have been brainwashed into believing that all other churches are false, so when they discover that the real fraud is Mormonism itself, they can't believe there's anything else out there that might be true. Having been deceived so badly once, it is understandable that disillusioned Mormons are afraid to try anything else. This is pretty much expressed by Ferguson in another letter dated December 3, 1979:

I lost faith in Joseph Smith as one having a pipeline to Deity-and have decided that there has never been a pipeline to Deity-with any man....

I give Joseph Smith credit as an innovator and as a smart fellow. I attend, sing in the choir and enjoy my friendships in the Church.

In my opinion, it is the best fraternity that has come to my attention.³⁴

Strange Explanations

Some Church leaders have come up with ingenious explanations for the complete failure to find any evidence supporting the Book of Mormon. In a March 25, 1964, address, Fletcher B.Hammond said: "... The Gentiles have not yet received the Book of Mormon by faith... and until they do... it appears that empirical facts will not be allowed to come forth as evidence of the truthfulness of the Book of Mormon... ." ³⁵ At the 109th Annual Conference, Antoine R.Ivins suggested:

Faith to me is the greatest thing in life, and God purposely, I believe, covered up in antiquity the history of this people and the story of the Book of Mormon so that... it would have to rest upon faith... that could be given to us only by God Himself.³⁶

One wonders, then, why God allowed literally tons and mountains of evidence to remain in verification of the Bible. Church leaders have become very concerned by the questions being raised due to the absence of evidence, and the fact that descriptions of cities, rivers, mountains, and journeys in the Book of Mormon cannot be correlated at all with topography and geography. To quiet these questions, for which The Brethren have no answers, an article was published in the Church Section of the Deseret News cautioning Church members about putting too much importance upon facts and evidence:

The geography of the Book of Mormon has intrigued some readers of that volume ever since its publication. But why worry about it?

Efforts to pinpoint certain places from what is written in the book are fruitless.... Attempts to designate certain areas as the Land Bountiful or the site of Zarahemla or the place where the Nephite city of Jerusalem sank into the sea "and waters have I caused to come up in the stead thereof" can bring no definitive results. So why speculate?

To guess where Zarahemla stood can in no wise add to anyone's faith. But to raise doubts in people's minds about the location of the Hill Cumorah, and thus challenge the words of the prophets concerning the place where Moroni buried the records, is most certainly harmful. And who has the right to raise doubts in anyone's mind?

Our position is to build faith, not to weaken it, and theories concerning the geography of the Book of Mormon can most certainly undermine faith if allowed to run rampant.

Why not leave hidden the things that the Lord has hidden? If He wants the geography of the Book of Mormon revealed, He will do so through His prophet....³⁷

That kind of blind faith in a "prophet" is the primary mark of a cult. When a Church is founded upon beliefs that are beyond any objective verification and rest upon a "burning in the bosom," its members have surrendered to tragic deception. The Mormon Church was established upon the most blatant fraud, and it is maintained today because its members are blinded to the obvious by their devoted submission to whatever the Church says, no matter how absurd.

Joseph the Glass-Looker

Long before Joseph Smith allegedly was led by the angel Moroni to the ancient gold plates, he had already established a wide reputation as a "seer" who, in the words of his mother, Lucy, "possessed certain means by which he could discern things invisible to the naked eye."³⁸ Joseph's mother related that because of this remarkable talent, a certain "Josiah Stoal [sic] came from Chenango county, New York, with the view of getting Joseph to assist him in digging for a silver mine."³⁹ The Mormon writer Hyrum L.Andrus said, "Joseph could also have had the seer stone at this time... "⁴⁰ Mormon historian B.H.Roberts says of Stowell:

Having heard of Joseph Smith's gift of seership, he came to the Smith residence to employ him.... Joseph [Smith] hired out to Mr. Stoal [sic]... and for something like a month they vainly sought to find the "hidden treasure."... Joseph continued for some time in his employment.⁴¹

A local citizen of the area at that time, W.D.Purple, relates:

In the year 1825, we often saw in that quiet hamlet Joseph Smith, Jr.... [living with] the family of Deacon Isaiah Stowell... [who had] a monomaniacal impression to seek for hidden treasures, which he believed were hidden in the earth....

Mr. Stowell... heard of the fame of... Joseph, who by the aid of a magic stone had become a famous seer of lost or hidden treasures.... He with the magic stone was at once transferred from his humble abode to the more pretentious mansion of Deacon Stowell.

Here, in the estimation of the Deacon, he confirmed his conceded powers as a seer, by means of the stone which he placed in his hat and by excluding the light from all other terrestrial things could see whatever he wished, even in the depths of the earth.

In February 1826, the sons of Mr. Stowell, who lived with their father, were greatly incensed against Smith, as they plainly saw their father squandering his property in the fruitless search for hidden treasures... and caused the arrest of Smith...⁴²

W.D.Purple was present at the trial, and his careful notes of the entire proceedings were later published in The Chenango Union of May 3, 1877. In his History of the Church, Joseph Smith admitted working for a Josiah Stowell in connection with a silver mine, but said nothing about his arrest. Mormon apologists rejected W.D.Purple's account as spurious and tried to deny that their founding Prophet, at the same time the angel Moroni was allegedly appearing to him annually in preparation for leading him to the buried golden plates, was hiring himself out to locate buried treasure by means of a "seer stone" that he used like a fortuneteller's crystal ball. After spending 20 pages trying to discredit the idea that Joseph Smith had ever been arrested for "glass-looking," Dr. Hugh Nibley, dean of Mormon apologists, conceded:

... If this court record is authentic, it is the most damning evidence in existence against Joseph Smith... the most devastating blow to Smith ever delivered....⁴³

The devastating blow fell July 28, when Wesley P. Walters and Fred Poffarl together discovered in a mildewed box in the darkest part of a basement storage room beneath Chenango County jail the records of Judge Albert Neely and Constable Philip M. DeZeng.⁴⁴ These proved once and for all that Joseph Smith had indeed been arrested and found guilty on March 20, 1826, of pretending to find buried treasure by "glass-looking." Although the court in enforcing the laws took a dim view of this superstitious practice and found Joseph Smith guilty of fraud as an "imposter," this was a very common occupation at the time. Four years before Joseph's arrest, the local newspaper in his hometown of Palmyra, New York, in a article about money-digging, explained that it was widely practiced in that area, and stated:

We could name... at least five hundred respectable men, who do in the simplicity and sincerity of their hearts verily believe that immense treasures lie concealed upon our Green Mountains; many of whom have been for a number of years most industriously and perseveringly engaged in digging it up.⁴⁵

One year before Smith's arrest, the newspaper in a nearby town carried this lament:

We are sorry to observe even in this enlightened age, so prevalent a disposition to credit the accounts of the Marvellous.

Even the frightful stories of money being hid under the surface of the earth, and enchanted by the Devil or Robert Kidd, are received by many of our respectable fellow citizens as truths....⁴⁶

A few days since was discovered in this town, by the help of a mineral stone (which becomes transparent when placed in a hat and the light excluded by the face of him who looks into it, provided he is fortune's favorite), a monstrous potash kettle in the bowels of old mother Earth, filled with the purest bullion.

Some attempts have been made to dig it up, but without success. His Satanic Majesty, or some other invisible agent, appears to keep it under marching orders; for no sooner is it dug on to in one place, than it moves off like "false delusive hope" to another still more remote. But its pursuers... [have] driven a steel ramrod into the ground directly over it, to break the enchantment....

By the rust of the kettle, and the color of the silver, it is supposed to have been deposited where it now lies prior to the flood.⁴⁷

The Making of a Prophet

It was in this setting that Joseph Smith and his father operated as money-diggers. Young Joseph Smith had found this "seer stone" while on a dig. It was brown and about the size of an egg, and is still held by the Mormon Church, safely locked away.⁴⁸ There is no record that Joseph Smith ever actually recovered any buried treasure, but many reports that he and the other "glass-lookers" located all manner of valuable finds that kept "sinking deeper" in the earth as the diggers pursued them. There was always an "explanation" about some enchantment or spirit that prevented the treasure from being taken, and there were always enough superstitious people who believed this sort of nonsense to keep Joseph Smith and numerous other "glass-lookers"-in business during those mad years.

Here was the making of the Prophet. Upstate New York was filled with people who were ready to believe almost any tale, the taller the better. Buried treasure, especially anything gold, had irresistible appeal. And if engraved on the gold were mysterious hieroglyphics giving the history of the ancient inhabitants of this land, the story was all the more enticing. How could the strange writing be deciphered? Why, of course, Joseph Smith had a magic stone that he looked at in his hat and on which he could see anything-even the translation of ancient languages.

So it came to pass that the mysterious gold plates were "found." This time the "spirit" guarding them was an angel who led Joseph Smith to the priceless treasure; and after preventing him supernaturally during several abortive attempts, at the end of four years the angel allowed him to take this ancient record because he had been chosen to restore true Christianity to earth. On a few occasions the plates were said to be under a blanket in the room nearby (no one could look upon them except Joseph) while the lengthy "translation" was in process. Joseph Smith didn't need to look at the plates, however; he looked into his hat, and there, shining on the "seer stone," were the hieroglyphics on one line and the translation just below. Usually the priceless plates were kept "hidden in the woods," for they were of little importance in the process. It was the "seer stone" that did it all, just as it had been doing so many marvelous things for Joseph for so long.

From the many accounts of eyewitnesses, family, friends, neighbors, Mormons, and non-Mormons, it is clear that Joseph Smith used his "seer stone" (and other "magical objects") as a divination device-something that is absolutely forbidden in the Bible.⁴⁹ In the beginning it may all have been just an overactive youthful imagination caught up in the hysteria of moneydigging that was so prevalent in that part of America at the time. However, as he continued to play the game, either pretending that the stone and he had miraculous powers or attempting to develop such powers, young Smith opened himself increasingly to demonic influences until he was caught in the web of strong delusion. We will document this in detail later, but there is no question that Joseph Smith became very heavily involved in the occult, and that its grip upon him strengthened after he became the founding "Prophet" of a new Church.

The Mysterious Masonic Talisman

We can trace the steps downward as young Joseph became first a "Prophet" and then a "magician" with a Luciferic commitment for which he received in exchange the power over other people that he prized so highly. We have already seen in part that a Luciferian legacy forms the foundation of the Mormon Priesthoods. The secret ceremonies in the Temples, which we will reveal further in a later chapter, are related to ritual magic. In his presidential address before the Mormon History Association on April 20, 1974, Dr. Reed Durham (at that time director of the LDS Institute of Religion at the University of Utah) disclosed some startling information about Joseph Smith that confirms our appraisal and almost cost Dr. Durham his membership in the Church:

... I should like to initiate all of you into what is perhaps the strangest, the most mysterious, occult-like esoteric, and yet Masonically oriented practice ever adopted by Joseph Smith....

All available evidence suggests that Joseph Smith the Prophet possessed a magical Masonic medallion, or talisman, which he worked during his lifetime and which was evidently on his person when he was martyred....

... Purchased from the Emma Smith Bidamon family, fully notarized by that family to be authentic and to have belonged to Joseph Smith, [it] can now be identified as a Jupiter talisman. It carries the sign and image of Jupiter and... in some very... mysterious sense... [it] was the appropriate talisman for Joseph Smith to possess.

I wasn't able to find what this was... [until] finally in a magic book printed in England in 1801... how thrilled I was when I saw in his list of magic seals the very talisman which Joseph Smith had in his possession at the time of his martyrdom....

In astrology, Jupiter is always associated with high positions, getting one's own way.... So closely is magic bound up with the stars and astrology that the term astrologer and magician were in ancient times almost synonymous.

The purpose of the Table of Jupiter in talismanic magic was to be able to call upon the celestial intelligences, assigned to the particular talisman, to assist one in all endeavors. The names of the deities which... could be invoked... were always written on the talisman.... Three such names were written on Joseph Smith's talisman....

When properly invoked, with Jupiter being very powerful and ruling in the heavens, these intelligences-by the power of ancient magic-guaranteed to the possessor of this talisman the gain of riches and favor and power and love and peace... and anyone who worked skillfully with this Jupiter Table would obtain the power of stimulating anyone to offer his love to the possessor of the talisman, whether from a friend, brother, relative, or even any female.⁵⁰

Considering the power he obtained, his control over so many other people, and the dozens of wives he acquired in his short life, Joseph Smith probably had a lot of faith in that talisman. If Joseph Smith had sincerely desired to "restore" true Christianity, he would have followed the Bible. Instead of that, however, he sought to revive under Christian terminology something that he must have known had nothing whatever to do with Christianity, but was in fact its pagan rival. There is ample evidence that Joseph Smith knew exactly what he was doing. From early childhood he and his family had been dabbling in divination, necromancy, and various forms of ritual magic. Smith believed in and practiced occultism until his death. This is the secret foundation of the Mormon Church he established.⁵¹

D. Michael Quinn, a devout Mormon and a history professor at Brigham Young University, was voted Outstanding Teacher at BYU for 1986. He is also the author of an exceptional work Early Mormonism and the Magic World View. Quinn's book was the first major effort by a Mormon scholar to deal with the magical roots of his faith. It was not written as an anti-Mormon attack; instead, it was written by a scholar to reveal the true roots of Joseph Smith's visions and the birth of Mormonism.

Quinn cites a comprehensive study of the magic arts from the 1700s and notes that all three distinctive forms of ritual magic are represented in the account of Smith and the gold plates: necromancy, transformation or shape-shifting, and theurgy or divine communication (page 133). In short, Smith's encounter upon Hill Cumorah was a classic textbook case of sorcery!

Quinn is no longer a Mormon and no longer a professor at BYU. His reputation among Mormons is in the cellar because of his search for factual truth, yet his the book stands as a beacon of truth and solid evidence that the Smith family was deeply involved in various forms of occultism.

THE WORLD'S MOST PERFECT BOOK?

In 1843, about 13 months before Joseph Smith's death at the hands of the mob that stormed the jail where he was being held for treason and riot, there was sudden excitement among the Mormons due to a great archaeological find. During the excavation of a mound near Kinderhook, Illinois, at the end of April, six bell-shaped, thin brass plates with strange hieroglyphics engraved on them were uncovered at a depth of about 11 feet. Appearing to be of ancient origin, the "Kinderhook Plates" (as they came to be known) were displayed briefly in public and then sent to Joseph Smith because of his alleged ability to translate unknown languages.

Upon receiving and inspecting the plates, Joseph Smith declared that the "writing on them was similar to that in which the Book of Mormon was written" on the gold plates, and "he thought that by the help of revelation he would be able to translate them."¹ About a year later, the St. Louis Gazette reported that the Prophet was ... busy in translating them [the Kinderhook Plates]. The new work which Jo. is about to issue as a translation of these plates will be nothing more nor less than a sequel to the Book of Mormon.²

There is no question that Joseph Smith regarded these plates as genuine. His "translation" thereof is probably locked in the Church archives in Salt Lake City along with a great many other embarrassing documents. Reflecting the growing excitement among Latter-day Saints at the time, the Mormon publication Time and Seasons boasted: "Why does the circumstance of the plates recently found in a mound in Pike County, Illinois by Mr. Wiley... go to prove the Book of Mormon true?-Ans. Because it is true!"³ In his diary for May 1, 1843, a month before he was murdered, Joseph Smith wrote:

I insert fac-similes of the six brass plates found near Kinderhook....

I have translated a portion of them, and find they contain the history of the person with whom they were found. He was a descendant of Ham, through the loins of Pharaoh, king of Egypt, and that he received his kingdom from the Ruler of heaven and earth.⁴

Unfortunately for the credibility of Mormonism's founding Prophet, the plates were a deliberate hoax carefully manufactured and planted in a mound to be "discovered." This was confessed by the three men responsible about a month after Joseph Smith's death and subsequently confirmed after examination by a number of experts.

For example, University of Chicago Egyptology Professor James H. Breasted reported some years later in a letter:

The "Kinderhook Plates" are, of course, childish forgeries, as the scientific world has known for years.

What does this all add up to? Does it merely mean that one of the "finds" which the Latter-day Saints believed supported the Book of Mormon does not support it, and that there is no real blow to the prophetship of Joseph Smith? Not at all, for as Charles A. Shook well observed... "Only a bogus prophet translates bogus plates."

Where we can check up on Smith as a translator of plates, he is found guilty of deception. How can we trust him with reference to his claims about the Book of Mormon?...

Smith tried to deceive people into thinking that he had translated some of the plates. The plates had no such message as Smith claimed....

Smith is thus shown to be willing to deceive people....⁵

A Scam That Got Out of Hand

There is no question that Joseph Smith became an accomplished and extremely successful deceiver, and that he had some accomplices and was also greatly aided by the ignorance and gullibility of most of the early Mormons. To anyone except a Mormon who makes an impartial investigation, the evidence seems overwhelming that Mormonism, in spite of the undoubted sincerity of millions of people involved in it today, began as a deliberate scam that got out of hand and mushroomed into something beyond the imagination of its original designers. Although it is impossible today to know every detail of what happened then, many of the steps along the way can be traced accurately. Oliver Cowdery (who baptized Joseph and was the Prophet's scribe as he read off the "translation" he saw on the "seer stone" in his hat) and Sidney Rigdon

(who was undoubtedly the brains behind later theological innovations) were probably coconspirators. Yet they (and perhaps Joseph Smith himself at times) were also deceived to some extent.

At the front of the Book of Mormon is first the testimony of the "Three Witnesses" and then of the "Eight Witnesses." A logical question is, Why these two separate groups? The "Eight" seem to have been an afterthought. A "revelation" of March 1829 made it clear that there were to be only three witnesses: "... Three of my servants, whom I shall call and ordain... shall know of a surety that these things are true... and to none else will I grant this power, to receive this testimony among this generation..."⁶ Ether 5:2-4 also makes this clear. Changes and contradictions are common enough in Mormon "revelations" as necessity requires. In this case, the necessity may well have arisen from questioners asking why the "Three Witnesses" only saw the plates in the hands of an angel in a vision,⁷ and why they went into the woods to have an angel "reveal" to them "by the power of God" gold plates that Joseph Smith was still "translating" and had in his possession.⁸ In order to quiet such questions, it may have become necessary to have "witnesses" see something more tangible. That could have been easily arranged with a little careful preparation.

Like the other "Three," the "Eight Witnesses," who claimed they had seen and handled said plates "which have the appearance of gold... [with] engravings thereon all of which has the appearance of ancient work..."⁹ were gullible, untrained, and uncritical observers, eager to believe, who probably did see and handle something that convinced them. This would explain why the five of the "Eight" who eventually left the Church (only the three Smiths out of the 11 "witnesses" remained in Mormonism) apparently never denied seeing something that looked like ancient engraved gold plates. How was the deception pulled off? It would have been easy enough for Oliver Cowdery, a former blacksmith who allegedly turned counterfeiter, to contrive something like the Kinderhook Plates that would have deceived the "Eight." Or Joseph Smith might have done it on his own.

Ideally Suited Witnesses

All 11 of the "witnesses" were astonishingly unstable and unreliable. Oliver Cowdery, David Whitmer, and Martin Harris, the "Three Witnesses" who saw the plates "by faith" in an angelic vision, each subsequently had other "visions" that convinced them of contrary religious beliefs. In one of his visions, Whitmer claimed "God" spoke to him in an audible voice and told him to separate himself from the Mormons.¹⁰ Hiram Page, one of the "Eight," acquired his own "seer stone" and began "to receive revelations, often contrary to those received by Joseph Smith."¹¹ Both Cowdery and Whitmer were led astray by Hiram Page's "peep-stone." Cowdery, who with Joseph Smith allegedly received the first "Priesthood" at the hands of John the Baptist, was excommunicated from the Church for accusing the Prophet of adultery.

Martin Harris, one of the "Three," not only "traveled to the moon," but "saw" Jesus standing beside Joseph Smith in a meeting, though no one else present except the "Prophet" saw him. On that occasion Prophet Smith laid his hand approvingly upon Martin's head and said, "Martin, God revealed that to you. Brothers and sisters, the Savior has been in your midst. I want you to remember it. He cast a veil over your eyes for you could not endure to look upon Him."¹² Yet Harris, who could "look upon Him," was later described in a Mormon publication as mad, demonic, and deranged, "... flying from one thing to another, as if reason and common sense were thrown off their balance."¹³ Indeed, Martin Harris did go from one thing to another, changing his religious beliefs no less than 13 times. Mormonism had been about number six on the list.

From all that we know about the "witnesses" to the Book of Mormon, they would seem to be strange choices for divine appointment to this great honor and responsibility. Today they are still described in Mormon publications as fine and honorable men, whose testimony "proves" the story of the gold plates. Yet Joseph Smith called all eight defectors liars and cheats "too mean to mention," and accused Cowdery and Whitmer of being part of a "gang of counterfeiters, thieves, liars and blacklegs."¹⁴

To get an idea of just how bad things were, we need to look at how Joseph Smith handled each of the three main witnesses to the authenticity of the Book of Mormon. Remember that The Brethren send out the Mormon missionaries to hand out copies of the Book of Mormon to their investigators, citing the testimonies of these men as actual evidence and asking the investi=gators to pray and ask God for a sign that this is true. All the while, The Brethren believe the following about these men who are raised up as the witnesses of the Book of Mormon.

Oliver Cowdery was the Church's second Elder, often called the "Second President." The early-day companion of Joseph Smith, he was the scribe for the Book of Mormon, present at the "Restoration of the Priesthood" and as close to the real truth as any man.¹⁵

However, in 1838 in Kirtland, Oliver Cowdery confronted Joseph Smith with the charge of adultery with Fanny Alger, and with lying and teaching false doctrines.¹⁶ Joseph Smith denied this charge and instead charged Cowdery with being a liar.¹⁷ Church records now show that Miss Alger was Smith's first "spiritual wife." Oliver was telling the truth!¹⁸

Cowdery was excommunicated for this and other "crimes."¹⁹ Later, as a Methodist, he denied the Book of Mormon²⁰ and publicly confessed his sorrow and shame for his connection with Mormonism.²¹

While the Mormon Church claims that Cowdery rejoined them in the fall of 1848,²² they also accused him later that year with trying to "raise up the Kingdom again" with the apostate William E. McLellin.²³

Oliver Cowdery was publicly charged by Joseph Smith and Mormon leaders with stealing, lying, perjury, counterfeiting, adultery, and being the leader of a gang of "scoundrels of the deepest degree!"²⁴

David Whitmer saw the plates "by the eye of faith" handled by an angel.²⁵ He later told of finding them lying in a field, and later still he told Orson Pratt that they were on a table with all sorts of brass plates, gold plates, the Sword of Laban, the "Director," and the Urim and Thummim.²⁶

During the summer of 1837, while in Kirtland, Whitmer pledged his new loyalty to a prophetess (as did Martin and Oliver) who used a black seer stone and danced herself into "trances."²⁷

It was the start of the finish for Whitmer. It ended in 1847 in his declaration to Cowdery that he (Whitmer) was to be the Prophet of the New Church of Christ and Cowdery a counselor.²⁸

In the meantime, Whitmer was excommunicated and roughly put out. His and Cowdery's families were in fact driven into the streets and robbed by the Mormons while Whitmer and Cowdery were away trying to arrange a place to flee to.²⁹

Cursed by leaders such as Sidney Rigdon, Whitmer was denounced by the Prophet Joseph Smith as a "dumb beast to ride" and "an ass to bray out cursings instead of blessings."³⁰

Martin Harris was first a Quaker, then a Universalist, then a Restorationist, then a Baptist, then a Presbyterian, and finally a Mormon.³¹ After his excommunication in 1837, he changed his religion eight more times, going from the Shakers to one Mormon splinter group to the next, and then back to the main group in 1842.³² Yet in 1846 Harris was preaching among the Saints in England for the apostate James J. Strang.³³

Harris testified that his testimony for Shakerism was greater than it was for Mormonism. (The Shakers' "Sacred Roll and Book" was also delivered by an angel.)³⁴

His later testimony that he saw the plates by "the eyes of faith and not with the natural eyes" should eliminate him automatically as a witness.³⁵

In the Elder's Journal for August 1838, Joseph Smith denounces Harris as "so far beneath contempt that to notice him would be too great a sacrifice for a gentleman to make. The Church exerted some restraint on him, but now he has given loose to all kinds of abominations, lying, cheating, swindling, and all kinds of debauchery."³⁶

The deplorable truth concerning these three key "witnesses" to the alleged golden plates and the Book of Mormon is suppressed for obvious reasons. Clearly they were scoundrels who were part of Joseph Smith's scam from the beginning. Yet they are presented as honorable men and their "testimonies" (though later renounced) are offered as proof of the alleged miraculous origin of the Book of Mormon.

Visions, Visions Everywhere

The time and place in which Joseph Smith grew up had a great deal to do with his success in putting over such a transparent fraud. Most Mormons today naively imagine that Joseph Smith's "visions" of angels and assorted heavenly beings prove him to be a great Prophet and marked him out as unique. On the contrary, Mormonism was only one of a number of such new religious groups that were formed and flourished at that same time in the same general area. Some of these groups were very similar to Mormonism. James Jesse Strang "claimed that he found some plates which he translated with the Urim and Thummim. He had witnesses who claimed they saw the plates, and their testimony is recorded in almost the same way that the testimony of the 11 witnesses is recorded in the Book of Mormon."³⁷

At least for a time, all of the witnesses to the Book of Mormon except Cowdery accepted Strang as Joseph Smith's successor after his death. John Whitmer wrote, "Strang reigns in the place of Smith the author and proprietor of the Book of Mormon."³⁸ Strang had allegedly received the following "revelation" about 14 months after Joseph Smith's death:

The Angel of the Lord came unto me... and the light shined about him above the brightness of the sun, and he shewed unto me the plates of the sealed record and he gave into my hands the Urim and Thummim.

And out of the light came the voice of the Lord saying: My Servant James... Behold the record which was sealed from my servant Joseph. Unto thee it is reserved....

Go to the place which the Angel of the presence shall show thee and... take with thee faithful witnesses.... And while I was yet in the Spirit the Angel of the Lord took me away to the hill in the East of Walworth against White River in Voree, and there he shewed unto me the record buried under an oak tree....

... And I beheld it as a man can see a light stone in clear water, for I saw it by Urim and Thummim....³⁹

Even more spectacular, though still with many similarities to the Mormons, were the Shakers, who declared: "Christ has made his second appearance on earth, in a chosen female known by the name of Ann Lee, and acknowledged by us as our blessed Mother in the work of redemption."⁴⁰ This was one of the groups that Martin Harris joined. He seems to have remained faithful to them the rest of his days, claiming "repeatedly that he had as much evidence for [the] Shaker Book as he had for the Book of Mormon... [and that] his testimony is greater than it was of the Book of Mormon."⁴¹ And why not? For there were "Eight Witnesses" who certified that "We, the undersigned, hereby testify that we saw the Holy Angel standing upon the house-top, as mentioned in the fore-going declaration, holding the Roll and Book."⁴² Indeed, there were more than 60 "witnesses" who had a "testimony" concerning the "Sacred Roll and Book" of Shakerism, one of the 60 having had eight different visions.⁴³

The money-digging madness and enthusiasm for divination with "seer stones" were only a small part of a hysteria that pervaded much of the area in which Joseph Smith spent his first 30 years. Sensational visions of angels and other strange sights and sounds were part of everyday conversation and were accepted as normal. Religious "revivals" involving hysteria and fanaticism spread from town to town-so much so that the entire region was called the "burned-over district" of New York State.

Opening the Door to Demonic Power

Instead of joining any of these new religions, however, Joseph Smith started his own. It was only natural that its origin should be linked with the very "glass-looking" and "money-digging" that had obsessed him and his family for years. It seems probable that what began as a money-making scheme (hoping to publish and sell the "translation" of an ancient record "discovered like a treasure in the ground") gathered momentum in another direction and led to the formation of a new religion and finally to the grandiose dream of a theocracy that would one day rule the world. Merely pretending can open the door into Satan's kingdom more easily and efficiently than most people realize.

There are too many examples to be ignored of people who began with make-believe, playing with a Ouija board, crystal ball, pendulum, dowsing rod, or other divination devices (several of which were commonly used by early Mormon Apostles) without even believing in such devices, but were drawn into the occult as a result. There are cases of groups that "pretended" to have a spirit seance when sudden demonic manifestations spontaneously occurred, taking control out of their hands. A classic example is the "Phillip Group" in Toronto, Canada, comprised of skeptical parapsychologists who "pretended" to make contact via table-tipping with a make-believe discarnate spirit they named "Phillip." Rapping sounds began to come from within the table, giving Phillip's "real history." The table danced and finally flew around the room so fast that the parapsychologists had to run to keep up with it.⁴⁴ Similar phenomena were common among early Mormons.

There is no evidence whatever that such power as this has its source within the subconscious or in that 90 percent of the brain that psychologists allege is unused. This theory is pure materialist superstition. There is now a considerable and increasing volume of accumulating testimony from credible modern scientists who have themselves witnessed repeated occurrences of "poltergeist" activity. Attempting to find a materialistic explanation, these careful researchers have meticulously measured angles, intensity of force, and trajectories of flying objects, and have tested every conceivable physical theory-all to no avail.

Anthropologists acknowledge that poltergeist and other occult phenomena are identical everywhere, even among cultures that differ widely and have had no contact with each other. This clearly indicates a common source independent of human knowledge and beliefs. Almost without exception, witch doctors, medicine men, spiritists, and other shamans who repeatedly produce occult phenomena have attributed this power to "spirits." Their identity is betrayed by the fact that a consistent Luciferian philosophy is always implied by occult phenomena wherever or whenever they occur.

Satan presented four basic lies to Eve:* 1) His rejection of what Eve thought God had said denied a personal God who makes moral pronouncements and implied an impersonal Force; 2) since this Force must be in everything, one tree wouldn't kill her if all others were good for food, and therefore we don't die but are merely recycled (through reincarnation and spirit survival); 3) we can all become gods through mastery of this Force; and 4) this mastery or godhood comes about through being initiated into a secret gnosis (e.g., eating of the Tree of Knowledge). Not only are these four basic lies implied by occult phenomena, but they are often communicated audibly (though mediumship), telepathically, by some form of divination (Ouija boards, tarot cards, etc.), or by automatic writing.⁴⁵ This consistency in occult phenomena and philosophy cannot be explained away, no matter how distasteful the conclusion it forces upon skeptical materialists.⁴⁶

The Mormon Connection

Both evidence and logic suggest that in a similar manner to the "Phillip Group," the strong desire on the part of Joseph Smith and his followers to believe his fantastic tales opened the early Mormons to demonic powers. We see a definite and revealing progression: First young Smith uses the "seer stone" to "divine" the location of buried treasure, and then to "translate" unknown languages; later he uses a "Jupiter talisman" for ritual magic; and finally he introduces "magic underwear" (this will be explained later) with occult, Luciferian, Masonic markings that Temple Mormons must wear 24 hours a day for protection from evil. These occult practices are specifically forbidden in the Bible. During this progression of deepening involvement in occultism, we see Smith's theological beliefs metamorphose from the fairly orthodox to the blatant paganism that embraced all of Satan's four lies to Eve, including that of multiplicity of gods and that of infinite human potential to become gods.

There were so many strange visions and so much weird behavior among the early Mormons that to explain it as merely hysteria or hallucinations is inadequate. John Whitmer, official Church Historian in Joseph Smith's time, wrote concerning occult phenomena among the Mormons: "Some had visions... would act like an Indian in the act of scalping... [or] slide or scoot on the floor with the rapidity of a serpent...."⁴⁷ Joseph Smith even wrote:

Soon after the gospel was established in Kirtland... many false spirits were introduced, many strange visions were seen... men ran out of doors under the influence... some got upon the stumps of trees and shouted... [some] had the gift of tongues falsely, they would speak in a muttering, unnatural voice and their bodies be distorted...⁴⁸

There were even phenomena similar to modern UFOs, but in a form that appealed to and could be recognized by viewers in that day. A large number of Mormons saw a huge "steamboat... painted in the finest style... filled with people... [sail] steady along over the city [of Kirtland]... right over the Temple...." One of the "witnesses" to this amazing event wrote in his journal:

Old Elder Beamon, who had died a few months before, was seen standing in the bow of the Boat swinging his hat and singing a well known hymn.⁴⁹

Referring to the dedication of this Temple in Kirtland, Apostle George A. Smith declared:

That evening... four hundred and sixteen people gathered in the house.... David Whitmer bore testimony he saw three angels passing up the south aisle, and there came a shock on the house like the sound of a mighty rushing wind... and hundreds of them were speaking in tongues... or declaring visions...." ⁵⁰

After he left the Church, Whitmer (one of the "Three Witnesses") stated in a newspaper interview:

The great heavenly "visitation" which was alleged to have taken place in the temple... was a grand fizzle. [It] was promised... a veritable day of Pentecost, but there was no visitation. No Peter, James and John; no Moses and Elias put in an appearance.... I know that the story sensationally circulated and which is now on the records of the Utah Mormons as an actual happening was nothing but a trumped up yarns. ⁵¹

Apparently some saw it and some didn't. What about the angel Whitmer claimed to have seen holding the gold plates? Apostle George A. Smith told how some of the Saints saw messages coming to them out of the sky and related a specific instance:

Black Pete got sight of one of those revelations carried by a black angel, he started after it and ran off a steep bank twenty-five feet high, passed through a tree top into the Chagrin river beneath. ⁵²

Playing into Satan's Hands

Another Mormon writer from that time relates:

During the latter part of February, 1831, the Prophet... was ordaining Harvey Whitlock a high priest.... [Whitlock] turned as black as Lyman was white. His fingers were set like claws. He went around the room and showed his hands and tried to speak, his eyes were as the shape of oval O's... ⁵³

Here again we have an obviously evil manifestation, while many others are in the same category but are not as openly demonic. The same writer tells of another occasion when such manifestations continued for hours while Joseph Smith ministered to his followers:

Leman Copley, a very large man of 214 pounds, from his sitting position in the window turned a complete somersault in the house and settled back across a bench where he lay helplessly...

Then another, Harvey Green... began screaming like a panther...

These operations continued all day and into the night.... Levi Hancock [said], "I was so scared... I knew the things I had seen were not made [up]!"⁵⁴

There were so many visions of angels, yet at the same time frightening demonic experiences, that Joseph Smith received a special "revelation" instructing the Saints in how to tell a devil from an angel or a glorified man. In shaking hands with a devil, Smith explained, one would feel nothing, whereas an angel's hand would feel normally physical, while a "glorified man" would refuse to shake hands.⁵⁵ On another occasion the Prophet felt it necessary to warn that Satan had sometimes appeared inside the Temple as an angel of light. He explained that this bad angel could be recognized "by the color of his hair... and by his contradicting a former revelation."⁵⁶

The above represent only a fraction of the documented examples of demonic influence and manifestations. Most of them were accepted as genuine revelations or manifestations from God. The naively superstitious beliefs current among the Mormons about how to handle demons were amplified by such Mormon luminaries as Heber C. Kimball, a member of the First Presidency at the time:

Now I will tell you, I have about a hundred shots on hand all the time—three or four fifteen-shooters, and three or four revolvers, right in the room where I sleep; and the Devil does not like to sleep there, for he is afraid they will go off half-cocked.

If you will lay a bowie knife or a loaded revolver under your pillow every night, you will not have many unpleasant dreams, nor be troubled with the nightmare; for there is nothing that the Devil is so much afraid of as a weapon of death.⁵⁷

The Keystone of Mormonism

Although Brigham Young declared that "you may leave out the Book of Mormon and the Book of Doctrine and Covenants" and just stick with the New Testament and you "will arrive at salvation,"⁵⁸ this is completely contrary to Mormon belief and practice and a perfect example of how Mormon "Prophets" contradict each other. To the question "What will be the consequences if they [the United States] do not embrace the Book of Mormon as a divine revelation?" early Mormon Apostle Orson Pratt replied, "They will be destroyed from the land and sent down to hell, like all other generations who have rejected a divine message."⁵⁹ Joseph Smith said, "Take away the Book of Mormon and the revelations, and where is our religion? We have none."⁶⁰ In one of his most definite statements on the subject, Joseph Smith said:

I told the brethren that the Book of Mormon was the most correct of any book on earth, and the keystone of our religion, and a man would get nearer to God by abiding by its precepts, than by any other book...⁶¹

Obviously, Prophet Smith held the Book of Mormon to be far above the Bible, and that is still the position of the Mormon Church today. This is more than astonishing in view of the fact that over 4000 changes had to be made in the Book of Mormon since it was first published in 1830 with 3000 dollars that Martin Harris raised by mortgaging his farm to get it printed. These corrections run all the way from those necessitated by changes in Joseph Smith's beliefs to elimination of hundreds of obvious contradictions, absurdities, and childish grammatical errors.

After his initiation into the Masonic mysteries, Joseph Smith repudiated and ridiculed the Trinity, teaching that there were an infinite number of gods, each of whom had once been a sinful, fallen man, and that Father, Son, and Holy Spirit are three separate and distinct gods.⁶² This required many "corrections" to the Book of Mormon. First Nephi 1 3:40, for example, which read in the 1830 edition, "and shall make known to all kindreds, tongues and people, that the Lamb of God is the Eternal Father and the Savior of the world" was changed to read "that the Lamb of God is the Son of the Eternal Father." Similar changes were made in a number of other places.⁶³ Strangely enough, however, the declaration in the introduction of the Book of Mormon that its purpose is to convince "Jew and Gentile that Jesus is the Christ, the Eternal God" and the statement of the "Three Witnesses" giving the honor to the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, "which is one God," were apparently overlooked and left unchanged.

The Most Correct Book?

Joseph Smith allegedly saw shining on the "seer stone" in his hat each character from the gold plates and beneath it the English translation, which he would read out to Oliver Cowdery, his scribe. Only when Cowdery had read it back to him correctly after writing it down would the miraculous process go on to the next character. There was no room for error. However, the errors numbered in the hundreds, and were exactly what one would expect from the pen of an imaginative but uneducated young man such as Joseph Smith. B.H.Roberts, eminent Mormon historian and General Authority of the Church, confessed in an unpublished manuscript that the evidence pointed compellingly to Joseph Smith as the book's author:

In the light of this evidence, there can be no doubt as to the possession of a vividly strong, creative imagination by Joseph Smith, the Prophet, an imagination, it could with reason be urged, which, given the suggestions that are to be found in the common knowledge of accepted American Antiquities of the times, supplemented by such a work as Ethan Smith's View of the Hebrews,⁶⁴ would make it possible for him to create a book such as the Book of Mormon....

... There is much internal evidence in the book itself to sustain such a view. In the first place there is a certain lack of perspective in the things the book relates as history that points quite clearly to an undeveloped mind as their origin. The narrative proceeds in characteristic disregard of conditions necessary to its reasonableness, as if it were a tale told by a child, with utter disregard for consistency...

For these absurdities in expression; these miraculous incidents in warfare; these almost mock-and certainly extravagantheroics... are certainly just such absurdities and lapses as would be looked for if a person of such limitations as bounded Joseph Smith undertook to put forth a book dealing with the history and civilization of ancient and unknown peoples....

Could an investigator of the Book of Mormon be much blamed if he were to decide that Ethan Smith's book with its suggestion as to the division of his Israelites into two peoples; with its suggestion of "tremendous wars" between them; and of the savages overcoming the civilized division-led to the fashioning of these same chief things in the Book of Mormon?⁶⁵

In the original printing of the Book of Mormon there were literally scores of places where were was used instead of was ("it were easy to guard them... I were about to write them"), was was used instead of were ("the priests was not to depend... they was angry with me"), and is was used instead of are ("there is save it be, two churches... things which is not seen"). Another common grammatical error that betrayed Joseph Smith's authorship was the insertion of an a in front of verbs: "Ammon and Lamoni was a journeying... he found Muloke a preaching." Other common grammatical mistakes that some of the more educated Mormons found embarrassing and had to be corrected in the second printing were arrested being used when it should have been wrested; arriven instead of arrived; fraid instead of afraid; no instead of any; and numerous other mistakes familiar to any elementary schoolteacher.

King James English in America in 600 B.C.

In the process of "translating" the Book of Mormon by means of his "peep stone" from hieroglyphics on "gold plates," Joseph Smith not only plagiarized several books about early America that were popular in his day, but he also copied entire chapters of the Bible. For example, compare Isaiah 2-14 with 2 Nephi 12-24; Isaiah 48 and 49 with 1 Nephi 20 and 21; and Isaiah 50 and 51 with 2 Nephi 7 and 8. Not content with that, Joseph Smith included, in portions of the Book of Mormon allegedly written in 600-500 B.C., hundreds of quotations from the New Testament. Perhaps he was too rushed, or else it didn't occur to him to paraphrase when plagiarizing. Consequently, the hundreds of quotations from both the Old and New Testaments (without acknowledging they were copied from Joseph Smith's Bible, but as though they came from the "gold plates") are all in King James English, 1500 to 2000 years before that edition of the Bible was published.

Remarkably, these passages of Scripture which the Book of Mormon Prophets allegedly received either independently from God or from ancient sources include not only the verse and chapter divisions from the King James Bible, but even the italics as well. In just one chapter of the Book of Mormon, Mosiah 14, there are 15 italicized words or phrases written exactly as they appear in Isaiah chapter 53. Isn't it a bit beyond belief that the Book of Mormon "Prophet" Nephi, who allegedly wrote during 600 to 500 B.C. in Egyptian hieroglyphics-a picture form of writing-could not only quote Matthew, Luke, Peter, and Paul verbatim centuries before they wrote their Gospels and Epistles, but also do it in such an exact fashion that the translator could see it in King James English as well? This can allow only one explanation: The characters in the Book of Mormon were purely fictitious, and everything they said, including quotations from the Old and New Testaments, was written by Joseph Smith, who certainly had access to the King James Bible.

In Alma 46:15, believers are called Christians in 73 B.C., where Acts 11:26 says they were first called Christians at Antioch in about 42 A.D. The title "Christ" is used in the Book of Mormon, without explanation why Jews living in the Americas would use this Greek word instead of the Hebrew word Messiah. Honey bees are said to be in America about 2000 B.C. in Ether 2:3, yet they were first brought to the New World by the Spanish explorers. In Ether 2:16-3:6 the Jaredites are instructed by God to build barges for the trip across the ocean to America, with holes not only in the top but in the bottom also. They are driven by a "furious wind" that "did never cease to blow" (Ether 6:5,8), yet it took them 344 days to cross the Atlantic. At only three knots per hour, they would have gone around the entire earth during this timespan. The absurdities, incongruities, anachronisms, and contradictions are too numerous to list here and have been covered by a number of authors.

Beyond the Book of Mormon

Prophet Smith repeatedly declared that this miraculously given and translated Book of Mormon contained "the fullness of the everlasting gospel" that he had been called to restore.⁶⁶ However, his "gospel" expanded to include a "god" who was once a sinful man and who is now resurrected in a physical body, who himself has a "Father God" and "Grandfather God" and on endlessly over him; that there are "three degrees of glory," a Mrs. "God" in heaven, no hell or eternal punishment, a premortal state, eternal matter, no creation, no Creator, marriage for eternity, only polygamists become gods, and a whole string of offices under allegedly "restored" Aaronic and Melchizedek Priesthoods, such as Elder, Seventy, High Priests, President of the Church, First Presidency (made up of two Presidents under the Living Prophet), Stake Presidencies, Apostles, Bishoprics, as well as baptism for the dead, etc. It simply wasn't possible to make all of the changes in the Book of Mormon that were required in order to bring it into agreement with the evolving "gospel" of Mormonism as it developed with Joseph Smith's growing involvement in occultism.

Consequently, none of the above found its way into the Book of Mormon in its many revisions. The Book of Mormon contains almost no Mormonism and therefore makes Joseph Smith's original statements that it contained the "fullness of the gospel" look even more foolish today. Yet, the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints continues to publish and praise the Book of Mormon because it has gone so far out on a limb in saying that the message deciphered from the gold plates is the foundation of Mormonism that it is no longer possible to back down graciously.

The Mormon Church is therefore in the uncomfortable position of having to take seriously the childishly naive and contradictory content of the Book of Mormon and the poorly conceived mythology concerning its "discovery." The embarrassing truth about an amateur fortune-teller named Joseph Smith, who was addicted all his life to seeking buried treasure and had been convicted of working a cheap scam, has to be suppressed.

What happens if questions are raised about the absurdities, grammatical errors, the contradictions, or the complete lack of archaeological evidence? These are taken care of by a subjective feeling that conveniently overrides common sense and all facts. The "burning in the bosom" is regarded as the manifestation of the Holy Ghost mentioned in Moroni 10:4. The Mormon missionaries' suggestions that prospective converts pray for this "burning" is extremely important in perpetuating the delusion of Mormonism because it sidesteps facts and substitutes feelings. The Book of Mormon promise is that those who "ask with a sincere heart" and have "faith in Christ" will receive this "sign." No one wants to be looked upon as insincere or lacking in faith, so there is a very strong desire to have this "feeling," which the very desire itself could psychologically create.

The most important part of Mormonism-its very heart-which we will reveal, has been so secret that the inner circle of Mormon elite who practice it must swear oaths to forfeit their lives rather than reveal it. Prophet Smith claimed to have received these key "revelations" from extraterrestrials visiting him from a distant planet. A hint at the identity of the "gods" from Kolob who inspired him is found in the fact that these "keys" to "godhood" are not unique to Mormonism as most Mormons imagine. They have been the stock-in-trade of numerous secret occult societies for centuries. One of these groups, to which Mormonism has a surprising and significant relationship, is both well-known and highly respected today. An extremely large percentage of today's world leaders have sworn its secret oaths.

THE MASONIC CONNECTION

The annual convention of the Mormon History Association held in the aging, historic Nauvoo Hotel on April 20, 1974, had been pretty much routine all day like those before it: old friends meeting once again, familiar ground gone over in an attempt to find some new light that would build faith in the Prophet and strengthen testimonies of the Church. The surprise came-and what a shock it was-when Dr. Reed C. Durham, Jr., the Association's outgoing president, gave the traditional Presidential Address. As he strode to the podium with his sheaf of papers, there was prolonged applause for a popular leader who had given himself enthusiastically to the cause of establishing a faith-promoting history of the Latter-day Saints. When the applause subsided and he began to read his carefully prepared paper on the touchy subject of the relationship between Masonry and Mormonism, a few eyebrows were raised and an uncomfortable hush settled over the uneasy listeners. No one, however, perhaps even including Dr. Durham himself, suspected the explosive power of the bomb he was about to drop.

There was no question as to the facts, nor that the information had been available to everyone present. Much of it they had heard before: the close similarities between Mormon and Masonic Temple ceremonies with their secret names, aprons, penalties, blood oaths, grips, and tokens, as well as the many Masonic markings inside and outside Mormon Temples: the square, the compass, the beehive, the astrological symbols, the all-seeing eye of occultism, and the upside-down five-pointed star, symbol of Satanism. Though it was unsettling to be reminded again that absolutely nothing had been said about secret Temple rituals by Joseph Smith in the new Church's 12-year history until immediately after he had been initiated into Masonry, those present had been able to shrug that off before, and did so on this occasion with only slight twinges of conscience. So what else was new?

What followed near the end of Durham's talk, however, wakened with a start those who had been dozing while the lights were out for viewing his slide presentation. The audience was stunned. Why hadn't they seen this before? The connection was obvious and had always been there, clear as crystal. They just hadn't wanted to see it, because the implication was too devastating. But now they had no choice-Dr. Durham had forced them to look at something so incriminating that Joseph Smith's credentials as a Prophet were torn to tatters.

The Masonic Legend of Enoch

Thanks to the diligence and courage of a very few people who had brought their tape recorders, the staggering speech was soon in "underground" circulation. Typed copies surfaced almost immediately in such diverse places as Masonic Lodges and the briefcases of BYU professors. It was awesome to see how quickly the Mormon hierarchy knew what had been said and took action because of it. The very next day the angel with its Masonic markings that Dr. Durham had referred to in his talk was hastily removed from its Visitor's Center display in Nauvoo, Illinois, never to be seen in public again. Professor Durham himself barely escaped being removed from the Church by writing a hasty "To whom it may concern" letter reaffirming his faith in Prophet Smith and the Church he founded.

After explaining about the Jupiter talisman found on Joseph Smith at his death, the occult powers associated with it, and the fact that his mother's family identified this as "Joseph's Masonic jewel," Dr. Durham reminded his audience that he had set out to "provoke some thought and present something new" concerning the undeniable relationship between Mormonism and Masonry. "If I have not succeeded in doing that by now," he added, "please indulge me one last further attempt." They soon wished they hadn't.

He then launched into a brief summary of "a famous legend which the grand orator elaborates in lecture form in the ceremonies of the 13th, 14th and 21st degrees of Masonry... bearing remarkable similarity to Mormonism." Referring to the ancient roots of this tale in "cabalistic lore and mythology," Durham then pointed out that "the legend was in American Masonic print by 1802; and by Joseph Smith's time many publications had made the legend popularly well disseminated."¹ The summary he then gave of the legend must have stunned his Mormon audience, for it contains not only the key esoteric doctrines of Mormonism as they evolved beyond the original semiorthodoxy of the Book of Mormon, but also the major elements in Joseph Smith's story, including his role in finding and translating the alleged gold plates. In his introductory summary of the Masonic legend, Dr. Durham said:

... In the pre-existence, there was a special Secret Doctrine that was given by Deity... to the Earth first to Adam [who] was to carefully guard this Secret Doctrine because it contained all the Mysteries... [including] the secret name of God.

Adam then bestowed it upon his son, Seth, who guarded it very carefully-only among the inner circle of believers-and then it was handed down until it came to Enoch... the central figure in the legend.

It is with Enoch that the remarkable resemblances with Joseph Smith and Mormon history become disconcertingly clear.²

A Devastating Comparison

The similarities between this ancient Masonic legend about Enoch, and the mythology that Joseph Smith et al. managed to establish concerning his alleged exploits in finding and translating the gold plates, are too numerous and exact to allow any other explanation than the most obvious one. As Dr. Durham said that night to his stunned audience of fellow Mormon historians, "The parallels [to the legend of Enoch] of Joseph Smith and the history of Mormonism are so unmistakable that to explain them only as coincidence would be ridiculous."³

In the legend, Enoch was 25 years old "when he received his call and vision," as was Joseph Smith "when he brought forth his sacred record." Enoch's vision was of a hill containing a vault prepared for "sacred treasures," on which he saw the identifying letter M; while Joseph Smith was led by an "angel" whose name began with M to a similar hill containing an underground vault (like Enoch's) filled with "sacred treasures." Part of the treasures revealed to Enoch were gold and brass plates engraved with Egyptian hieroglyphics giving the history of the world and ancient mysteries of God, which he preserved by putting them in the vault in the hill; similarly, Joseph Smith recovered from a vault in a hill gold and brass plates engraved with Egyptian hieroglyphics containing ancient history and mysteries of God. Enoch's treasure also included a metal ball, a priestly breastplate, and the fabled "Urim and Thummim"-precisely the same objects that were found by Joseph Smith along with the gold plates.

If the above sounds like an impossible coincidence, there is more. Joseph Smith often referred to himself in his "revelations" as "Enoch,"⁴ claiming that he had been given this name by God. The Enoch of the legend was chosen to recover and preserve for mankind the sacred name of God; and Joseph Smith was allegedly chosen to recover and "restore" the everlasting gospel of God to the earth. Enoch buried the sacred record to preserve it just before a great disaster (the Flood), foreseeing that after the deluge "an Israelitish descendant would discover anew the sacred buried treasure." Enoch "placed a stone lid, or slab, over the cavity into the hill," exactly as Moroni did in the Book of Mormon when he buried his record as the only survivor of the disaster (great battle) that destroyed his entire nation. Joseph Smith, who recovered this record, claimed to be an Israelite, fitting the vision of Enoch even in this regard.

Of course, in the Masonic legend it was "Solomon and his builders, the Masons, while building and excavating for the Temple at Mount Moriah, who discovered the cavern and the sacred treasure." The legend relates that, like Joseph Smith, they were able to obtain it only after three unsuccessful attempts. Three wicked men, however, tried to force "one of the faithful Masons who had discovered the treasure, Hiram Abif, or Hiram the Widow's son, to reveal the hiding place and the contents of the hidden treasure." He would not; and as they were killing him, "Hiram, with uplifted hands, cried out, 'Oh Lord, my God, is there no help for the widow's son?' This has since become a general Masonic distress call." There were three faithful Masons who pursued the villains, and cut off the head of one of them with his own sword. Dr. Durham ended his disquieting talk by summarizing some of the other "coincidences" involved:

Joseph Smith had three witnesses to the Book of Mormon and the record itself bears witness that an archvillain named Laban... [who] was thwarting the availability... of the sacred records had his head cut off by his own sword....

Now these parallels, dramatic as they seem, still do not represent the strangest part of the story. All of these aspects of the legend seem transformed into the history of Joseph Smith, so much so that it even appears to be a kind of symbolic acting out of Masonic lore.

But there is a point in this drama where the action goes beyond metaphor and the symbol merges into a tragic reality. This has to do, of course, with the death of Hiram Abif in the legend and the martyrdom of Joseph Smith....

Joseph Smith gave himself up to be imprisoned and on June 27, 1844 a mob stormed the little Carthage jail. Hyrum [Smith] was killed instantly and John Taylor seriously wounded.

Joseph Smith, Master Mason and widow's son, went to the window and with upraised hands, commenced giving the Masonic distress call to fraternal Masons who were present in the mob: "Oh Lord, my God..." He was unable to complete his plea and fell out of the window to his death.

How does a Mormon historian interpret Joseph Smith and the Masonic Enoch legend? The parallels demand an answer. Was Joseph Smith the fruition of Enoch's prophecy?... Did mysterious and divine, even magical, forces attach themselves to him?

Can anyone deny that Masonic influence on Joseph Smith and the Church, either before or after his personal Masonic membership? The evidence demands comments.... I do not believe that the Nauvoo story can adequately be told without an inquiry into Masonry.⁵

In fact, Masonry played a key role in the myths in which Joseph Smith wrapped Mormonism. As we shall see, Joseph's brother Hyrum was a member of the Mount Moriah Lodge No. 1 12 in Palmyra, New York. Its responsibility was the perpetuation of the Legend of Enoch, the cloth from which much of the fabric of Mormonism was formed.

The Pagan/Occult Connection Again

Although Joseph Smith claimed he was "restoring" true biblical Christianity, leading Mormons have admitted that Mormonism is actually a revival of the key doctrines of the mystery religions that Milton R. Hunter called "the pagan rivals of Christianity." Masonry likewise claims to be the restorer and perpetrator of the ancient mysteries, including the Secret Doctrine and identity of God.

There can be no doubt that Joseph Smith received a great deal of inspiration from Masonry. It is clear that this happened over a period of time. As we shall see, both the Melchizedek Priesthood and the alleged "First Vision" (which, in spite of its nine contradictory versions, is the foundation of Mormonism) show a progression in Prophet Smith's ideas that betrays a definite and growing influence from Masonry. The entire Mormon mythology about the gold plates is so similar in so many details to the Masonic Legend of Enoch that no rational person could deny the intimate connection. Clearly the Masonic Legend of Enoch inspired the story that made Joseph Smith both famous and infamous and won him the allegiance of millions of people who call him a Prophet of God.

The gradual theological metamorphosis in Joseph Smith from almost biblical beliefs (as expressed in the original printings of the Book of Mormon and Book of Commandments) to a polytheism that denied hell and promised godhood to the worthy on the basis of secret pagan Temple rituals is also consistent with the growing Masonic influence upon him. In that same talk, Dr. Durham documented the part that Masonry played and gave substantial evidence concerning its undeniable, dominating influence in the formation of Mormonism:

I am convinced that in the study of Masonry lies a pivotal key to further understanding Joseph Smith and the Church.... The many parallels found between early Mormonism and the Masonry of that day are substantial: conferences, councils, priesthood, temples, anointing with oil, the issuance of licenses, certificates for identifying legitimate fellow workers [called Temple Recommends by Mormons], elders, high priests and even the Book of the Law... [plus] things Egyptian, the new revelations of suns and moons, governing planets and fixed stars [while] unique at that time to Mormonism were commonplace in Masonry.

... Most of the things which were developed in the Church at Nauvoo were inextricably interwoven with Masonry-in addition to the endowment, the temple and the Relief Society.... I suspect also that the development of prayer circles and even polygamy are no exceptions.

But more importantly, I suggest that enough evidence presently exists to declare that the entire institution of the political kingdom of God, including the Council of Fifty, the living constitution, the proposed flag of the kingdom, and the anointing and coronation of the king, had its genesis in connection with Masonic thought and ceremonies. It could not be coincidence that all of these concepts had their counterparts within Masonry in the day of the Prophet Joseph Smith.⁶

By the end of his speech that night, Dr. Durham had left very little of Mormonism-at least of those peculiar elements that distinguish it from Christianity-that he had not traced back directly to Masonry as the source of inspiration. That influence began with the Enoch legend that undoubtedly inspired Smith's entire scenario of obtaining the gold plates after three unsuccessful attempts and escaping from villains who tried to steal them. It continued through the many Masons who were drawn to Mormonism (along with many members from other secret societies) and became an increasing factor as their ranks swelled within the new Church. In spite of that, however, during the first 12 years of Mormonism's history nothing of the secret inner workings of Masonry came into the Church. It can hardly be a coincidence that it was only after Joseph Smith himself became a Mason and participated in secret Masonic rituals that Masonry literally transformed Mormonism. As Dr. Durham reminded his audience:

To begin with, Masonry in the Church had its origin prior to the time Joseph Smith became a Mason. Nauvoo was not its genesis. It commenced in Joseph's home when his older brother... Hyrum received the first three degrees of Masonry in Mount Moriah Lodge No. 112 of Palmyra, New York, at about the same time that Joseph was being initiated into the presence of God and angels and was being entrusted with the sacred gold plates.

By the end of 1832, Joseph Smith had welcomed new brethren, along with their influences, into the Church. Men such as W.W. Phelps, Brigham Young, Heber C. Kimball and Newel K. Whitney, each of whom had been deeply involved in Masonry...

At the instigation of John C. Bennett, George W. Harris, John Parker, Lucius Scovil, as well as other Mormon Masons residing at Nauvoo, and certainly with the approval of the hierarchy of the Church, the institution of Masonry commenced.

Joseph and Sidney were inducted into formal Masonry at Sight, on the same day upon which the Illinois Grand Master Mason... Abraham Jonas officially installed the Nauvoo Lodge. It was on March 15, 1842. On the next day, both Sidney and Joseph advanced to the Master Mason Degree.

In only a few years, five Mormon Lodges were established, several others in planning, a Masonic Temple constructed, and the total membership of Mormon fraternal brethren was over 1,366.

... Masonic influences upon Joseph in the early Church history... were significant. However, these same Masonic influences exerted a more dominant character as reflected in the further expansion of the Church subsequent to the Prophet's Masonic membership.

In fact, I believe that there are few significant developments in the Church, that occurred after March 15, 1842, which did not have some Masonic interdependence.... There is absolutely no question in my mind that the Mormon ceremony which came to be known as the Endowment, introduced by Joseph Smith to Mormon Masons initially, just a little over one month after he became a Mason, had an immediate inspiration from Masonry.

It is also obvious that the Nauvoo Temple architecture was in part, at least, Masonically influenced. Indeed, it appears that there was an intentional attempt to utilize Masonic symbols and motifs.⁷

The "True Masonry"

Captivated by the Masonic Legend of Enoch, Joseph Smith had taken this name for himself.⁸ His entire story about finding gold and brass plates with hieroglyphics, the Urim and Thummim, etc., clearly came from this Masonic legend. In further introducing Masonry into his growing Church, however, Mormonism's founding Prophet could not go much beyond what was common knowledge. Although growing numbers of practicing Masons were becoming Latter-day Saints, these men had been sworn to secrecy upon penalty of death, so were limited in what they could divulge even to their Prophet. In spite of having earlier denounced all secret societies,⁹ Joseph Smith seems to have become increasingly intrigued by Masonry's cloak of secrecy.

Whether drawn into Masonry on that account or not, soon thereafter he turned the Mormon Church into a secret society with the same tokens, signs, and horrible penalty (throat slit, heart and vitals torn out) for revealing Temple secrets (as in Masonry). Once initiated, Prophet Smith discovered in detail what he already knew only in part—that Masonry, like Mormonism, is a secret, anti-Christian mystery religion, as those who know it best have admitted:

Every Masonic Lodge is a temple of religion, and its teachings are instructions in... the universal, eternal, immutable religion....¹¹

Without this religious element it would scarcely be worthy of cultivation by the wise and good....

Freemasonry is not Christianity.... It admits men of every creed within its hospitable bosom....¹²

The first Masonic legislator whose memory is preserved to us by history was Buddha....

[Masonry]... sees in Moses... in Confucius and Zoroaster, in Jesus of Nazareth, and in [Mohammed] great teachers of morality and eminent reformers....¹³

All truly dogmatic religions have issued from the Kabalah [Judaic occultism] and return to it. Everything scientific and grand in the religious dreams of the Illuminati, Jacob Boehme, Swedenborg, Saint-Martin and others is borrowed from the Kabalah; all the Masonic associations owe to it their secrets and their symbols.¹⁴

It is clear why Joseph Smith had such a fascination with Masonry and found so much of it useful: Like Mormonism, it opposes historic Christianity. He claimed that heavenly visitors told him that all Christians were corrupt and all their creeds an abomination, and that he was to "restore" the "true" religion. Obviously Joseph Smith believed that it was closer to the truth than Christianity was, because visitors from Kolob had allegedly told him not to join any Christian church on earth-yet he joined the Masons, a secret religious society.

Masonry's claim-that the "true religion," once pure in the mystery religions but corrupted by the world at large, was recovered by King Solomon's Masons and has since been preserved within the secrets of Freemasonry-is too close to Joseph Smith's claims concerning Mormonism's "restoration" of the gospel to be coincidence. However, Joseph Smith could not give credit to anyone except himself, for the same reason that the Mormon Church today dare not admit that most of its inner secrets are Masonic in origin. Smith was the "Prophet," and he had to keep it that way. Having joined Freemasonry, the Prophet proceeded to change its dogmas just enough so that he could take credit for them as his "revelations." He had undertaken the task of personally revising the entire Christian Bible by "revelation," and he now did the same thing with Masonry.

Just as Joseph Smith had called Mormonism the "true Christianity," so Mormonism must also be the "true Masonry," and this is what he called it. He convinced his followers of this, including those who had been Masons for years. Heber C. Kimball wrote to Parley P. Pratt:

We have organized a Lodge here of Masons... near 200 have been made Masons. Brother Joseph and Sidney [Rigdon] were the first that were received into the Lodge. All of the twelve have become members except Orson P. [Pratt].... Brother Joseph says Masonry was taken from the Priesthood, but has become degenerated.... We have the true Masonry.¹⁵

In his speech, Dr. Durham referred to a letter written by Joseph Smith to a Mr. John Hull, a Congregational minister who had been active in Masonry "for over 40 years [and]... had held every office in Masonry up to and including Worshipful Master of the Lodge." Of this letter, Durham said:

The entire two-page letter clearly demonstrates that Mormonism and Masonry were related and that Joseph used Masonry and apparently had no qualms in doing so.

It is also clear in the letter that the Kingdom of God was thought to be the true Masonry, which, when ultimately established with a king and a president, would abolish all earthly confusion and evil and usher in the Millennium.

The whole earth was compared symbolically to a Grand Masonic Lodge, the counterpart of which was the Grand Lodge in the eternal regions of Glory; an idea quite legitimate in Masonic thought....

It appears that the Prophet first embraced Masonry, and then in the process he modified, expanded, amplified or glorified it.¹⁶

The Pagan, Anti-Christian Mysteries "Restored"

Masonry became so popular among the Mormons after Joseph Smith and Sidney Rigdon were initiated that the Mormon Masonic Lodges were soon outgrowing non-Mormon Lodges by a very wide margin. It wasn't long before "the Nauvoo Lodge had more members than all the other Illinois lodges together."¹⁷ If they had been allowed to continue, it appears that the Mormons would have taken over Masonry. Moreover, in the process, they were initiating subtle changes in long-established Masonic rituals under the direction of their Prophet, who was now actively engaged in "restoring" Masonry as he had Christianity. Unwilling to have Joseph Smith eventually take over as Grand Commander, the Masonic hierarchy expelled the Mormons. In justification of this move, one Masonic historian wrote:

If the [Nauvoo] Lodge had been suffered to work two years longer, every Mormon in Hancock County would have been initiated.¹⁸

What was happening at the same time within Mormonism is quite clear. On May 4, 1842, less than two months after he had been initiated into Masonry, Joseph Smith introduced what is known today as the Mormon Temple Endowment Ceremony. It was the Masons among the Mormons who were the first to be initiated by the Prophet into these secret rites, which can only be called Mormon Masonry. This was done in the very same room that was used for Masonic rituals by the Nauvoo Lodge. Mormon historian B.H. Roberts explained that the room "in which were instituted these sacred ceremonies" was not only used as the first Mormon Temple (before construction of the Nauvoo Mormon Temple), but "it was also the place of meeting for the Nauvoo Lodge of Free Masons."¹⁹

Thus were originated the secret functions of the "power and priesthoods" of Lucifer, which form the very core of Mormonism. No honest investigator can deny that this all came out of Masonry's mystery religion heritage. The Prophet accepted this pagan source and even claimed to "restore" its original purity by "revelation" from God. Jesse C. Little testified: "The Angel of the Lord brought to Mr. Joseph Smith the lost key words of several [Masonic] degrees, which caused him, when he appeared among the brotherhood of Illinois, to work right ahead of the highest and to show them their ignorance of the greatest truth and benefits of Masonry."²⁰ At about the same time, Joseph Fielding wrote in his diary:

Many have joined the Masonic Institution. This seems to have been a stepping stone for preparation for something else, the true origin of Masonry. This I have also seen and rejoice in it.

There has been great light poured out upon the Saints of late, and a great spirit of hearing. I have evidence enough that Joseph is not fallen.

I have seen him, after giving, as he said before, the origin of Masonry, the Kingdom of God on the earth, and am myself a member of it.²¹

These were exciting days among the Mormons, for they saw the introduction for the first time into Mormonism of those secrets that now form its very heart. In a letter to Orson Pratt, Heber C. Kimball wrote:

We have received some precious things through the Prophet on the Priesthood which would cause your soul to rejoice. I cannot give them to you on paper, for they are not to be written. So you must come and get them for yourself.²²

These secrets that Joseph Smith began to introduce out of Masonry's mysteries he declared "were to be discerned, unlocked, unraveled, and appropriately unfolded unto the Church, line upon line, by the one who holds the keys [Smith himself] of the Holy Priesthood." Commenting upon this, Durham said, "... If Masonry in reality contained any of the true ancient Mysteries, it would have been necessary for Joseph to accept it."²³ Thus Dr. Durham, along with other Mormon leaders, in attempting to justify Joseph Smith's borrowing from Masonry, acknowledges that the "truth" that Mormonism is founded upon is not the Bible, but "the true ancient Mysteries" of pagan occultism. Reinforcing this point, Dr. Durham told his audience:

The philosophic and more reflective Masonic scholars have always believed that the symbols embodied in Masonry were indeed the ancient Mysteries coming from remote antiquity.

The Mysteries were said to be traced back through the Hermetic Philosophers, through Plutarch, the Cabala, the Pythagoreans, the Magi of Media, to Babylon, to Chaldea, and Egypt.

And as these Mysteries came down into the modern institution of Masonry-the 12th and 13th centuries A.D.-they had experienced so many progressive alterations that there remained only an imperfect image of their original brilliancy.

My assumption is that Joseph Smith believed he was restoring Masonry's original pristine brilliancy, and that he was recreating the Mysteries of the ancient Priesthood.²⁴

The Mystery: Lucifer's Power and Priesthoods

Certainly "the ancient Priesthood" that Durham suggests Joseph Smith "restored" first to Mormon Masonry and then to Mormonism itself was not a biblical priesthood, but a pagan one preserved within the mystery religions. That this is the Luciferic priesthood is equally clear. Freemasonry teaches that the earliest traditions have passed on the knowledge that the demons forbade Adam to eat of the Tree of Knowledge, but that the Angel of Light (Lucifer, the Light-bearer) helped Adam to eat of the forbidden fruit for his own enlightenment. This is too similar to the teachings of Mormonism to be mere coincidence. Many Mormons are not aware of Mormonism's real teachings, because they are not considered "worthy" to be initiated into its secrets. It is interesting to see what Albert Pike, a leading Masonic authority, said about this technique of deliberately keeping the uninitiated in ignorance:

Masonry, like all the religions, all the Mysteries, Hermeticism and Alchemy, conceals its secrets from all except the Adepts and Sages, or the Elect, and uses false explanations and misinterpretations of its symbols to mislead those who deserve only to be misled; to conceal the Truth, which it calls light, from them.... Truth is not for those who are unworthy...²⁵

The Blue Degrees are but the outer court... of the Temple. Part of the symbols are displayed there to the [lower] Initiate, but he is intentionally misled by false interpretations. It is not intended that he shall understand them, but it is intended that he shall imagine he understands them.²⁶

In its highest form, for those who have attained to the secret knowledge of the mystery, Masonry is a Luciferic religion. Similarly, we have already seen Luciferic secrets in the Mormon Temple ceremonies. Like Masonry, after which its innermost secrets are patterned, Mormonism is designed to mislead those who are part of it but haven't yet been initiated into its dark secrets?²⁷

Why is there in Masonry this deliberate design in the symbols both to mislead the uninitiated and yet at the same time to provide sufficient hints of the "truth" for those who are "worthy" to understand it? As in Mormonism, the answer is that the "mystery" is too shocking to be revealed to those at the lower levels. What is this "mystery" that only the very few at the highest levels of Masonry (and Mormonism) are intended to understand? Manly P.Hall, one of the world's foremost experts in occultism, explains:

When the Mason... has learned the Mystery of his craft, the seething energies of Lucifer are in his hand and before he may step onward and upward, he must prove his ability to properly apply [this] energy.²⁸

In Morals and Dogma, Masonic Grand Commander Albert Pike wrote:

LUCIFER, the Light-bearer. Strange and mysterious name to give to the Spirit of Darkness. Lucifer, the Son of the Morning. Is it he who bears the Light, and with its splendors intolerable blinds feeble, sensual, or selfish Souls? Doubt it not!²⁹ (emphases in original).

Is Pike for or against Lucifer? We are not to doubt that Lucifer blinds; but he does it with the "Light," and only to the "feeble, sensual, or selfish." So Pike, far from slandering Lucifer, is complaining against those who have given the name "Spirit of Darkness" to the one who is the true "Lightbearer... the Son of the Morning." Pike writes in a way that only initiates will understand. However, when he addressed the leaders of World Freemasonry, then he reportedly spoke plainly:

To you, Sovereign Grand Inspectors General, we say this, that you may repeat it to the Brethren of the 32nd, 31st and 30th degrees The Masonic Religion should be, by all of us initiates of the high degrees, maintained in the purity of the Luciferian Doctrine.

If Lucifer were not God, would Adonay whose deeds prove his cruelty, perfidy and hatred of man, barbarism and revulsion for science, would Adonay and his priests calumniate him?

Yes, Lucifer is God, and unfortunately Adonay is also god... for the absolute can only exist as two gods....

Thus, the doctrine of Satanism is a heresy; and the true and pure philosophical religion is the belief in Lucifer, the equal of Adonay; but Lucifer, God of Light and God of Good, is struggling for humanity against Adonay, the God of Darkness and Evil.³⁰

Adonay is a Hebrew title translated "Lord" in the Old Testament and used only when referring to Jehovah, the one true God of Israel, who is also the God of Christians. Masonry has taken the anti-God philosophy of the mystery religions that reverse what the Bible teaches, turning Lucifer (Satan) into God and God into Satan. This is the religion that Joseph Smith and about 1500 early Mormons embraced enthusiastically before they were expelled from Masonry. According to no less an authority than Dr. Reed Durham, this is also the religion that determined almost every major doctrine and practice in Mormonism.

SACRED OR SECRET?

Housing various depictions of Mormon history presented in a way that is calculated to win converts and avoid any embarrassing details, Visitor's Centers are to be found adjacent to most Mormon Temples around the world. Salt Lake City's Temple Square boasts two such propaganda centers. The North Visitor's Center houses the giant statue of Christ, "large murals of Bible scenes, and displays about Mormon history and beliefs."¹ The South Center contains information "about the Book of Mormon, Christ's visit to ancient America, and why Mormons build temples."² In addition to artistic representations of Mormon beliefs, each such center around the world offers a series of pamphlets distributed to visitors without charge to persuade recipients that the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints is the only true Christian church on earth.

In his 1974 Mormon History Association speech, Dr. Reed C. Durham's reference to the angel with Masonic markings caused its hasty removal from its South Visitor's Center display in historic Temple Square. However, something else that belonged in the secret archives with the Masonic angel and other embarrassing memorabilia was housed in the very beautiful North Visitor's Center adjacent to the Salt Lake City Temple, at the time of this book's release. The piece of art in question was an impressive bronze statue depicting Adam and Eve kneeling in an act of worship as they face an altar between them.

The very primitive altar depicted was built of stones piled carefully on top of each other, and probably represented that fabled sacrificial site just outside the Garden of Eden that Joseph Smith claimed to have discovered in Missouri. Ignoring that peculiar idea, the statuary portrayed a message that was extremely revealing to anyone who has studied the mystery religions and occultism.

Quenching the Flaming Sword

We are told that when Adam and Eve were expelled from the garden paradise because of their sin, it was to keep them and their descendants from eating of the Tree of Life and living forever. Clearly, God didn't want to allow man to perpetuate himself in a fallen state of rebellion that has brought increasing evil and suffering upon the human race as humans have multiplied across the earth. Not only would it not have been kind or wise to do so, but God had in mind something better. He promised that the Messiah, "the Seed of the woman"³ (i.e., virgin-born), would one day come and deal the Serpent a deathblow.

That God cannot reverse the consequences of sin by simply waving a magic wand of forgiveness is taught again and again in the Bible, as well as by history and human experience. Something so deep within man has gone so horribly wrong as a result of his self-willed rebellion that education, semantics, personal determination, or psychological techniques can never solve the basic problem. Nothing less than the death of the rebels-and out of death the creation of new beings-can return man to fellowship with God. This is the clear message of the cherubim that God stationed with a flaming sword to guard the Tree of Life when he expelled Adam and Eve.⁴

God was not saying that man would never taste the fruit of that tree, which symbolizes eternal life. In the last chapter of the Bible, man is back in Paradise and freely eating of the Tree of Life.⁵ The message in Genesis 3 is consistently echoed throughout the Bible: that in order to get to the Tree of Life, men must pass the flaming sword of judgment which brings the death that God pronounced as the penalty for sin. Rejecting the Serpent's lie that death is unreal, humans must admit that, having sinned, they deserve to die. We must confess that sin is so horrible that God's judgment of the death penalty is just.

Unfortunately, humanity continued to rebel by complaining against the death penalty that God imposed. Our primary instinct is self-preservation. We flee from that sword and try every device to escape the just penalty we deserve for our sin. We have good reason, for we recognize that the death required by justice would be eternal.

In His mercy and grace, God had a plan to save us from the eternal separation that justice demanded. Since He is infinite, God could pay that infinite debt to justice. In order to do so righteously, however, He had to become as one of us, a member of the human race. This He did through the virgin birth. As the "Seed of the woman," Jesus Christ the Son of God never ceased to be God, and He will never cease to be man. As the sinless Lamb of God, He could die for our sins; having paid that infinite debt, death could not hold Him. He resurrected and is now alive, having conquered death for us. He offers to give eternal life to all who will receive Him as Savior and Lord, and He does this by coming to live in each heart and life that opens to Him.

Here the symbolism of the flaming sword and the Tree of Life is fulfilled. In contrast to all other humans-who fled that sword of judgment and death-Jesus walked up to it and took it in His heart for us. Thus he became the Savior, the way to life for all who will accept Him as "the way, the truth, and the life" that He claimed to be. Some unknown poet put it beautifully:

His blood that flaming sword must quench, His heart its sheath must be.

Followers of Cain

In expelling Adam and Eve from Paradise, God stripped them of the figleaf aprons that they had made in an attempt to cover their sin by their own efforts. He replaced this inadequate covering, this attempt at self-righteousness, with the skins of animals that had to be killed in order to clothe them. The message was clear: Sin really does bring death in spite of the Serpent's claim that death is unreal and his seductive promise that Adam and Eve could become like God.

In keeping with the rest of the Bible, Adam and Eve must have been instructed to sacrifice animals as sin offerings to God symbolizing the sacrifice upon the cross that Christ would make as the "Lamb of God who takes away the sin of the world."⁶ We are told that Abel offered a lamb to God "by faith"⁷; and since "faith comes by... hearing the word of God,"⁸ he must have offered this kind of a sacrifice in response to a command from God. Surely his parents, Adam and Eve, also followed the same instructions in the sacrifice they offered to God.

We are told that Cain refused to offer a lamb. Perhaps he believed in the sacredness of all life, like Hindus and today's animal rights extremists, and on the grounds of "nonviolence" refused to kill an animal. Instead, he offered the works of his hands in the form of the fruits and vegetables from the garden that he so industriously labored over. As Abel's sacrifice of the lamb symbolized the sacrifice of Christ, so Cain's offering symbolized the selfrighteous insistence that good works can pay for sin. God rejected Cain's offering and told him that a "sin offering" crouched at his door.⁹ Though he proudly refused to kill an animal as a sacrifice for his sins, Cain murdered his own brother Abel, because Abel did offer the lamb that God had commanded.

In view of the above, it is most interesting that the bronze statue in the North Visitor's Center portrayed Adam and Eve kneeling before an altar that contains fruits, vegetables, and a sheaf of wheat-the very offering of Cain that God rejected! The lamb that Abel offered and which was accepted of God is also shown in the statue. Significantly, however, it is not dead upon the altar as the symbol of Christ's sacrifice for sin, but is shown very much alive, posing contentedly and untethered in front of the altar, like the sin offering that God said was lying at Cain's door, but which he refused to sacrifice as commanded.

Not long after this book was first published exposing Mormonism's complete misunderstanding of God's reasons for His actions with Cain, Ed was in Salt Lake City and visited the statue. Ed describes the event: "I happened to be in the Visitor Center and fell into a group of tourists being guided through the center by a Mormon hostess. When we came up to the statue of Adam and Eve kneeling at the altar, I let out an audible gasp. Pointing my finger at the statue, I kept repeating in a shaky voice, 'Look! Look!' over and over again until the lady cried out, 'What? in a loud wail. 'It's the offering of Cain!' I wailed back."

Two weeks later, without a word of explanation, the statuary was removed from the building and went into exile and obscurity somewhere out of sight and mind. Today, it has been replaced with a statue of Adam and Eve standing apart from each other, looking for all the world to be in a total state of confusion.

The Missing Cross

It is not only in that revealing piece of statuary in the North Visitor's Center that the Mormon Church has openly aligned itself with Cain's religion of self-effort. Mormonism teaches and practices the same thing: that Latter-day Saints must prove their worthiness and earn eternal life by obedience to thousands of laws and ordinances, and repetitive performances of secret Temple rituals. This is because Mormonism denies that Jesus Christ, the Lamb of God, died for our sins and thereby purchased eternal life to be given as a free gift of God's grace to all who receive Him by faith. Because they reject the full value of Christ's blood poured out in death for sin on the cross, Mormons take bread and water at their communion services instead of bread and wine (or grape juice) as Christ commanded; and they display no cross inside or outside their chapels and Temples, but do display many Masonic and other occult symbols. Mormons have an almost fanatical aversion to the cross and the shed blood of Jesus Christ.

In the official LDS booklet Plan of Salvation, there are detailed explanations of Mormonism's peculiar theories under such headings as "Premortal Life of Christ," "Why We are Here," "Faith and Signs," "Baptism," "The Laying On of Hands," "Christ Visits the Spirit World," and "Salvation for the Dead." Nowhere in the entire booklet, however, does it state that Christ died for our sins or that eternal life is offered as a free gift of God's grace to all who receive it by faith; none of the many Bible verses that state this is quoted;¹⁰ and, in fact, exactly the opposite is taught in that booklet. Under the heading of "Faith," it is explained that "the commandments of God are obeyed only by those who have faith that blessings will follow their obedience."¹¹ In contrast, the Bible teaches that no one ever kept all the commandments,¹² but "that a man is justified by faith without the deeds of the law"¹³ The Bible declares that "by him [Christ] all that believe are justified from all things, from which you could not be justified by the law of Moses."¹⁴

Also under the heading of "Faith," the LDS booklet emphasizes that those who don't have faith "in the divine calling of Joseph Smith, the Prophet and Seer... are depriving themselves of glorious blessings,"¹⁵ but there isn't even a hint that "he that believeth on the Son [Christ] hath everlasting life."¹⁶ Under the heading "Forgiveness of Sins," the booklet declares that "Paul knew... that obedience to Christ's law was necessary for salvation."¹⁷ However, the Bible says that "the law was given by Moses, but grace and truth came by Jesus Christ,"¹⁸ that "by the deeds of the law there shall no flesh be justified in his sight,"¹⁹ and that we are "justified freely by his grace through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus."²⁰

How then is Mormonism the "true Christianity" that Joseph Smith and the modern Prophets of Mormonism claim? This is explained by the astonishing proposal that true Christianity is actually the successor to its pagan rivals, the mystery religions. Therefore, to restore Christianity, Joseph Smith went back to the mystery religions as they had been imperfectly preserved in Masonry. Having allegedly by revelation from God recovered the original purity of the Luciferian religion in the form of the true Masonry, Joseph Smith introduced it into Mormonism as his final act in the mission that the gods from Kolob had chosen him to fulfill: the restoration of Christianity to earth. This is consistent with the mainstream of occult tradition, as expressed by one of the world's leading occultists, Manly P. Hall:

The ideals of early Christianity were based upon the high moral standards of the pagan Mysteries, and the first Christians who met under the city of Rome used as their places of worship the subterranean temples of Mithras, from whose cult has been borrowed much of the sacerdotalism of the modern church.²¹

It was not to the words of Jesus or His apostles in the New Testament or the Hebrew prophets in the Old that Joseph Smith looked to find the truth, but to the mystery religions that have always been Christianity's pagan rivals. In the process of restoring the true Masonry and "true Christianity," Smith "restored" the Bible also, rewriting it in an attempt to bring it into agreement with Mormonism. Published today by the Reorganized Church of Latter-day Saints, even Smith's "inspired version" contradicts his "restoration" theories and doctrines. Debate continues among Mormons concerning the question of whether Smith actually finished this "God-given" monumental task. Many wonder why any one of the "living Prophets" have neither given a definite answer to that question nor finished the work himself.

We are not suggesting that the average Mormon knowingly follows Lucifer or would willingly worship him. Only Masons of the very highest degrees are aware of the true nature of their religion, and even they are convinced that Lucifer is God and not Satan, or they wouldn't follow him. Although it comes from Masonry, Mormonism is even less open about its Luciferian nature. Even the highest levels of Mormon initiates would sincerely deny that theirs is a Luciferian religion. However, they have no adequate explanation for the fact that Lucifer defies their "god" and dominates the Temple rituals, all the while giving true LDS doctrinal instructions.

The Great Difference

In the name of true Christianity, Joseph Smith restored the pagan mysteries in Masonic form. It was necessary for Satan to establish his rival religion under the guise of Christianity, thereby convincing millions that his lie is really the truth. Mormonism teaches that "the Devil told the truth,"²² and denies that Adam and Eve sinned when they disobeyed God, proposing instead that "Adam fell in the right direction... toward Godhood."²³

Lucifer's promise of godhood to Eve through the Serpent was to be realized by her initiation into secret knowledge of good and evil and by her demonstration of personal worthiness through the practice of good and rejection of evil. Masons embrace Lucifer's religion of doing good in order to reach the Celestial Lodge above. In like manner, Mormons accept Lucifer's religion of self-effort and personal worthiness. They are taught that the simple gospel in the New Testament (that "Christ died for our sins" and "whosoever believeth in him... hath everlasting life" as a free gift from God),²⁴ is a twisted perversion of what the Bible originally said.²⁵

Mormons protest that they believe in salvation by grace, but in Mormonism "grace" is only for those who keep all the commandments and prove themselves worthy. In the Bible, however, grace is for the unworthy, for if we deserved salvation it wouldn't be grace. This concept of forgiveness of sin by grace is found only in biblical Christianity, and is opposed by all its pagan rivals.

The great difference between biblical Christianity and all rival religions is, of course, Jesus Christ. All of the world's great religious leaders, whether Buddha, Mohammed, Confucius, Zoroaster, or whoever, left codes of conduct that they themselves could not live up to, which only condemn both them and their followers, and for the violation of which there is no forgiveness. In contrast, the Bible asserts that Jesus Christ died for our sins and rose to life again, and on that basis God offers to pardon all who will receive Christ as their Lord and Savior. Because it provides forgiveness of sins, Christianity embraces the lowliest and even the most wicked, if they truly repent and receive Jesus Christ. We are forgiven and receive eternal life not by becoming "worthy," but by admitting that we are unworthy sinners and receiving everything solely by God's grace.

This free gift of eternal life by grace to those absolutely unworthy of it is precisely what distinguishes Christianity from all rival religions; and it is this that the mystery religions and their modern successors complain about. It is from them that Masonry and Mormonism inherited their emphasis upon personal worthiness. One had to be "worthy" to be initiated into the mysteries, just as one must be "worthy" to enter either the Mormon Temple or a Masonic Lodge. Occultists therefore complain bitterly that Christianity embraces the unworthy.

Initiates of the Mysteries

The close relationship that Masonry and Mormonism bear to the pagan mystery religions is more than clear. It would be absurd to write this off as coincidence. The following specific elements are held in common: 1) There are "mysteries" involved; 2) these are passed on to only a select few; 3) to receive these mysteries one must be personally worthy, as defined, determined, and solely judged by the leaders; 4) a process of initiation is required; 5) the initiation involves secret rituals; 6) this takes place only in certain sanctuaries closed to outsiders, which are usually called Temples; 7) in the process, the initiates are sworn to secrecy; and 8) the penalty for revealing this secret gnosis (knowledge) to the uninitiated is death. Manly P.Hall explains the ancient traditions:

In all cities of the ancient world were temples... [and] seclusive philosophic and religious schools. The more important of these groups were known as the Mysteries.

Many of the great minds of antiquity were initiated into these secret fraternities by strange and mysterious rites, some of which were extremely cruel....

After being admitted, the initiates were instructed in the secret wisdom which had been preserved for ages....

Much of the ritualism of Freemasonry is based on the trials to which candidates were subjected by the ancient hierophants before the keys of wisdom were entrusted to them....

The Mysteries were organized for the purpose of assisting the struggling human creature to reawaken the spiritual powers which... lay asleep within his soul. In other words, man was offered a way by which he could regain his lost estate.²⁶

Anyone who has been initiated into the higher levels of Joseph Smith's "restored" gospel will immediately recognize that all eight elements outlined above are involved in the most sacred (secret) parts of Mormonism. That these were all introduced into the Mormon Church after Joseph Smith was initiated into the secrets of Masonry cannot be denied, and is prima facie evidence against Smith's claim of inspiration from God. True to the occult tradition behind these alleged revelations, Joseph Smith carried into Mormonism the unspeakably horrible death penalties that he had sworn in Masonry and which it had inherited from the pagan mysteries.

The cloak of secrecy and the pledge to forfeit one's life for revealing these mysteries can hardly be called Christian. This is paganism in its rawest and most gruesome form. Yet this is at the heart of the most sacred (secret) part of Mormonism which also shares the pagan goal of "recovering one's rightful place among the gods." Rather than admitting the truth, however, Mormons persist in denying that there is anything secret in their religion.

Sacred or Secret?

When asked what could be so secret that visitors are not even allowed to look inside a Mormon Temple once it has been dedicated, the tour guides at Temple Square will reply sincerely that there is nothing secret about what goes on in the Temple, only sacred. Since the most essential elements of their religion are performed in a secrecy so dark that it is maintained by death oaths, Mormons are continually trying to excuse the secrecy as a necessity created by the sacredness of these rituals. The official LDS pamphlet The Purpose of The Temple, which is a reprint of remarks by President David O. McKay at the September 11, 1955, dedication of the Mormon Temple in Berne, Switzerland, explains defensively: "Temples are built for the performance of sacred ordinances—not secret, but sacred."

The implication that Mormons are always laboring to convey is that anything sacred must be kept secret. This would presumably excuse the death oath of secrecy imposed upon Temple Mormons as a legitimate necessity for preserving the sacredness of the ceremonies performed inside Mormon Temples. However, there is neither biblical nor logical support for this. There is not one example in the Bible (or the Book of Mormon, for that matter) of any ritual, ceremony, or act of worship that was practiced in secret—much less an example of an oath forfeiting one's life for revealing something sacred.

It is true that only certain members of the Aaronic priesthood were allowed inside the Temple sanctuary, and that no one but the high priest himself could go into the Holy of Holies. However, the Bible explains that it was only because Christ had not yet died for our sins upon the cross that the High Priest had to enter alone behind the veil, symbolizing the entrance that Christ would make as our Forerunner into heaven itself.²⁷ None of the priests involved in the main sanctuary, nor the High Priest who went alone into the Holy of Holies, ever swore oaths promising not to reveal what went on inside the Temple. In all that was most sacred to Israel-and surely it was at least as sacred as what takes place in Mormon Temples today-there was nothing that was not to be known and discussed openly and freely for all. Yet those who participate in Mormonism's "sacred" Temple rituals must swear to have their throats slit from ear to ear, tongues torn out, and hearts and vitals ripped from their bodies should they tell anyone what goes on in these alleged houses of the Lord! At least they did that until recently when the Mormon "God" changed his mind again.

Did Jesus Found a Secret Society?

Secrecy is contrary to Christianity. Jesus did not found a secret society. When falsely accused of many things before the Sanhedrin, and when the high priest demanded to know His doctrine, Christ specifically stated: "I spoke openly to the world; I always taught in the synagogue and in the temple where the Jews always resort, and in secret have I said nothing."²⁸ Moreover, He warned His disciples against secret doctrines and practices with these words: "For nothing is secret that shall not be made manifest.... Therefore whatever you have spoken in darkness shall be heard in the light, and that which you have spoken in the ear in closets shall be proclaimed upon the housetops."²⁹ The Bible declares that the "hidden things" are to be reproved and brought to light,³⁰ and that anything done in secret will receive special attention in the judgment.³¹ As for secret revelations beyond those given in Scripture, the Bible clearly rejects this idea by repeated affirmations of its sufficiency and completeness. For example:

All Scripture is given by inspiration of God, and is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness, that the man of God may be perfect [mature, complete, lacking nothing], thoroughly furnished unto all good works.³²

According as his divine power hath given unto us all things that pertain unto life and godliness, through the knowledge of him that hath called us to glory and virtue...³³

If any man shall add unto these things, God shall add unto him the plagues that are written in this book.³⁴

Secret Doctrines and Secret Societies

The idea of a secret doctrine known only to an enlightened elite and protected by death oaths of secrecy was always a key element in the pagan mysteries, and remains so among those secret societies descended from them. This is also an integral part of the occult, which means literally "hidden."

Mormonism is but another descendant or offshoot of the pagan mysteries in modern form that seeks to hide its true anti-Christian nature beneath the camouflage of professed Christianity and biblical terminology. We will see later that Mormonism has a secret ambition of taking over the world, which is also consistent with the role that secret societies have traditionally played. James H. Billington, who taught history for 17 years at Harvard and Princeton and has for the past ten years been director of the Woodrow Wilson International Center for Scholars in Washington, D.C., has pointed this out in his definitive study of the modern revolutionary movement from the late eighteenth to early twentieth centuries.

The plain fact is that by the mid-1810s there were not just one or two but scores of secret revolutionary organizations throughout Europe—extending even into Latin America and the Middle East. These groups, although largely unconnected, internationalized the modern revolutionary tradition....

In what follows I shall attempt to show that the modern revolutionary tradition as it came to be internationalized under Napoleon and the Restoration grew out of occult Freemasonry...

The [Masonic] rituals leading to each new level of membership were not, as is sometimes suggested, childish initiations. They were awesome rites of passage into new types of association, promising access to higher truths of Nature once the blindfold was removed in the inner room of the lodge.

In the Masonic milieu, normally conservative people could seriously entertain the possibility of Utopia....

In the early days of the revolution, Masonry provided much of the key symbolism and ritual... [and] Masonry was deliberately used by revolutionaries in the early nineteenth century as a model and a recruiting ground for their first conspiratorial experiments in political organization.³⁵

The Necessity and Tragedy of Secrecy

It will become increasingly clear how the revolutionary Mormon Church and its founder, Joseph Smith (who grew up in this "Masonic milieu" and period of awakening revolutionary consciousness), fit into this entire pattern which Billington rightly calls "romantic occultism,"³⁶ the common force shaping occult groups into secret societies determined to bring about a Utopian order upon earth. It is no coincidence that the most sacred and important doctrines and practices in Mormonism are cloaked in secrecy. They cannot be found in Mormon scriptures, much less in the Bible. There is nothing about the Mormon Priesthoods in the Book of Mormon, nor is there anything about the secret Mormon Temple ceremonies and death oaths in any of the standard works of the Church. Those who regularly participate in these secret ceremonies are forbidden to discuss them outside the Temple. Even husbands and wives, under penalty of death, cannot speak of these most "sacred" things together.

This extreme secrecy is required because pagan rituals are performed inside Mormon Temples that The Brethren desperately want to keep from the outside world, and even from those Mormons who haven't yet qualified to enter the Temple. The necessity for this becomes clear in talking with those who have undergone these shamanic initiations. Many express the shock and revulsion they experienced when suddenly faced with what actually transpires inside a Mormon Temple. Had they known what was involved ahead of time, most would never have entered the Temple to participate. The fact that they were not given the information in advance (which would have made it possible for them to exercise a free choice in the matter) creates resentment among many Mormons, who never return to the Temple for this reason.

The secrecy surrounding the very heart of Mormonism prevents the truth from being told by the missionaries to prospective converts. One is called upon to embrace Mormonism as the "true Christianity restored" without being told the most sacred (secret) parts of what he is being asked to commit himself to. Thus the very presentation of Mormonism by the missionaries is dishonest in the extreme. Converts are persuaded to join the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints as the "only true Church" and to embrace Mormonism without knowing its darkest secrets. It is our conviction that these secrets ought to be exposed, so that those who truly want to be initiated into Mormonism will at least know what they are being led into, and that others who might unwittingly fall victim will be warned in advance.

Changes to the Pure and Unchangeable Rituals

To a true Mormon believer, there is no more sacred place on earth than an LDS Temple, and there is nothing in the world more sacred than the rituals performed within those Temples. A Mormon's eternal journey is tied to the Temple, for celestial exaltation and godhood can only be attained by the mysterious procedures, signs, tokens, and secret handshakes learned therein.

Since Mormonism is based on the premise that evil days and evil leaders fell upon the true church of Christ's time, its restoration of the alleged original truths and the purity of the restored gospel is the cornerstone of faith. Essential to this restoration were the precise Temple rituals Smith initiated. Imagine then that much of the ritual which had been restored as essential to Mormonism's eternal goals was abandoned or altered. Imagine further that the changes made-the parts of the ritual now expunged or modified-are the very same parts of the ritual that books like The God Makers and films like The God Makers and The Temple of The God Makers exposed as pagan and satanic. Impossible? That is exactly what has happened!

In the 1993 Harvest House book The God Makers 11, by Caryl Matrisciana and Ed Decker (pages 80-83), the authors reported on these changes, using detailed information which Chuck Sackett revealed in his April 1990 report. The news received wide circulation when it was duplicated in full in the September 1990 edition of The Evangel, a monthly newspaper produced by the ministry of John L. Smith, Utah Missions, Inc., in Marlow, Oklahoma. (The report was later carried in the Saints Alive newsletter.)

The Sackett report detailed a number of significant changes, and with his permission we will quote his description of them at length:

1. The execution of the penalties have been removed from the Priesthood Signs. No longer will every initiate be required to perform the three morbid gestures associated with having their lives taken if they reveal any of the temple secrets. These gestures were:
 - A. Running the right thumb across the throat from left ear to right ear, signifying having one's throat slit from ear to ear.
 - B. Drawing the right hand across the chest from left breast to right breast, signifying having one's chest ripped open and one's heart torn out.
 - C. Running the right thumb across the abdomen, signifying having one's body cut asunder and one's vitals and bowels gush out.

Whata relief this will be to thousands of civilized and sensitive Mormons who have been offended by this barbaric atrocity with each temple visit, and also to those who decline to attend the temple because of this highly offensive [symbolology]!

2. The most awesome spectacle of the entire series of temple rituals is gone! The Sign of the Second Token of the Melchizedek Priesthood, the Patriarchal Grip, or Sure Sign of the Nail has been eliminated. No longer will temple initiates be required to chant in unison the infamous "Pay Lay Ale, Pay Lay Ale, Pay Lay Ale" as they raise and lower their arms three times in the universal gesture of obeisance. No longer will thinking Mormons travel home wondering, as we did so often, what does "Pay Lay Ale" really mean? A number of years ago the Sacketts showed that the words were a quick step-to-the-side from words in Hebrew that mimic, in its harshest translation, "O Marvelous Lucifer."
3. The Masonically inspired Five Points of Fellowship through the temple veil has been eliminated. No longer will temple initiates be required to embrace "the Lord" through the veil in this mystical, highly occult configuration while they whisper in his ear the Name of the Second Token of the Melchizedek Priesthood, the Patriarchal Grip, or Sure Sign of the Nail. The embrace is out, but it is likely that the incantation associated with it is still in. Apparently initiates will still be required to repeat back to "the Lord" through the veil: "Health in the navel, marrow in the bones, strength in the loins and in the sinews. Power in the Priesthood be upon me and upon all my posterity, through all generations of time and throughout all eternity."
4. Lucifer's hireling lackey, the Christian minister, is out. No longer will initiates watch the devil hire a Christian pastor (representing all Christian clergymen) to teach his satanic doctrines to Adam. No longer will they watch him mock and ridicule the most basic doctrines of Christianity. No longer will they watch as this Christian hireling abandons his faith and teachings and changes altars to join Adam and Eve in the Mormon Priesthood program of works and rituals.

The liturgical significance of this change is profound. It is through the initiates' personal identification with Adam or Eve, as they renounce and deny the basic tenets of Christianity, that the purging of all remnants of Christian commitment in the initiates is accomplished. This crucial act in the Mormon conversion process would seem to have been eliminated! What will be substituted to accomplish this vital function spiritually bonding the initiates to LDS Priesthood power?

5. Women will no longer be required to veil their faces during the prayer in the Endowment prayer circle. However, they will still wear the veil as their regular head covering. This was a vital symbol of the subservience of women in the Priesthood and the dominance of the man in all aspects of Mormonism. The veil is to be lifted only by her worthy resurrected husband in his process of resurrecting her.

6. Women (single and married) will no longer be required to swear an oath and covenant of obedience to their husband. This change may have the most radical effect on Mormonism of all! The oppressive stigma of female singleness will no longer be officially imposed by the Mormon god in the temple. Single women will be somewhat relieved of the extreme pressure to marry. The wife will no longer be reminded with each temple visit that her only channel to her god is through her husband and that his faithfulness determines her eternity. Each Mormon husband can no longer rely on his wife (or wives) to constantly prod and motivate him to do his duty to the church based upon her total dependence upon him for her eternal exaltation. What will become of the church as a result of the change? How many worthy Priesthood leaders will become indifferent or lazy due to this major doctrinal change? We will have to watch and discern the inevitable decline in vigor taking place.

LYING PROPHETS AND APOSTLES

The history of Mormonism is filled with plottings, intrigues, murders, robberies, and sex scandals involving its Prophets and Apostles. The early Mormons were urged by their founding Prophet to put everything down in daily journals or diaries; enough evidence was recorded to put Joseph Smith, Brigham Young, and many of the other Mormon Apostles and Prophets in prison. The Mormon Church has carefully locked the incriminating documents away in those secret files in Salt Lake City-but much of the scandal has leaked out.

Mormons are obsessed with secrecy, which plays a major part in their religion. They even wear secret underwear with occult Masonic markings that allegedly give it magic protective powers. The pathway to godhood involves secret occult practices that are performed in Mormon Temples. One Temple secret more than any other obsessed Mormon leaders for the first 70 years of the Church's history. The Brethren lied to deny it was practiced, then lied to establish it as the most sacred doctrine of the Church, then lied again to abandon it. The astonishing doctrine is part of a cover-up that has devastating consequences for every Mormon today.

Eternal Marriage in the Temple

To commemorate the twenty-fifth anniversary of the Los Angeles Temple (built in 1956) on March 21, 1981, "In 72 continuous sessions, stretching over 36 hours, more than 12,000 temple patrons completed 15,439 endowments [for the dead]. Approximately 1,000 patrons were in the temple each hour."¹ Temple president Elder Robert L. Simpson remarked, "It [the Los Angeles Temple] is a holy temple wherein Church members are able to open the gates of life eternal for millions of their beloved forebears."²

Thus far in Mormon Temples around the world more than 100 million marriages and baptisms by proxy have been performed for dead ancestors. However, Thomas E. Daniels, public affairs director at the huge Mormon Genealogical Library in Salt Lake City, estimates that, with 52 million people dying annually, the Temple "ordinance work" is "falling behind by 95% each year."³ That must be discouraging to sincere Mormons who really believe they are the saviors of the world. More discouraging is the belief that one's genealogy must be traced all the way back to Adam, and Temple ceremonies performed for all of these ancestors-an obviously hopeless task.

It all begins with the first step: husband and wife being married for eternity and their children "sealed" to them for eternity in the Temple. There is no doctrine more central to Mormonism today nor more firmly held than that of eternal or celestial marriage, which must be performed for the living and the dead. This doctrine is causing thousands of divorces among Mormons, as we have already explained. Milton R. Hunter has written: "Marriage [in the Temple] is not only a righteous institution, but obedience to this law is absolutely necessary in order to obtain the highest exaltation in the Kingdom of God."⁴ Joseph Fielding Smith explained that "eternal life" means to produce life eternally by bearing children in the hereafter,⁵ and that Celestial Marriage is a necessity if one is to become a "god":

If you want salvation in the fullest, that is exaltation... you have got to go into the Temple of the Lord and receive these holy ordinances, which belong to that house, which cannot be had elsewhere... and thereafter keep all the commandments.⁶

Civil marriage makes servants in eternity... Celestial Marriage makes Gods in eternity.⁷

There is not one verse in either the Bible or the Book of Mormon that teaches celestial marriage for eternity involving secret or even sacred rituals in a Temple, much less that says it is essential for eternal life. Nor was this teaching part of early Mormonism. In the first edition (1835) of Doctrine and Covenants (considered by Mormons to be inspired Scripture on an even higher level than the Bible), Section 101 honored "all legal contracts of marriage" and even stated that "all marriages in this Church... should be solemnized in a public meeting...." Marriages involving secret rituals in a Temple were not even dreamed of until Joseph Smith produced a startling "revelation" at Nauvoo, Illinois, on July 12, 1843, concerning a "new and everlasting covenant" that shook the Mormons and severely tested their loyalty to their leader. It became Section 132 in Doctrine and Covenants. Verifying the great importance of this particular "revelation," Joseph Fielding Smith declared:

So if you want to enter into exaltation... then you have got to abide in his law... all that pertains to the new and everlasting covenant⁸

The New and Everlasting Covenant

The "new and everlasting covenant" made polygamy an essential part of celestial marriage and a requirement for godhood. Canonized in 1876 and still applicable Mormon scripture today, Section 132 warns that all who refuse to practice polygamy are "damned" and will be physically "destroyed."

Most people have the vague notion that the early Mormons got involved in polygamy because there were not enough men to go around. In fact, there were more men than women. Joseph F. Smith, sixth Mormon President, stated: "Some people have supposed that the doctrine of plural marriage was a sort of superfluity, or non-essential to the salvation of mankind."⁹ He went on to explain that the Mormon goal of godhood cannot be reached without the practice of polygamy. The Latter-day Saints' Millennial Star declared:

And we... are believers in... plural marriage or polygamy... as a principle revealed by God, underlying our every hope of eternal salvation... a vital principle of our religion.¹⁰

Strangely enough, on October 1, 1842, the Mormon publication Times and Seasons (vol. 3, pp. 939-40) had stated just the opposite:

We are charged with advocating a plurality of wives.... Now this is as false as the many other ridiculous charges which are brought against us. No sect has a greater reverence for the laws of matrimony... and we do what others do not, practice what we preach.

It was a blatant lie, but protested very self-righteously and repeatedly by Mormon leaders. The Latter-day Saints' Millennial Star was also promoting the same deliberate deception, including the assurance that polygamy would never be allowed among the Latter-day Saints. The contradictions would be amusing were they not so damning. What a contrast between the above statement from the Millennial Star calling polygamy "a vital principle of our religion" and the following cover-up from the Star that came earlier (vol. 3, p. 74):

But, for the information of those who may be assailed by those foolish tales about two wives, we would say that no such principle ever existed among the Latter-day Saints, and never will.

This is well known to all who are acquainted with our books and actions, the Book of Mormon, Doctrine and Covenants; and also all our periodicals are very strict on that subject, indeed far more so than the Bible.

It was true indeed that the early Mormon scriptures condemned polygamy in very clear terms, but equally true that it was being practiced secretly in violation of the scriptures. The consistent record of lies and deception leaves us with no choice but to conclude that leaders in the Mormon Church, then and now, have a contempt for truth and honesty when it comes to defending their "Prophet" and their religion.

Something Rotten in Mormondom

One of the best examples of typical Mormon deceit and intrigue is found in the background of Section 132 of Doctrine and Covenants. Reading this section, one would never suspect that this 1843 "revelation" wasn't included in Doctrine and Covenants for 33 years until 1876. Moreover, whereas editions through 1890 introduced this "revelation" as "given through Joseph the Seer July 12, 1843," subsequent editions were changed to read "recorded July 12, 1843." The intention is to imply that the actual receiving of the "revelation" by the "Prophet" came earlier. Mormon historian B.H.Roberts wrote that the "date in the heading of the Revelation on the Eternity of the Marriage Covenant, including Plurality of Wives, notes the time at which the Revelation was committed to writing, not the time at which the principles set forth in the revelation were first made known to the Prophet."¹¹

We now know that this was an attempt to cover for Joseph Smith in case the suppressed truth was discovered that he had been practicing polygamy for years before 1843. Joseph Fielding Smith, who later became the tenth Mormon President, made the following statement to J.W.A.Bailey while he was Church historian in a letter dated September 5, 1935:

The exact date I cannot give you when this principle of plural marriage was first revealed to Joseph Smith, but I do know that there was a revelation given in July 1831, in the presence of Oliver Cowdery, W.W.Phelps and others in Missouri, in which the Lord made this principle known through the Prophet Joseph Smith.

Whether the revelation as it appears in the Doctrine and Covenants was first given July 12, 1843, or earlier, I care not.

It is a fact nevertheless, that this principle was revealed at an earlier date.¹²

The dishonest attempt to establish an earlier date for the polygamy "revelation" creates more problems than it solves, because of repeated denials by Joseph Smith and other Mormon leaders that the polygamy commanded by the 1843 "revelation" was practiced among the Mormons prior to or even after that time. Consider the following out of the many examples that could be given, published in the Latter-day Saints' Millennial Star of August 1, 1842. It was in response to the public accusations of one Martha Brotherton that Brigham Young had tried to seduce her to "marry" him secretly, with the assurance that Joseph Smith had a "revelation" from God authorizing polygamy:

I do hereby testify that the affidavit of Miss Martha Brotherton that is going the rounds in the political and religious papers, is a base falsehood, with regard to any private intercourse or unlawful conduct or conversation with me.

(signed) Brigham Young

Sworn to and subscribed before me this 27th day of August, A.D. 1843.

(signed) E. Robinson, J.P.

(Justice of the Peace)

Either Brigham was solemnly swearing to a deliberate lie, or a host of Mormon leaders have lied in saying that their Prophet had received the polygamy "revelation" as early as 1831, 11 years before Miss Brotherton testified that Brigham Young had told her there was such a "revelation." In one of his sermons later from Salt Lake City, Brigham Young denounced monogamy as "a source of prostitution and whoredom"¹³ "commenced by the founders of the Roman empire,"¹⁴ praised polygamy as "the only popular religion in heaven,"¹⁵ and declared that "the Lord's servants have always practiced" polygamy.¹⁶ Yet he denounced Martha Brotherton for saying basically the same thing. In another sermon, this second President of the Mormon Church, its "Prophet, Seer and Revelator," declared bravely from the safe haven of the Mormon-controlled Utah Territory:

If I had forty wives in the United States, they did not know it, and could not substantiate it....

I live above the law, and so do this people.¹⁷

Brigham Young not only lived above the civil laws that declared polygamy to be a crime, but he lived above the laws of God that warn us, "Thou shalt not bear false witness."¹⁸ His comment that "they did not know it" only verifies that he and the other Mormon leaders were practicing polygamy in secret; and his boast that they "could not substantiate it" confirms the fact that he and other Mormon leaders were lying in order to cover their crimes. To cover his own deception, Brigham Young called Martha Brotherton a liar and a mean harlot. If she was, one can only wonder why the Mormon Endowment House Records show that Brigham Young, after Martha Brotherton's death, "sealed" her to himself "for eternity" in a "proxy marriage" on August 1, 1870.

There is more than ample evidence to prove that Joseph Smith, Brigham Young, and many other early Mormon leaders were liars, cheats, adulterers, and seducers-men without regard for the rights and interests of others, claiming "divine revelation" to justify their crimes against humanity. The secrecy itself speaks loudly. If Joseph Smith had a genuine revelation from God, then why not stand up for it openly? Even a superficial inquiry into the alleged 1843 "revelation" indicates that there was something very rotten in Mormondom. Probing deeper, one finds a tangled web of intrigue and deception. In the process of unraveling that, the very fabric of Mormondom's boasted foundation of "Prophets" and "Apostles" is pulled to pieces.

The sad truth is that Mormon Church officials past and present have known that Joseph Smith, Brigham Young, and other Mormon leaders of that time were already deeply involved in polygamy long before 1843, and therefore by Mormon scriptures should have been excommunicated. The Church tried to establish an earlier date for the "revelation" to protect its founding "Prophets" and "Apostles." The Brethren today continue the cover-up.

What about the 1831 "revelation" that Joseph Fielding Smith referred to? Wouldn't that solve the problem? If so, the Mormon Church would produce it, not just hint at it. Dr. Hyrum Andrus of Brigham Young University let slip the fact that the 1831 "revelation" is safe and secure in the vault of the LDS Church Historical Department, and that in substance it said "that in due time the brethren would be required to take plural wives."¹⁹ So the lies and coverup persist.

Incredibly, right up to the time of his death in 1844, Joseph Smith made repeated public and private denials that he was a polygamist or had ever practiced the very polygamy which the 1843 "revelation" required and in fact declared that Smith had already been practicing for some time. The official Mormon History of the Church records that on May 26, 1844 (nearly one year after the polygamy "revelation"), Joseph Smith (who had scores of wives by that time) solemnly declared in response to a charge that he had "six or seven":

What a thing it is for a man to be accused of committing adultery, and having seven wives, when I can only find one.

I am the same man, and as innocent as I was fourteen years ago; and I can prove them all perjurers.²⁰

In fact, Joseph Smith was the perjurer. Only false prophets lie. In his 1843 (or earlier?) "revelation," "the Lord" had said that Joseph had already received plural wives and commanded his first wife, Emma, to accept them or be "damned." There is no escaping the conclusion that Joseph Smith was a fraud.

A Pattern of Cold, Calculated Deceit

The indisputable fact is that, long before and long after the 1843 "revelation," polygamy was being practiced in secret by Mormon leaders, who compounded their sin by public denials that were just plain lies. At the time of his self-righteous denial and empty threat that he could "prove" his accusers "all perjurers," Joseph Smith had at least four and probably seven times the seven wives he was accused of having! If he lied about this issue, what else would he lie about? How could anyone accept anything he said?

Joseph F. Smith, sixth Mormon President, tried to call these lies "seeming denials." His statement betrays the mentality that persists among Mormons even today which allows them to deny the obvious with an apparently good conscience: "Joseph Smith... and his brother Hyrum did practice the doctrine [of polygamy] in their lifetime, and until their death, notwithstanding their seeming denials in the Times and Seasons."²¹ The brazen hypocrisy and deceit of Mormon Presidents and Apostles can be seen in the following "seeming denial," published in Times and Seasons. We now know beyond the shadow of a doubt that they were lying, and in the process making a scapegoat out of an expendable Mormon Elder:

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 1 1844

NOTICE

As we have lately been credibly informed, that an Elder of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, by the name of Hiram Brown, has been preaching polygamy, and other false and corrupt doctrines, in the county of Lapeer, state of Michigan.

This is to notify him and the Church in general, that he has been cut off from the church, for his iniquity; and he is further notified to appear at the Special Conference on the 6th of April next, to make answer to these charges.

Presidents of said Church

Joseph Smith's unconscionable contempt for truth is staggering. The polygamy that was commanded by "the Lord" in the 1843 "revelation" and which Joseph Smith and other Mormon leaders had been secretly practicing for years is denounced by the "Prophet" as a "false and corrupt" doctrine when spoken of in public! In a hypocritical refrain that is as common among Mormons today as it was then, Mormon Apostle John A. Widtsoe (apparently believing his own lie) has protested, "The Church ever operates in full light. There is no secrecy about its doctrine, aim or work."²² In contrast, with refreshing honesty, Mormon writer William E. Berrett admits.

In 1840 the doctrine [of polygamy] was taught to a few leading brethren who, with the Prophet, secretly married additional wives in the following year...

Only the secrecy surrounding its practice prevented a wholesale apostasy from the Church in 1844.²³

The Plot Thickens

The 1843 "revelation" was intended to rescue Joseph Smith from a mounting wave of discontent caused by renewed charges of adultery. Too many people had heard about his secret and growing harem. Disillusionment and doubts that he was a Prophet were spreading. There was danger that the Church would rebel against its founder. Consequently, Joseph Smith came forth with a "revelation" that turned his vice into virtue. Predictably, "the Lord" from Kolob vindicated his "Prophet" by commanding everyone to practice polygamy, by damning those who refused, and by declaring that polygamy was absolutely essential for the coveted "godhood."

The situation had grown so serious that even some of the top leaders in the Church were becoming disillusioned and were defecting—among them men he couldn't afford to lose, such as Apostle Orson Pratt, a mathematics professor and one of the few educated men among the early Mormons. Joseph Smith had attempted to seduce Pratt's wife, Sarah, and when she had accused him in Pratt's presence Smith had lied, and Pratt was sure of it. This had shattered Pratt's world. Joseph Smith's diary of July 15, 1842, included: "It was reported early in the morning that Elder Orson Pratt was missing. I caused the Temple hands and the principal men of the city to make search for him."²⁴ So devastated that "his mind collapsed," and on the verge of suicide,²⁵ Pratt had been found "five miles below Nauvoo, in a state of frenzy, sitting on the bank of the Mississippi River."²⁶ Brigham Young's Journal for August 8, 1842, included this:

Assisted by Elders H.C.Kimball and Geo. A.Smith, I spent several days laboring with Elder Orson Pratt, whose mind became so darkened by the influence and statements of his wife, that he came out in rebellion against Joseph, refusing to believe his testimony or obey his counsel.

He said he would believe his wife in preference to the Prophet. Joseph told him if he did believe his wife and followed her suggestions, he would go to hell."²⁷

The threats of damnation didn't convince Pratt, and he was "cut off from the Church" on August 20, 1842. The "revelation" of 1843 apparently restored his confidence in the "Prophet," and Pratt returned with his wife to the Mormon Church. Although Sarah stuck to her story to her dying day, Pratt became the "chief spokesman for the Church in defense of the principle of plural marriage."²⁸

Some of the statements that Apostle Orson Pratt made on the subject of polygamy are very interesting indeed. If they were true when he made them, then they must still be true, which should give every Mormon today serious cause for concern:

... I have heard now and then... a brother or sister say, "I am a Latter-day Saint, but I do not believe in polygamy." Oh, what an absurd expression! What an absurd idea!

A person might as well say, "I am a follower of the Lord Jesus Christ, but I do not believe in him." One is as consistent as the other...

I did hope there was more intelligence among the Latter-day Saints, and a greater understanding of principle than to suppose that anyone can be a member of the Church in good standing and yet reject polygamy.

The Lord has said, that those who reject this principle reject their salvation, they shall be damned, saith the Lord....

I want to prophecy that all men and women who oppose the revelation which God has given in relation to polygamy will find themselves in darkness; the Spirit of God will withdraw from them the very moment of their opposition to that principle, until they will finally go down to hell and be damned, if they do not repent.... Oppose it... and teach your children to do the same, and if you do not become as dark as midnight there is no truth in Mormonism ²⁹

By Apostle Pratt's own words there must be "no truth in Mormonism," because no one yet who has opposed it has "become dark as midnight." This is typical of the most solemn pronouncements of Mormon Apostles and Prophets-time has proven them to be brash boasts and empty threats.

Secret Sin, Public Denial

When Pratt preached that sermon, polygamy was out in the open, which it never was during Joseph Smith's lifetime. There was in fact no public declaration of this "revelation" in 1843, and for Doctrine and Covenants to present it as such is quite typical for the Mormon Church, which suppresses and hides documents, lies, and distorts with no apparent conscience. The July 12, 1843, "revelation" was privately concocted by Joseph Smith at the suggestion of his brother Hyrum to be presented to Joseph's first wife, Emma, in order to justify to her the many additional wives he had taken. Emma wouldn't stand for it, and within two or three days she had persuaded Joseph to give her the "revelation" he had written, and she burned it.³⁰ That the alleged "revelation" was not pronounced publicly by Joseph Smith to the Mormon Church and accepted as scripture is confirmed by Joseph F. Smith:

When the revelation was written, in 1843, it was for a special purpose, by the request of the Patriarch Hyrum Smith, and was not then designed to go forth to the Church or to the world.³¹

So polygamy was being practiced secretly and being lied about publicly. Unable to impress Emma with his alleged revelation from the Lord, Joseph tried to hint at it in a sermon to test the reaction of the Church. The members couldn't believe their ears. Was their Prophet admitting that the accusations of polygamy that had been made against him and which had been so often publicly denied were true after all? The official account states:

... The Prophet goes up on the stand, and, after preaching about everything else he could think of in the world... makes a bare hint at the law of sealing [plural wives], and it produced such a tremendous excitement that, as soon as he had got his dinner half eaten, he had to go back to the stand and unpreach all that he had preached, and left the people to guess at the matter.³²

Here then are the unpleasant facts. The divine and holy "revelation" set forth in Section 132 was suggested by Hyrum Smith as a way to persuade the Prophet's wife, Emma, to go along with polygamy-not some grand announcement from heaven to the Church and the world. When it was presented to Emma, she rejected and burned it. Instead of being "destroyed," as the "revelation" warned would be her fate if she opposed it, she lived another 36 yearstime enough to abandon her husband's Church and join the rival Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints that repudiated polygamy and many other early Mormon doctrines. The "Prophet" who gave the "revelation" that promised great blessing to those who obeyed it was dead in less than a year, still never having openly presented this "most important and holy revelation" to his Church. Surely a genuine Prophet would have the courage to publicly proclaim a revelation from God.

Thirty-two years after Joseph Smith's death, Mormon leaders took Section 101 condemning polygamy out of Doctrine and Covenants and inserted Section 132 in its place, all without explanation and in a manner that would lead today's reader to assume this was the way it had been since the July 12, 1843, date of this "revelation." When questioned in court concerning the substitution of Section 132 for 101, Wilford Woodruff and Lorenzo Snow, fourth and fifth Presidents of the Mormon Church, testified on the witness stand that they did not know how or why or by whom it had been done.³³ Lorenzo Snow admitted that Joseph Smith had taken his sister as a "plural wife" before the July 12, 1843, revelation and that this had meant that he was guilty of adultery by the Mormon scriptures. Having admitted that, however, in response to the question, "What kind of a position did it put your sister and Joseph Smith in?" he defiantly said, "It put them in a first-rate, splendid condition for time and eternity!"

Mormon leaders considered the polygamy "revelation" to be "the most holy and important doctrine ever revealed to man upon earth."³⁴ It hardly builds confidence either in their morals or their judgment. The persistent duplicity of early Mormon Prophets and Apostles involved in the polygamy caper is almost beyond belief. Their conduct in this entire affair should give any reasonable person serious cause to question their sincerity and the truth of everything else they swear to, no matter how many "revelations" they claim in support of it.

ANOTHER ANGEL STORY

If Joseph Smith were just an ordinary prophet, the question of whether he was an adulterer or a divinely inspired polygamist would not be so important. However, as the founding Prophet of Mormonism, everything rests upon him. He was the discoverer and "translator" of the Book of Mormon, which he declared to be "the keystone of our religion."¹ He also said, "Take away the Book of Mormon and the revelations, and where is our religion? We have none."² The credibility both of Joseph Smith as a Prophet and of the Book of Mormon itself depends upon the existence and identity of the "angel" (called both Moroni and Nephi) that led him to the gold plates, and of the "angel" (presumably the same one) that showed these plates to the Three Witnesses. If this was an "angel of God," then Mormonism ought to be believed. If it was an "angel of Satan" or Joseph's imagination or a deliberate lie, then it ought to be exposed as such and repudiated. For as Apostle Orson Pratt said:

The Book of Mormon claims to be a divinely inspired record.... It professes to be revealed to the present generation for the salvation of all who will receive it, and for the overthrow and damnation of all nations who reject it.

This book must be either true or false. If true, it is one of the most important messages ever sent from God.... If false, it is one of the most cunning, wicked, bold, deep-laid impositions ever palmed upon the world, calculated to deceive and ruin millions....³

It is also claimed that the Mormon doctrine of plural wives is a divinely inspired revelation. Apostle Heber C. Kimball called it "one of the most holy principles that God ever revealed to man"⁴; the Mormon publication Millennial Star called it "a vital principle of our religion... revealed by God underlying our every hope of eternal salvation.. ."⁵; and Joseph F. Smith declared that "every man in this Church who has the ability to obey and practice it in righteousness and will not, shall be damned...."⁶ The importance of polygamy can hardly be overstated. Apostle George Teasdale said, "I believe in plural marriage as a part of the gospel just as much as I believe in baptism by immersion for the remission of sins."⁷ One would hardly think, then, that a revelation of such importance would have been given without the ministration of an "angel," as in the case of the Book of Mormon. This, in fact, is the claim. The polygamy "revelation" involves another angel story told by Joseph Smith, and one that for sheer drama exceeds the alleged angelic encounter that led him to the Book of Mormon. This was reported by Joseph F. Smith, sixth President of the Mormon Church, in a sermon:

When this principle was revealed to the Prophet Joseph Smith, he very naturally shrank, in his feelings, from the responsibilities thereby imposed upon him....

... It was not until an angel of God, with a drawn sword, stood before him and commanded that he should enter into the practice of that principle, or he should be utterly destroyed [that he obeyed]....

It need scarcely be said that the Prophet found no one any more willing to lead out in this matter in righteousness than he was himself.... None excelled or even matched the courage of the Prophet himself.⁸

A Two-Edged Sword

It was Joseph Smith's testimony that polygamy had been forced upon him by an angel at the point of a sword that convinced his followers to accept this "revelation" when nothing else would. The angel's sword, however, is a two-edged one. If the story is true, then no one dare reject polygamy any more than they dare reject the Book of Mormon. On the other hand, if polygamy is not a revelation from God, then the "angel" that forced it upon the "Prophet" was either from Satan, a hallucination, or the invention of a deliberate liar. Moreover, the true identity of the polygamy "angel" would say a great deal about the identity of the Book of Mormon "angel." It would not be likely that one could be from God and the other from Satan, for surely a man of God would know the difference.

This is clearly the logic behind the statement of Apostle George Teasdale: "I bear my solemn testimony that plural marriage is as true as any principle that has been revealed from the heavens [through Joseph Smith]...."⁹ For if Joseph Smith lied or was deceived about this "revelation," then one could hardly have any confidence in his other "revelations." If polygamy is not from God, then neither is anything else in Mormonism, because it all rests upon the foundation of Joseph Smith. Recognizing this, Apostle Orson Pratt declared:

If the doctrine of polygamy, as revealed to the Latter-day Saints, is not true, I would not give a fig for all your other revelations that came through Joseph Smith the Prophet; I would renounce the whole of them... ¹⁰

The polygamy issue is extremely important in evaluating Mormonism, because we have so much information about it. No one else saw the angel Moroni when he allegedly met Joseph Smith annually for four years at the Hill Cumorah and finally gave him the gold plates. Three witnesses claimed that the "angel" showed the plates to them "in a vision," but we have already seen that this story and the witnesses themselves have some serious built-in problems. With polygamy, however, we have the record of many witnesses as well as far more written about it not only by Joseph Smith but by many others as well. Consequently this particular "revelation" is ideal for testing the credibility of the "Prophet" and the "restored gospel" of Mormonism that rests in its entirety upon him.

Modus Operandi of the Polygamist Prophet

We have seen that the evidence indicates that the polygamy "revelation" was not intended, at least when Joseph Smith first wrote it down on July 12, 1843, for either the Church or the world. Instead, it was designed for an individual: Joseph Smith's wife, Emma. That is not only the way it was reported in Joseph Smith's own official History of the Church and Journal of Discourses, but this is consistent with an established behavior pattern. Joseph Smith produced numerous "revelations" on this subject, but always in private and generally to convince some woman he coveted, whether single or married, that the Lord had given her to him. If she was convinced, then they were married in a secret ceremony, and thereafter clandestine trysts were arranged. Sarah Ann Whitney is one example of many. According to Orson F. Whitney, her nephew, she was married to Joseph Smith almost one year prior to the 1843 "revelation":

This girl was but seventeen years of age, but she had implicit faith in the [secret] doctrine of plural marriage.... The revelation commanding and consecrating this union is in existence, though it has never been published.

It bears the date of July 27, 1842, and was given through the Prophet to the writer's grandfather, Newel K. Whitney, whose daughter Sarah, on that day, became the wedded wife of Joseph Smith for time and eternity. ¹¹

Although several did resist Joseph Smith's amorous advances, it was not easy for any Mormon woman to turn down an affair with a handsome "Prophet" when it was not only sanctified by "revelation" and commanded by the Lord, but great glory in the hereafter was the promised bait on the hook, and destruction here and damnation hereafter the solemnly pronounced penalty for refusal. How could Joseph carry on so many affairs? We get some insight from the following excerpts of a letter* to Sarah's father, Bishop Newel K. Whitney, signed by Joseph Smith:

... All three of you [mother, father, and Sarah] can come and see me in the fore part of the night.... The only thing to be careful of, is to find out when Emma comes then you cannot be safe, but when she is not here, there is the most perfect safety...

I think Emma wont come tonight if she dont dont fail to come tonight, I subscribe myself your obedient and affectionate, companion, and friend.

Smith

It was not easy for a busy "Prophet" leading a public life to do the duties of a husband to his growing number of wives, but Joseph was very resourceful. To better conceal the truth about his relationship with Sarah, the "Prophet" arranged for and performed a sham "marriage" between her and a very pliable and obedient Mormon named Joseph C. Kingsbury. That the "Prophet" would sign this certificate-"I hereby certify that I have upon this the 29th day of April 1843, joined together in Marriage Joseph C. Kingsbury and Sarah Ann Whitney, in the city of Nauvoo, Illinois"-is further astonishing evidence of his utter disregard for truth and propriety. That he molded his pliable victims to his lustful will by "revelations" promising great reward in heaven is also evident from the following statement by the innocent dupe Kingsbury:

... On 29th of April 1843 I according to President Joseph Smith Conseil & others agreed to Stand by Sarah Ann Whitney as supposed to be her husband & had a prete[n]ded marriage for the purpose of Bringing about the purposes of God in these last days as spoken by the mouth of the Prophets Isiah Jeremiah Ezekiel and also Joseph Smith, & Sarah Ann Should Recd a Great Glory Honor, & eternal lives and I also S[h]ould Recd a Great Glory, Honor & eternal lives to the full desire of my heart in having my Companion Caroline in the first Resurrection to claim her & no one have power to take her from me & we both shall be Crowned & enthroned together in the Celestial Kingdom of God... .¹²

One has to give Joseph Smith the credit he deserves: He had come a long way from the young glass-looker who duped greedy men into paying him for telling them where "treasure" was buried on their land. Now he was a "Prophet" to thousands, who put him in the same class as Isaiah, Jeremiah, and Ezekiel and blindly believed almost anything he said. They would even commit adultery or make a mockery of marriage (Sarah and Kingsbury lived together for years as supposed husband and wife) so long as the "Prophet" assured them that it was "bringing about the purposes of God in these last days."

Reading the often-pitiful entries in the diaries of this period, one is stunned not only by Joseph Smith's apparently incurable passion for new sexual partners, but also by the astonishing charismatic power he wielded that allowed him to practice not only widespread and blatant adultery, but even to demand and receive the consent of the husbands whose wives he stole. Something of this incredible hypnotic influence is revealed in the following excerpt from a sermon delivered at the famous Mormon Tabernacle in Salt Lake City on February 19, 1854, by Jedediah M. Grant, second counselor to Brigham Young:

When the family organization was revealed from heaven—the patriarchal order of God—and Joseph began on the right and on the left to add to his family, what a quaking there was in Israel.

Says one brother to another, "Joseph says all covenants are done away, and none are binding but the new covenants; now suppose Joseph should come and say he wanted your wife, what would you say to that?..."

If such a man of God should come to me and say, "I want your gold and silver, or your wives," I should say, "Here they are, I wish I had more to give you, take all I have got!"¹³

Justifying the Prophet

Serious public accusations of adultery had first been leveled against Joseph Smith as far back as 1837 by Oliver Cowdery, one of the Three Witnesses to whom an angel had allegedly shown the "gold plates." Cowdery had accused Joseph of adultery with one Fannie Alger.¹⁴ This charge had proved to be true. An unusually attractive young woman, Fannie had lived in Joseph Smith's home since 1835, and she and the Prophet had carried on a secret affair that Cowdery and Warren Parrish, Joseph Smith's private secretary, had tried in vain to persuade him to stop for the good of the Church. Fannie is included today in the official list of 27 of Joseph Smith's scores of wives in Church documents, and is described by Andrew Jensen, Assistant LDS Church Historian, as "one of the first plural wives sealed to the Prophet."¹⁵ Justifying his beloved "Prophet's" adultery, John J. Stewart explains, apparently in all seriousness:

Joseph as a servant of God was authorized to enter plural marriage, and it is not at all unlikely that he did so in the early or mid-1830s.

Perhaps Nancy Johnson or Fanny Alger was his first "plural" wife, at Hiram or Kirtland, Ohio.¹⁶

Responding in character to Cowdery's charge, Joseph Smith brazenly lied. (Parrish lost his job for his trouble, and Cowdery was excommunicated.) Such would be the fate, or worse, of all who dared to accuse "the Lord's anointed." In utter disregard for the laws of God and man (for he was, as Brigham Young said, "above the law"), Joseph continued his secret adulterous affairs with increasing numbers of Mormon women, justifying his apparently uncontrollable lust to the few insiders who discovered the truth (some of whom began to join him in practicing polygamy secretly) by stating that God had given him a "revelation" about polygamy, but it couldn't yet be revealed to the "Saints" for fear they would rebel. Nor did the "Prophet" ever openly reveal this most important of all doctrines during his entire lifetime.

The sordid truth has been fully documented and published by many researchers, including some Mormons. There is no doubt that for a number of years prior to presenting to Emma the alleged "revelation" of a "new and everlasting covenant" making polygamy mandatory for "exaltation," Joseph Smith had been engaging habitually in sexual intercourse with increasing numbers of women among his devoted followers. That number apparently grew to at least 84 or more "plural wives." During this time, both the Book of Mormon and Doctrine and Covenants (to say nothing of the Bible and civil laws of the land) clearly condemned what Joseph was doing as adultery. There were those close to him who pleaded with the "Prophet" to curb his insatiable appetite for women, but to no avail. As the "Prophet," he could do whatever he pleased, and call down the judgment of his "gods" from Kolob upon whoever stood in his way-and he often did.

The full story of Joseph Smith's scandalous depravity cannot be told here. It includes intrigue, deceit, hiding the shameful truth from his wife, Emma, for years, as well as seductions and attempted seductions. This involved not only single young women, but the wives of Church leaders, especially when the husbands were away on extended missions assigned to them by the "Prophet." Unbelievable but true, Joseph Smith finally demanded "by revelation" the wives of every one of the 12 Mormon Apostles.¹⁷ That it was lust for one more body to add to his harem is clear from some of the accounts. For example, Vilate Kimball, first wife of Apostle Heber C. Kimball, pleaded to remain with her husband in spite of Joseph's demand that she be "consecrated" over to him according to a "revelation" he had received. Very apologetically, not wishing to go against the "counsel of the Lord," Apostle Kimball asked whether "his daughter wouldn't do as well as his wife." The "Prophet" replied that "she would do just as well, and the Lord would accept her instead."¹⁸

Loyal Mormons have tried to justify their "Prophet" by suggesting that the accusations of taking other men's wives were lies told by his enemies to discredit him. However, the stories were told by too many people, many of them loyal to Joseph Smith, and agree in too many details, to be explained away as lies. John D. Lee tells of being on a trip with one H.B. Jacobs, who was "bragging about his wife and two children, what a true, virtuous, lovely woman she was... but little did he think that in his absence she was sealed to the Prophet Joseph and was his wife."¹⁹

Stealing Wives for Eternity

William Hall reported that he had heard Brigham Young say to Jacobs after Joseph Smith's death, "The woman you claim for a wife does not belong to you. She is the spiritual wife of brother Joseph, sealed to him (October 27, 1841).²⁰ I am his proxy, and she, in this behalf, with her children, are my property. You can go where you please, and get another...." Apparently accepting whatever Brigham Young said as Joseph Smith's successor, Jacobs "stood as witness in the Nauvoo temple in January 1846 when Zina was sealed to Brigham Young `for time and to Joseph Smith `for eternity..)"²¹ The comments of Ann Eliza Young, one of Brigham's many wives, give further insight:

He taught them [married women] that all former marriages were null and void, and that they were at perfect liberty to make another choice of a husband. The marriage covenants were not binding, because they were ratified only by Gentile laws... [which] the Lord did not recognize, consequently all the women were free.

One woman said to me...: "the greatest trial I ever endured in my life was living with my husband and deceiving him, by receiving Joseph's attentions whenever he chose to come to me." This woman, and others... were seduced under the guise of religion....

Some of these women have since said they did not know who was the father of their children; this is not to be wondered at, for after Joseph's declaration annulling all Gentile marriages, the greatest promiscuity was practiced...

Leading Mormons have tried to justify their "Prophet" by suggesting that he practiced a special kind of celestial marriage, whereby married women were "sealed" to him for eternity, but that he had no sexual relations with them on earth-that would only begin in heaven. This may have been true for some of his 84 or more wives, but certainly not for all of them. Typical of this attempt to justify the "Prophet" is the following from Apostle John A. Widtsoe:

Zealous women, married or unmarried, loving the cause of the restored gospel... asked that they might be sealed to the Prophet for eternity. They were not to be his wives on earth, in mortality, but only after death in the eternities.... Such marriages led to misunderstandings by those not of the church... yet there may be women who prefer to spend eternity with another than their husband on earth."²³

According to Jesus, there is no marriage relationship in heaven.²⁴ Even if there were, however, Widtsoe's argument is a strange one that assumes it is less of a crime to steal another man's wife for eternity than to steal her for a few years on earth. Wife-stealing among the Mormons was so common that many other examples could be given if we had space. The case of Mary Elizabeth Rollins Lightner, however, is of particular interest because she told her story in a public speech at Brigham Young University in 1905:

... He not only preached [polygamy], but he practiced it. I am a living witness to it. It was given to him before he gave it to the Church.

An angel came to him... with a drawn sword in his hand and told Joseph if he did not go into that principle he would slay him.

I asked him if Emma knew about me and he said, "Emma thinks the world of you."

I had been dreaming for a number of years I was his wife. I thought I was a great sinner... but when Joseph sent for me he told me all of these things.

"Well," said I, "don't you think it was an angel of the Devil that told you these things?"

Said he, "No, it was an angel of God. God almighty showed me the difference between an angel of Light and Satan's angels."²⁵

Joseph said I was his before I came here and he said all the Devils in Hell should never get me from him. I was sealed to him in the Masonic Hall... by Brigham Young in February 1842....

Heber C.Kimball [gave] the blessing.... My husband was [traveling] far away from me at the time...²⁶

What Mentality Is This?

No Mormon today has any excuse for being ignorant of the fact that in order to become a "god" he must practice polygamy, for it is the declared essence of God-making. Brigham Young put it bluntly: "The only men who become Gods, even the Sons of God, are those who enter into polygamy."²⁷ This "restored gospel" is absurd just on the basis of statistics: There aren't enough women for very many men to have even one extra wife, much less the scores and even hundreds promised by Joseph Smith! Apostle Heber C.Kimball boasted that in heaven Mormon men who wanted more wives could go to the Prophet Joseph Smith with their request and he would say, "Here are thousands, have all you want."²⁸

Apparently there will be more wife-stealing in heaven, because according to the teaching on "exaltation," no woman can get there without a husband. Though not now practiced openly (there are thousands of Mormon fundamentalist polygamists in Utah) because of the insistence of the federal government, polygamy will be the rule in the kingdom, when the Mormon Church is expected to be in control of the world. Even now it remains a central doctrine of Mormonism. Those who deny it must deny their entire Mormon religion. John J.Stewart reminds fellow Mormons: "... Seven of our nine Church presidents have lived plural marriage, and... this principle still is and always will be a doctrine of the Church."²⁹ Wilford Woodruff, fourth President of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, who signed the 1890 Manifesto agreeing to cease the practice of polygamy but who perjured himself in court and continued to lead his Church in violation of his sworn promise, left this reminder for all Mormons today:

If we were to do away with polygamy... then we must do away with prophets and Apostles, with revelation and the gifts and graces of the Gospel, and finally give up our religion altogether...³⁰

President Woodruff left no middle ground. Either go along with Joseph Smith's polygamy or renounce Mormonism entirely. Any Latter-day Saint honestly facing the plain language of Section 132 in Doctrine and Covenants would have to do just that, denouncing Joseph Smith as a false prophet and worse. Verse 1 begins with the Lord saying that He is responding to Joseph's inquiry concerning polygamy. Forgetting the many contradictions (such as God approving polygamy in the Bible, which is false), in verses 51 and 52 Joseph's wife, Emma, is commanded of the Lord to "receive all those [plural wives] that have been given unto my servant Joseph." So the "revelation" itself confirms the fact that, in brazen disobedience to the Book of Mormon, Section 101 of Doctrine and Covenants, the Bible, and the laws of the land, Joseph had already taken plural wives before he checked it out with "the Lord." Even Mormon leaders have admitted that by all laws he was a wanton adulterer.

What kind of mentality would cause anyone, much less a "Prophet," to ask God, in view of all of the Scriptures against it, whether He approved adultery? This mentality was inherited by Joseph Smith's successors and is thoroughly embedded in Mormon thinking today: the belief that God contradicts Himself, so that "revelation is what President Joseph Smith said, unless the current President Gordon B. Hinckley says differently." The consequences of such amoral thinking are both ludicrous and destructive. This mentality causes Mormon missionaries to ask prospective converts to pray about whether Joseph Smith is a true Prophet and the Book of Mormon is true. Both Smith and the Book of Mormon contradict in many ways what God already has said through biblical prophets. It is just as perverse to ask for divine endorsement of obvious contradiction and falsehood as it is to ask God whether adultery is all right. When Joseph Smith did that, he received the "revelation" he desired. In similar manner, those who pray for a "burning in the bosom" to verify the divine call of Joseph Smith and his Book of Mormon will, if that is what they want, just as surely get it-and from the same source.

What mentality did the "Prophet" have? Contemptuous of truth, he changed or created Scripture to serve his own ends. "Sealing" in the Temple for eternity and celestial marriage were just devices to get what he wanted, including wealth, power, and sex. He deceived thousands in his day, and continues to deceive millions today. The following statement was sworn by Apostle Orson Pratt's first (and at that time only) wife, Sarah:

You should bear in mind that Joseph did not think of marriage or sealing ceremony for many years. He used to state to his intended victims, as he did to me, "God does not care if we have a good time, if only other people do not know it."

He only introduced a marriage ceremony when he found out that he could not get certain women without it....

If any woman, like me, opposed his wishes, he used to say: "Be silent, or I shall ruin your character. My character must be sustained in the interest of the Church."³¹

Facing the Consequences

Although the majority of the Mormon women were not happy with the new "revelation" (some complained bitterly against it and some committed suicide in despair), many of the men, especially the leaders, embraced it enthusiastically. Polygamy became one of the most dogmatically held doctrines in the Church. It was declared that Adam, God the Father, and Jesus Christ were all polygamists,³² that being a polygamist was synonymous with being a Latter-day Saint,³³ that it was the cure of all social evils,³⁴ and that it was as much a part of the gospel as baptism for remission of sins.³⁵ In effect it became the cornerstone of the faith. Orson Pratt, who had been in despair upon learning that Joseph Smith had attempted to seduce his wife, returned to the Church after the "revelation" and became an Apostle and the outstanding apologist of Mormonism. Pratt said:

... If plurality of marriage [polygamy] is not true... then marriage for eternity is not true, and your faith is all vain, and all the sealing ordinances and powers pertaining to marriages for eternity are vain, worthless, good for nothing; for as sure as one is true the other also must be true.³⁶

The sad facts are clear. Unfortunately for the credibility of Mormonism, the entire structure is built upon Joseph Smith alone and either stands or falls with him. Moreover, the very Apostles and Presidents who rightly declared that anyone who renounced polygamy ought logically to renounce all of Joseph Smith's other "revelations" and Mormonism itself did themselves consent to the Manifesto of 1890 doing away with polygamy. Many of them admitted later in court that they had lied when making this pledge and had secretly continued to live in polygamy and even to "seal" plural marriages in the Temple.³⁷ In 1904, however, plural marriages were finally dissolved by the Church, and polygamy was equated with fornication and adultery. It was too late, however, to change the many inspired pronouncements by Mormon Prophets and Apostles to the effect that giving up polygamy was the same as abandoning Mormonism altogether.

This leaves the sincere Mormon in a perplexing dilemma. The key to his "exaltation" (godhood), the "new and everlasting covenant," the most important "revelation" ever given to man, the very essence of Mormonism, and the religion of heaven that Mormon Prophets and Apostles swore would never be given up has now been declared by these same men to be a crime! The zealous Mormons who practice polygamy today in obedience to Joseph Smith's most important "revelation" are excommunicated from the Mormon Church. When will The Brethren change their minds again? The obvious answer to that question is whenever they please; for they, like Brigham Young, are above the law, and their god from Kolob frequently contradicts himself through his chosen "Prophets."

Where Is the Courage of Conviction?

Today's Mormons affirm that polygamy is still all that Joseph Smith claimed, but that the Church is temporarily excommunicating and branding as criminals any Mormons who practice it to prevent wholesale persecution and imprisonment of its members by the government and destruction of Mormondom.

Since when did real servants of God bow to godless government edicts and compromise their faith for expediency's sake or to save their own skins? Why was Joseph Smith's "unexcelled courage" so great in practicing polygamy in secret, but so pitifully weak when it came to proclaiming it to the world-so much so that he made repeated public denials that he even believed in this most holy doctrine? And why did his successors do the same, bowing to the United States government and making the cornerstone of their faith a crime punishable with imprisonment and excommunication? If polygamy is indeed the very heart of the "restored gospel of Jesus Christ," the key to salvation, then this good news of exaltation through polygamy ought to be preached to the whole world at all cost; and woe to those who shrink from doing so in order to stay out of prison.

Christ commanded His disciples and all who would be His true followers to go into all the world and preach the gospel to every person. He never said that we were free not to do so if it meant that we might suffer for it. Millions of Christians have died for their faith down through the centuries-from the Roman coliseums to the gas chambers of Hitler's Germany and the gulags of Russia and China-and are still suffering imprisonment and death for their Lord and His gospel. There were and are almost no Mormons among these millions of faithful martyrs.

Mormons today complain that they are being persecuted whenever someone disagrees with them and tries to reasonably point out the fallacies in what they believe. But they know little of the torture and death that millions of Christians have endured. That is why Christians today find it more than a bit ironic that Mormons claim there was a total apostasy for 1800 years, and that they have "restored" true Christianity-yet Christians died for their faith all these centuries, but present-day Mormons won't stand up openly for what they believe because it would mean they might have to go to prison as polygamists.

Mormons claim that Joseph Smith did indeed go to prison for his beliefs, and that he died as a martyr. It would be stretching the facts beyond credibility to maintain that claim. The fact is that Smith went to prison for denying his beliefs, not for standing up for them. He was arrested and imprisoned for persecuting other people, and he died in a blazing gun battle in which he killed at least two men and wounded another. The mob that murdered him committed a heinous crime, but the fact is that he did not die quietly, like a lamb led to the slaughter, as did Jesus Christ. Joseph Smith answered back viciously against those who accused him, and they didn't accuse him wrongfully, as the Pharisees did Jesus. Joseph Smith was no martyr, but a fighter who in utter disregard for the freedom of the press and rights of others physically destroyed a newspaper that criticized him. This was the crime for which he was arrested and imprisoned.

Not all of the Mormon leaders went along with polygamy. Some tried to reason with Smith, but found it impossible. They were also concerned about his political ambitions. Joseph Smith had been crowned "king" over the Mormon kingdom, and was running for president of the United States in 1844. Distressed by the immorality among the leadership of the Church, these men decided to publish a newspaper that would tell the truth to Mormons and non-Mormons alike. Called the Nauvoo Expositor, it had only one edition. The following is a sample from that first and only edition:

It is notorious fact, that many females... are requested to meet Brother Joseph, or some of the Twelve [Apostles] at some insulated point, or at some particularly described place on the bank of the Mississippi, or at some room, which wears upon its front-POSITIVELY NO ADMITTANCE.

... After having been sworn in one of the most solemn manners, to never divulge what is revealed to them, with a penalty of death attached, that God Almighty has revealed it to him, that she should be his [Joseph's] spiritual wife, "for it was right anciently and God will tolerate it again: but we must keep those pleasures and blessings from the world, for until there is a change in government, we will endanger ourselves by practicing it... »³⁸

The Expositor was exposing the truth, and Joseph Smith knew it would bring down his empire. True to form, he moved quickly to silence his accusers. As mayor of Nauvoo, which was now the largest city in Illinois, Joseph Smith called the city council together, where he and his brother Hyrum perjured themselves once again by denying any involvement in polygamy or adultery. Having on the basis of his own false testimony gotten a vote declaring the Expositor a public nuisance, Joseph Smith "immediately ordered the marshal to destroy it without delay."³⁹ An armed mob of several hundred men converged on the newspaper. They dragged the press, equipment, and supplies (including almost all of the first edition) out into the streets, smashed the press, and burned everything. It was for that crime, and the crime of treason in calling out the Nauvoo Legion to prevent officials of the law from arresting him, that the governor of the State of Illinois arrested and imprisoned Joseph and Hyrum Smith.

From Criminal to Martyr Hero

Bigamy was a crime in the State of Illinois, and government officials had been investigating the Mormons not only for this but also for many other alleged crimes. At the time of his murder in the Carthage jail, Joseph Smith was under indictment by the Carthage grand jury for polygamy, and likely would have been sentenced to prison for that crime had he not been killed. If his murder saved him from imprisonment for polygamy, it probably also saved the Mormon Church from destruction by causing the "Saints" to rally around Joseph Smith as their martyr hero. As a result, the polygamy that he had loved so well became one of the most staunchly held doctrines by the leadership that succeeded him. Besides the sexual attraction of polygamy, it was in Joseph Smith's successors' own interest to build up the "Prophet" as perfect in everything he had done, in order to establish their power as the ones upon whom his mantle had fallen. Therefore, when they finally had the courage to bring polygamy out into the open, the "Prophets" and "Apostles" competed with each other to see who could most loudly and eloquently sound the praises of polygamy. If what Joseph Smith and dozens of other Mormon "Prophets" and "Apostles" said about polygamy was true, then no prohibition by the United States government can change its virtues. The consequences for every Mormon today could not be spelled out more clearly than by Apostle Orson Pratt:

The Lord has said that those who reject this principle [polygamy] reject their salvation, they shall be damned.⁴⁰

These men were either telling the truth or they were liars. If they told the truth, then the whole Mormon Church, from its President on down, is in a state of apostasy for rejecting polygamy even temporarily. If they along with Joseph Smith lied or even exaggerated about polygamy, then nothing else they said can be trusted. The foundation of Mormonism collapses either way.

Whether polygamy is accepted or rejected does not change the sordid facts surrounding this "revelation" that exposes Joseph Smith as an incurable womanizer, seducer, and liar who brought forth a "revelation" from "the Lord" to sanctify his lust. If such a man were really visited by angels, they wouldn't be angels of God. Nor would an angel of God force anyone into the secret practice of polygamy at the point of a sword. There is only one other possibility. This tells us all we need to know about the "angel" Moroni, who gave Joseph Smith the Book of Mormon and stands sentinel atop Mormon Temples.

SECRETS, SURPRISES, AND PERILS OF GOD-MAKING

It is an inescapable fact that Joseph Smith kept polygamy a secret teaching and practice, denying it publicly right to the time of his death on the night of June 27, 1844. Although he claimed to have had a "revelation" that polygamy was an essential step on the path to "godhood," Smith shared this secret only with an inner corps of the elite, which meant that most Mormons were deprived of this great "truth," and many died without ever having been told. It was eight years after Smith's death before this essential requirement was at long last published, and 32 years before it became scripture. Now it has been taken away by the Church authorities, depriving the average Mormon once again of an understanding of this essential "key" to "exaltation." In view of the many conclusive statements by Mormon "Prophets" and "Apostles," such as the following by President Joseph Fielding Smith, it is clear that the present Mormon Church leaders are holding back from their followers that "key" without which all their other attempts to reach "godhood" are doomed to fail.

... The doctrine of the eternal union of husband and wife and of plural marriage is one of the most important doctrines ever revealed to man in any age of the world.

Without it we could never be exalted to associate with and become Gods....¹

It is therefore only prudent to ask whether there are other essentials for godhood that are not being honestly explained to Mormon members by the leaders of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints. Are there perils and problems that are not being fully disclosed that could catch the average Mormon by surprise? From a careful study of the sermons and writings of Mormon General Authorities, it becomes clear that there is indeed much crucial information being held back, which, if it were generally understood, would cause many Church members to give up any hope of ever reaching Mormonism's ultimate goal. In a sermon that many Mormons consider to be Joseph Smith's most important (delivered just seven weeks before his death, at the conference held in Nauvoo, near the Temple), Joseph Smith declared:

When you climb a ladder, you must begin at the bottom and ascend step by step until you arrive at the top; and so it is with the principles of the Gospel; you must begin with the first, and go on until you learn all the principles of exaltation.

But it will be a great while after you have passed through the vail [of death] before you will have learned them all.

It is not all to be comprehended in this world; it will be a great work to learn our salvation and exaltation even beyond the grave.²

The Unknown Path

So there is much more to the "restored gospel" than Joseph Smith knew himself. There could be, then, some shocking surprises along this path which continues into the hereafter. Neither the Bible nor the Book of Mormon speak of this path; indeed, they both condemn the very idea. We have only Joseph Smith's word for this, and even he wasn't fully informed. That puts the Mormon in an extremely uncomfortable and precarious position. Not even the "Prophets, Seers, and Revelators" of the Church know all that is involved or how long it will take to reach the coveted status of a "god" or "goddess."

The late Prophet Spencer W. Kimball wrote: "The Lord Jesus Christ... has given us our map-a code of laws and commandments whereby we might attain perfection and, eventually, Godhood."³ What does he mean by "eventually"? No details are given. It could be a very long and grueling climb up Joseph Smith's ladder to heaven.

The Bible offers eternal life as a free gift that can be received by simple faith here and now. The Christian "is [already] passed from death unto life."⁴ The moment we open our hearts to Christ, He comes in according to His promise,⁵ and by the witness of the Holy Spirit within we "know [present knowledge] that we have [present possession] eternal life."⁶ In contrast, the Mormon "Christ" points the LDS toward a path that is so endless and so difficult that no one can be sure he will ever reach the hoped-for "eternal life" lying at the end of it. President Kimball said, "All transgressions must be cleansed [by Temple rituals and good deeds], all weaknesses must be overcome before a person can attain perfection and godhood."⁷ He still hasn't told us how to do it or how long it will take. Kimball went on to say:

After a period there would be a resurrection... which would render us immortal and make possible our further climb toward perfection and godhood.⁸

So even after the resurrection one must keep on striving toward the goal of eternal life. When will a Mormon reach this fabled state? That is a question to which Mormonism offers no answer. Those who accept the "new and everlasting covenant" of Temple marriage for eternity and polygamy have committed themselves to a perilous and uncertain path which Joseph Smith himself neither fully understood nor credibly explained. That it could be a very long and disappointing journey seems evident from this special message of the First Presidency under Joseph F. Smith (Joseph F. Smith, John R. Winder, and Anthon H. Lund):

Man is the child of God, formed in the divine image and endowed with divine attributes, and even as the infant son of an earthly father and mother is capable in due time of becoming a man, so the undeveloped offspring of celestial parentage is capable, by experience through ages and aeons, of evolving into a God.⁹

The Masonic Parallels of the "Restored Gospel"

The relationship to Freemasonry's upward path is very clear. In the Entered Apprentice's Handbook, Masonic authority J.S.M. Ward explains that the secret Masonic Temple rites represent an upward path being climbed to perfection by the individual Mason, symbolized in the building of Solomon's Temple. High Masonic authority W.L. Wilmshurst writes: "A Master Mason... is no longer an ordinary man, but a divinized man."¹⁰ It was only after he became a Master Mason that Joseph Smith began to teach that "god" is a divinized man and that men can become "gods." The emphasis upon personal worthiness as the basis for exaltation is common to both Mormonism and Masonry. The Mason repeats at Lodge meetings, "The All-Seeing Eye will reward us according to our merits." The following Masonic Crafting Hymn could also be sung of the Mormon climb to "godhood" through Temple rituals and good deeds:

Brothers faithful and deserving,
Now the second rank you fill,

Purchased by your faultless serving,
Leading to a higher still.

Thus from rank to rank ascending,
Mounts the Mason's path of love;

The pagan origins of Mormonism are very clearly seen in the explanations of how men become "gods." The Mormon "God" owes his status to two things: 1) the willing obedience of the trillions of "gods" under him, who could vote him out at any time;¹² and 2) his own obedience to mysterious universal "laws and forces" that have existed forever in "untold numbers"¹³ in and of themselves (i.e., laws without a Lawgiver). These are thus greater than the "gods," for it is these "principles of exaltation" that have literally made the "gods," all of whom were once mortal men. These are ancient occult ideas that are being revived and gaining new respectability in today's New Age movement.

Initiates of the Secret (Occult) Path

The whole purpose of Mormonism as revealed through Joseph Smith is to initiate its members into this secret path to "godhood" and to provide them with occult "keys, secret signs, names, handshakes" and various passwords to gain access to unspecified "laws and forces." By obedience to these universal laws, mastery is to be gained over mysterious cosmic forces, thus enabling the worthy Mormon eventually to become a "god" or "goddess" like all the "gods" and "goddesses" who have climbed up before along this same path to "exaltation."

Prior to entering the LDS Temple, most initiates attend a "Temple preparation" class. The manual Achieving a Celestial Marriage (1976, Corp. of the President of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints) is singularly interesting in that there are no instructions about what to do once you are inside the temple—just how to be worthy for the endowment and celestial marriage.

Milton R. Hunter explained it in these words:

Then how did he become glorified and exalted and attain his present status of Godhood?... [He] undoubtedly took advantage of every opportunity to learn the laws of truth and as he became acquainted with each new verity he righteously obeyed it.

From day to day he exerted his will vigorously, and as a result became thoroughly acquainted with the forces lying about him. As he gained more knowledge through persistent effort and continuous industry, as well as through absolute obedience, his understanding of the universal laws continued to become more complete.

Thus he grew in experience and continued to grow until he attained the status of Godhood.¹⁴

In essence, the "restored gospel of Jesus Christ" that was revealed through Joseph Smith offers the Mormon a chance to step onto this same endless and laborious path (that all the "Gods" have ascended in ages past) in quest of his own "Godhood." The "good news" proclaimed by Mormonism is that sinful, mortal humans have the wonderful opportunity to pull themselves up by their bootstraps and (by discovering all of these untold laws and forces and by perfectly living up to all they require of us) become "gods" and create their own universes. This same fantasy has been expressed in thousands of myths since the dawn of history.

All of the above is simply an introduction to an understanding of the secret rituals that take place in Mormon Temples. These eternal "laws and forces" are the mysterious power that the Mormon Melchizedek Priesthood is designed to tap into. That Priesthood enters the path to "exaltation" through secret pagan rituals performed in Mormon Temples. To the average Mormon, there is an overpowering mystique associated with these sanctuaries. And well there might be, for the secret Mormon path to "godhood" winds back and forth through the Temple in repetition of occult ceremonies, 98 percent of which are for the dead. The most important of these is celestial marriage (which includes polygamy) and "sealings" for eternity of family members to one another. According to Dr. Goodman:

The goal of every Latter-day Saint is to be married as a family unit in the "House of the Lord," and there receive these sacred blessings that will allow us eventually, if we're worthy, to dwell and be in the presence of our heavenly Father.

We need to receive certain instructions, certain information and certain ordinances.... That is the only way that we can be with Him to rule and reign with Him. Otherwise, we could not be in His presence.¹⁵

Becoming Worthy

There is that same word eventually again. How long will it take before Mormons can eventually gain access to the "presence of our heavenly Father"? Dr. Goodman doesn't explain, because not even Joseph Smith knew. That phrase "if we're worthy" represents a mammoth and undefined "if." Everything depends upon it; whereas, the Christian's salvation depends upon Christ's worthiness, and the admission on the individual's part that he is an unworthy sinner. According to the Bible, because Christ's sacrifice upon the cross has paid the full price for our sins that was demanded by infinite justice, every true Christian has instant access into the Father's presence through prayer; and upon death his soul and spirit go immediately to heaven.

Paul described this transition through death as "absent from the body and... present with the Lord."¹⁶ When Christ returns, all those who have received Him as Savior and Lord will be "in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye... caught up together with them [the resurrected dead] in the clouds, to meet the Lord in the air; and so shall we ever be with the Lord."¹⁷ Not so for the Mormon, who according to the "restored gospel" must struggle for "ages and aeons" to get eventually to heaven, if somehow he is able to become worthy enough to merit it.

To learn how to become "worthy" to do their Temple work, Latter-day Saints attend special "Temple Preparation Seminars." Eagerly beginning these classes and expecting to learn at last what really goes on inside Mormondom's tightly guarded sanctuaries, the candidate is in for a perplexing disappointment. Instead of receiving specific instruction about Temple ceremonies, he finds that he is being prepared to face an unknown but crucial initiation ritual that he cannot be informed about in advance. Nor will he be informed, until he has been admitted inside the Temple. The Temple preparation manual, Achieving Celestial Marriage (ACMM), is just as evasive as everything else surrounding the mysteries of the Temple, but it does point each member to that path to exaltation.

If God became God by obedience to all of the gospel law with the crowning point being the celestial law of marriage, then that's the only way I can become a god.

The endowment is the celestial course of instruction... being enabled to give them the key words, the signs and tokens, pertaining to the priesthood and gain your eternal exaltation in spite of earth and hell (ACMM, page 203).

Emphasizing loyalty to Joseph Smith and the Church he founded, 11 of the 12 seminar lessons focus upon the personal worthiness required to become part of a secret circle of Mormon elite called "Temple Mormons." In the twelfth session the instructor finally discusses the actual Temple visit, but without revealing a single sacred secret. To the candidate's disappointment, his anxious questions continue to receive the by-now-monotonous response required in the instructor's manual: "You will learn the answer to that as you serve in the Temple." The closest the candidates come to learning that Temple work is really only the first step in a long and arduous journey is when they are given Brigham Young's instruction:

Your endowment is to receive all those ordinances in the House of the Lord, which are necessary for you, after you have departed this life, to enable you to walk back to the presence of the Father, passing the angels who stand as sentinels, being enabled to give them the key words, the signs and tokens pertaining to the Holy Priesthood, and gain your eternal exaltation in spite of earth and hell.¹⁸

Tony and Debbie didn't get that far. While they were taking the Temple Preparation Seminars, so many serious questions were sidestepped by the instructor that this constant "You'll learn that in the Temple" began to sound evasive. Instead of answering questions, the seminars were raising more questions and creating doubts. Why all the secrecy? And why wasn't there something in the Bible or at least in the Book of Mormon about Temple work? There were a few references in Journal of Discourses and Doctrine and Covenants, but nothing very revealing about the ceremonies. How could the Church expect Tony and Debbie to commit themselves to Temple work, yet refuse answers to honest questions? Tony told us:

My wife and I knew that we couldn't obtain our exaltation to "Godhood" without going through the Temple, so we enrolled in a Temple Preparation class.

Although the instructor wouldn't answer our questions about the Temple, we were learning that everything depended upon our becoming "worthy."

One evening after coming home, we decided to see what the Bible said about the Temple and its ceremonies. There was nothing in the Bible about "Christian" temples.

However, in Romans 4 we read that a man is justified by faith and not by works, and even that good works were a stumbling stone to those who try to pursue their salvation that way.

We really began to doubt that the Temple ceremony was biblical, even though the Church had told us it was. Studying more, we found that the Bible was in serious conflict with Mormon theology and doctrine.

We went through a period where we were in a very depressed state. In order for us to accept what we were reading about the true and living Jesus Christ... we would be alienated from all of our friends and relatives.

We went ahead and decided that Jesus was to be the way, the truth, and life for our family.

The Staggering Burden of Perfection

Having completed the seminar series, the candidate now vaguely realizes that inside the Temple he will be learning secrets and gaining mysterious Priesthood powers. If he learns and applies them perfectly, these will enable him to pass safely whatever fearsome tests await him in the spirit world and eventually to gain access to the heavenly Father's presence, perhaps in a few trillion years, when he has attained perfection. In spite of the joyful anticipation of entering the Temple, a disquieting feeling that will grow into a heavy burden is settling upon him. He now realizes that regardless of whatever lip service Mormonism may give to Jesus Christ as Savior, the awesome responsibility for his own salvation, in the final analysis, rests upon him.

The most sobering realization is that nothing less than 100 percent perfection will do.

In fact, during the actual Temple ritual (in a confrontation between the yet-to-be-born apostles Peter, James, and John), Lucifer, still teaching pure Mormon doctrines, has this to say to the Temple patrons:

LUCIFER: Aah! You have looked over my kingdom, and my greatness and glory. Now you want to take possession of the whole of it. (Lucifer turns, and stares into the camera.) I have a word to say concerning these people. If they do not walk up to every covenant they make at these altars in this temple this day, they will be in my power! [emphasis added-temple script on file].

What a curse to lay upon the heads of the Mormon people!

The candidate now hopes fervently that the secrets he will learn in the Temple will give him the power to attain this perfection. The late Mormon "Prophet" and President, Spencer W.Kimball, wrote these words:

This progress toward eternal life is a matter of achieving perfection.

Living all the commandments [there are over 4300 in Mormonism] guarantees total forgiveness of sins and assures one of exaltation through that perfection which comes by complying with the formula the Lord gave us.¹⁹

In Mormonism, the blood of Christ atones for Adam's sin only, which brings resurrection to all, including animals and birds.²⁰ Christ's blood doesn't atone for a single individual sin,²¹ which can be paid for only by 100 percent obedience to every command, or in some cases with one's own blood being shed, according to the "restored gospel."²² Moreover, no one can be saved in ignorance.²³ Therefore, not only must the Mormon know every one of the more than 4300 Mormon laws, but after the resurrection he must somehow discover the other untold numbers of laws and perfectly obey every one of them. Joseph Smith's logic can't be faulted at this point, for if one is to become God, then surely nothing less than 100 percent perfection will do.

When they understand what is really involved in achieving "exaltation," many Mormons begin to have serious doubts about whether they want to become "gods" and "goddesses" after all. It seems a very long path and too great a responsibility for humans. They wonder at this point whether the "restored gospel" of Joseph Smith is in fact the "good news" it seemed to be when they first heard it but didn't fully understand it. Unfortunately, for most Mormons it is too late to turn back at this point. They have committed themselves too deeply. The price would be too great in loss of friends, family, prestige, and self-esteem to back away from the Church. And what else is there, since all other churches are an "abomination"? They remain Mormons in name only, for social reasons. As for the coveted "godhood," they've got enough problems just being humans without aiming for that. Their conscience tells them that it just isn't possible.

Credit Card to Eternity

To be admitted to the Temple, every Mormon must obtain a "Temple Recommend" by satisfactorily passing an interview first with his local Ward Bishop (comparable to a pastor) and then with his Stake President (who presides over up to ten Wards). Among the 17 specific areas covered, the candidate must satisfy these Church officials that he abstains from the use of coffee, tea, alcohol, tobacco, and cola drinks; that he "sustains" the General Authorities and local authorities of the Church; and that he attends all meetings possible, deals honestly with everyone, is morally clean, and tithes ten percent of his income to the Church; that he doesn't associate with apostate groups (non-Mormons) and has no "anti-Mormon literature" (anything that questions Mormonism) in his home; and that he is fully obeying all of the "commandments of the Gospel." To think critically for oneself is not only discouraged by the Mormon hierarchy, but is also considered to be inspired by the Devil.²⁴

Needless to say, no Latter-day Saint, no matter how "worthy" in his own or his Church's eyes, is perfectly obeying all of the laws included in Mormonism's "restored gospel." The Bible declares: "If we say that we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us.... If we say that we have not sinned, we make him a liar, and his word is not in us."²⁵

However, the desire for the annual "Temple Recommend" is so great that it bends the truth and dulls consciences. What indescribable joy for the Mormon who walks out of those interviews approved for another year! Possession of that small piece of paper certifying one's "worthiness" is like having a credit card to eternity and breeds a self-righteous pride that is almost immune to the normal pangs of conscience.

Point of No Return

Once inside the Temple, the candidate has just seconds to make decisions of eternal consequence. Like a blind person being led by the hand, he must now commit himself unreservedly to Joseph Smith and the Mormon hierarchy, or else abandon the Temple and all hope of "exaltation" in shame. This is when many Mormons want to cut and run, but few do. The candidate must commit himself to participate in still-unknown ceremonies, from which there will be no retreat. It is like being asked to jump over a cliff with the promise that there is a net to catch you at the bottom. For many a Mormon, fear and uncertainty replace eager anticipation at this point. Yet the programmed belief that the long-sought secrets of the Temple hold his only hope for gaining eternal life pushes him on despite unanswered questions and haunting doubts.

An inner conditioning process that has been going on for months or years is now reaching a climax beyond which there will be very little likelihood of ever consciously questioning The Brethren again, no matter how many red flags are waved by reason and conscience. There has been a blind commitment to Joseph Smith and the Church he founded ever since that "burning in the bosom," a willing surrender of one's mind to let the hierarchy do the thinking and dictate the demands. There have been moments of doubt, nagging questions that were put on the shelf. But once that step forward to participate in the Temple rituals has been taken, something clicks inside the soul, like a door being slammed shut, putting those questions forever out of reach. This is the final step, the full surrender to an endless path of self-righteous striving to be perfect that conscience has warned against again and again; but from now on conscience must remain silent.

"Temple Recommend" clutched in hand, and having swallowed hard with determination to go through with it, the nervous initiate is in for several quick shocks. Husbands and wives joyfully anticipating having their marriage "sealed" in the Temple for eternity are immediately parted and will only come together briefly after having endured two hours of rituals separate from each other. Led first to men's and women's dressing rooms, they are instructed to strip stark naked. Oddly enough, each person locks his clothes in an individual locker, though no one but worthy Temple Mormons has access to the carefully guarded premises.

"Garment (Underwear) of the Holy Priesthood"

After partially covering their nudity with a poncho-like piece of thin cotton completely open on both sides, to which the key to their locker is pinned, the "Temple patrons," as they are called, are led to the "washing and anointing" room. There Temple workers first ceremoniously "wash" the various parts of their nude bodies with water, reaching under the open "shield," as it is called, and then "anoint" the initiates with oil in a similar manner. During this startling process, a singsong formula is recited by the Temple worker bestowing a special blessing upon each body part being "washed" or "anointed." This is the preparation for being dressed in the "Garment of the Holy Priesthood" (a sort of "magic underwear," much like an old-fashioned set of long johns with those Masonic markings sewn into it). The Temple worker recites:

... Having authority, I place this garment upon you [for and in behalf of (patron, then worker, both speak the name of the deceased), who is dead], which you must wear throughout your life.

It represents the garment given to Adam when he was found naked in the Garden of Eden, and is called the Garment of the Holy Priesthood.

Inasmuch as you do not defile it, but are true and faithful to your covenants, it will be a shield and a protection to you against the power of the destroyer until you have finished your work here on earth.

With this garment I give you a new name, which you should always remember, and which you must keep sacred, and never reveal except at a certain place that will be shown you hereafter.

The name is ²⁶

To remain in good standing as a Temple Mormon who continues to perform the rituals essential in getting off to a good start on the infinite journey to "godhood," both men and women must wear the magic underwear 24 hours each day for the rest of their mortal lives. Jim and Judy expressed their feelings after having worn these sacred long johns for years. "This garment is supposed to be all-magical and all-protective," said Jim, "keeping you from harm if you're living the gospel of the Latter-day Saints." This is one more example of what otherwise-intelligent people will do when they have surrendered the right to think for themselves.

His wife, Judy, added, "The garment is supposed to be worn next to your skin, and with your other underclothes on top of that to protect your body. It's really just like wearing a rabbit's foot. It's a superstition." Granny Geer explained how seriously this is taken by devout Mormons:

After I had helped my grandmother to bathe and helped her out of the tub, we would dry the left leg and put the clean garment on it... and only then would she take the old garment off the right leg.

As late as 1916, Mormons were reminded by a message from the First Presidency that the magic underwear of the elite corps of Temple Mormons had to be "of the approved pattern" and must be "worn as intended down to the wrists and ankles, and around the neck."²⁷ But fashions change, and Mormon women especially found it embarrassing to be wearing underwear that was so incompatible with modern dress. There were exhortations from Church leaders not to succumb to worldly fashion, and solemn warnings that it would jeopardize one's "godhood" to deviate from the pattern that Prophet Joseph Smith had received from heaven.²⁸ Nevertheless, in 1923 the Mormon hierarchy finally capitulated to changing styles (the Mormon "God" apparently deciding that he could be somewhat flexible in his requirements about magic underwear). Now a two-piece garment cut off above elbow and knee is allowed to be worn. And when it is difficult to keep this sacred garment a secret, such as in the military or while participating in athletics, it may even be temporarily discarded. Fundamentalist Mormons are troubled by such deviations from "revelation" that seem to make a mockery of solemn pronouncements by past "Prophets," such as this from President Joseph F. Smith:

The Lord has given unto us garments of the Holy Priesthood... which should be held by [Mormons] the most sacred of all things in the world next to their own virtue... [and kept] unchanged and unaltered from the very pattern in which God gave them.²⁹

That Occult Connection Again

Dressed now in the secret and magic underwear, the Temple patrons go back to their lockers, where they put on white clothing, over which they will later wear the Robe of the Holy Priesthood. On a speaking tour in Brazil, Ed Decker dressed himself in the Mormon Temple costume to show his audience what it looked like, unaware of the effect it would have. When he came out on the stage of the large auditorium, the audience took one frightened look at him and panicked. There was a great commotion, as though someone had yelled "Fire!" That was how he learned that the high priests of the satanic Macumba cult wear white costumes almost identical to Mormon Temple clothing, including the peculiar white hat and unique robes of Joseph Smith's Melchizedek or High Priesthood.

The Temple rituals, with their secret signs and magic incantations, are pure occultism-pagan and not Christian. They violate the Bible, the Book of Mormon, and common sense. What kind of "God" honors secret handshakes and passwords, or needs them? This is the playacting of children's fantasies, the stuff of myths. Yet it is also how countless secret societies operate, for it encourages their delusion that they are superior to the uninitiated, that they have a special mission to "take over" the world, and that they are in touch with higher beings and mysterious powers known only to an inner circle of elite.

It is a double abomination for these occult rituals to go on in the name of Christ, for they deny His sacrifice upon the cross for our sins. The God of the Bible looks right into our hearts and is neither deceived nor impressed by secret signs and formulas. Indeed, He forbids this attempt to replace His grace and forgiveness with magic. Yet Adam and Eve, before being cast out of the Garden, are depicted in the Mormon Temple ceremony making "a secret covenant with Elohim ("The Father" in Mormonism) and receiving a secret token (handgrip), with its name, sign and penalty (blood/death oath)."³⁰ This is both nonsense and an abomination. The Bible says that we are known by our fruits (love, joy, peace, patience, etc.), not by magic signs. The blood of Christ shed for our sins-not secret handshakes-provides access to the presence of God.

In the dramatization they are watching, Temple patrons see Peter, James, and John sent by Elohim to rescue Adam and Eve, with no explanation how this could happen thousands of years before these apostles were born. These strange invaders from the future "prove" their identity by giving Adam and Eve the secret Masonic signs of the Mormon Priesthood. With Adam and Eve, the patrons advance to the Telestial Kingdom and the Terrestrial World, where they are put under covenant to obey more laws, and are taught their accompanying Priesthood tokens, names, signs, and penalties.³¹ Here they are also clothed in the Robes of the Holy Priesthood and taught the "True Order of Prayer."

Now the patrons are given a "test" such as they will allegedly face in the hereafter. At an elaborate "Veil," they are challenged to give the secret signs and passwords which they have just learned, and only by doing so will they be allowed to pass through to the other side. The Jewish Temple at Jerusalem (after which Mormon Temples are supposedly fashioned) had a veil so heavy that it took many priests to raise it enough for the high priest to enter once each year. When Christ cried upon the cross, "It is finished!" this veil was torn by the hand of God from the top to the bottom showing that the way into the presence of God had been opened up through His sacrifice for our sins.³² In Mormon Temples, however, this veil has been replaced by a flimsy, very thin, though beautiful curtain. Divided into sections with a men's and women's side, the "Veil" has numerous holes and Masonic markings corresponding to those on the magic underwear.

Behind each segment of this elaborate curtain, a Veil Worker representing "the Lord" challenges each patron being led up and assisted through the ritual by a Temple Worker. Patrons are told that they will someday have to meet the Mormon "God" in this exact manner; and if they cannot then remember all the tokens, signs, names, penalties, they will not be allowed to enter into His presence. Reaching their hands through holes in the flimsy Veil, each patron assumes with "the Lord" on the other side of the Veil the position of the "five points of fellowship" as in Masonry: inside of right foot to inside of right foot, knee to knee, breast to breast, hand to back and mouth to ear. In this "holy" position, the patron must perfectly repeat the following Mason's incantation: "Health in the navel, marrow in the bones, strength in the loins and in the sinews, power in the Priesthood be upon me and upon my posterity through all generations of time throughout all eternity."³³ While the recent changes in the rituals now leave out the breast-to-breast routine, the deeply occult incantation remains.

Since each patron is wearing the Luciferian fig-leaf apron which God rejected but Mormons have adopted, one need hardly wonder what power in what Priesthood the patrons are solemnly putting themselves under for eternity. In fact these oaths have put them in Lucifer's kingdom. Remember, just before they received the Robes of the Holy Priesthood, the patrons listened solemnly as Lucifer gave forth with Mormon doctrine, warning them that, "If they do not walk up to every covenant they make at these altars in this temple this day, they will be in my power!"³⁴ No one except Jesus has ever perfectly kept the Ten Commandments. Certainly no Mormon can do that, much less maintain 100 percent obedience to every one of the thousands of laws in the "restored gospel." Therefore, every Mormon going through the Temple and making these covenants has placed himself by solemn blood oaths completely under Satan's power and in full submission to The Brethren.

What Good Is a "Secret" That's No Longer Secret?

Mormons boast their Temples are guarded by God and angels, and that no one who is not "worthy" can enter without detection and expulsion. This has been proven to be a vain delusion on more than one occasion, when a "Gentile" or an "apostate" has gone through the entire Mormon Temple ceremony with a hidden tape recorder undetected by the Mormon "gods" and angels. The complete transcript with explanation has been published by former Veil Worker Chuck Sackett under the title What's Going On in There?

This was done to show the folly of "secrets" that can't be kept secret.

In the original edition of The God Makers, Dave and Ed asked these two questions:

1) Now that the Mormon Temple secrets are no longer secret, will The Brethren change the Temple rituals to establish new secrets?

2) By what authority and for what purpose?

The answer is that The Brethren have made significant changes, taking out things that books like The God Makers and Chuck Sackett's Whats Going On in There? have exposed as right out of the occult. To The Brethren, it was easier to change it than explain it, since no active Mormon would ever dare question their authority.

In exposing these former secrets, we only wish to help Mormons by demonstrating the folly of imagining that "secret" grips and signs are of any value. The God of the Bible looks into each heart, into each thought, and neither needs nor honors the childish secret passwords that seem impressive to men. Jesus said:

I am the good shepherd, and know my sheep, and am known of mine... and I lay down my life for the sheep.... My sheep hear my voice, and I know them, and they follow me: and I give unto them eternal life; and they shall never perish, neither shall any man pluck them out of my hand.³⁵

The secret formulas and incantations learned in Mormon Temples are supposed to enable those initiated into them to pass through ever-higher levels of initiation and eventually to take their rightful place among the "gods." This is what Satan told Eve she could do if she only gained the knowledge to do so. Declaring that evil spirits (devils) regularly inspired him during his sermons, and the Mormons "could not get along without them," Brigham Young also said, "You cannot get your endowment without the devil's being present."³⁶ Lucifer plays a far more active role in the Temple than Christ. Could this be the Temple of the true God? Or is it the Temple of the original God-Maker from the Garden of Eden?

And now we have further and surprising uncertainty expressed at the highest levels of Mormonism on the key concept of men becoming gods. Was the Mormon "god of this world" whom the Mormons worship and serve really once a man whose ascent to godhood proves that male Mormons can follow the same path to "exaltation"? That question, which goes to the very heart of Mormonism, was recently presented to the current Mormon president, Gordon B. Hinckley, by two Time correspondents, who reported the following:

On whether his church still holds that God the Father was once a man, he [Hinckley] sounded uncertain.

"I don't know that we teach it. I don't know that we emphasize it... I understand the philosophical background behind it, but I don't know a lot about it, and I don't think others know a lot about it." ¹³⁷

"Philosophical background"? This doctrine was taught by Joseph Smith as a revelation from God, not a philosophical idea. Is the Mormon Church now preparing to abandon the major purpose for which it has built temples all over the world?

THE GREAT TEMPLE / PRIESTHOOD SCAM

When plans were being laid for construction of the magnificent Salt Lake City Temple, Brigham Young had a brilliant idea for reducing labor and expense. Instead of cutting granite for the stone structure, he suggested that they use the much softer sandstone, which was cheaper and easier to work. Having taught for years that gold, silver, and stones "mature [grow] like hair,"¹ he was sure that sandstone, once in place, would grow into granite. Mormons were expected to take this seriously. Though it makes no sense, the "Prophet" must not be questioned, for "when our leaders speak, the thinking has been done."² Ezra Taft Benson, who was the next Mormon Prophet/President after Spencer W. Kimball, has said that the "Prophet" does not need to say "thus saith the Lord" to speak with authority, and that he can do so on any subject; and if science seems to be in conflict with what the "Prophet" has said, the voice of the "Prophet" must prevail.³

Latter-day Saints are taught that the multiplying Mormon Temples (soon to exceed 65) are being built around the world to implement the "restoration" begun by Joseph Smith of the "true Christianity" that was practiced in similar Temples since the days of Adam, and even in early America. There is no record, however, either in history or tradition to indicate that a "Christian temple" ever existed anywhere, much less that Christians ever practiced the pagan rituals now performed in Mormon Temples.

It is clear from the New Testament that the early Christians never participated in Temple ceremonies of any kind, much less secret ones. Mormon Apostle LeGrand Richards admitted that Mormon Temple doctrines "did not come to the Prophet Joseph Smith by reading the Bible...."⁴ The very concept of Temples designed for sacred rituals contradicts biblical Christianity. The individual Christian's body is described as "the temple of the Holy Spirit,"⁵ and the collective body of Christians throughout all ages is described by Paul as growing together into "a holy temple"⁶ comprised of "living stones"⁷ (i.e., the individual Christians). Joseph Fielding Smith admitted that "the saints of the primitive Christian Church did not have access to a temple. The [Jewish] temple in Jerusalem was the only temple...."⁸ Of course, they could have had access to that temple, but that would have meant going back to the animal sacrifices offered by the Aaronic priests-a system which had been fulfilled and done away with by the once-for-all sacrifice of Christ upon the cross.⁹

Paganism Restored

Since they themselves were nearly all Jewish by birth, many of the early Christians living in Jerusalem continued for tradition's sake to frequent the Jewish temple until its destruction in 70 A.D. that Christ had predicted.¹⁰ This had nothing to do, however, with Christianity, but with their Jewish heritage. The tabernacle that Moses built in the wilderness, followed by Solomon's temple and then the rebuilt temple which stood in Jerusalem in the days of Jesus, were the only structures of their kind ever ordained by God in the history of the world. The ceremonies and animal sacrifices offered by Aaronic priests in the tabernacle and temple were "a figure [symbol] for the time then present,"¹¹ which was fulfilled and done away with when Jesus Christ upon the cross "offered himself without spot to God"¹² as the perfect and complete sacrifice once and for all for our sins.¹³ This ended any further divinely sanctioned use of the temple in Jerusalem, which was destroyed by the Roman armies under Titus 40 years later and has not been rebuilt to this day.

Nevertheless, sincere Mormons are taught to believe Joseph Smith's fantasy that "true Christianity" (Mormonism) was being practiced in temples throughout the New World 2000 years ago by Jews called "Nephites." So says the Book of Mormon. Today's Mormon Temples have supposedly "restored" this "true Christianity" once again to America and the world. Unfortunately, not a trace has been found of the 38 major cities with their huge "Christian temples" mentioned in the Book of Mormon. (Christianity was first introduced by European settlers long after the Book-of-Mormon period had ended.) The many temples that archaeologists have uncovered in Central and South America involved the worship of pagan deities on altars that ran red with the blood of hundreds of thousands of human sacrifices. This is the real temple religion practiced in the Americas. If the Mormons want to claim a relationship to this religion, they are welcome to it.

The Serpent and the Mormon Christ

Incredibly, one of the most popular Visitor's Information Center pictures represents Christ's alleged visit to America as recorded in the Book of Mormon. It shows Jesus standing in the Yucatan in front of two well-known ancient temples, El Castillo and El Caracol. These were pagan, not Christian temples. Moreover, they were not built until about 1000 A.D., six centuries after the alleged Book-of-Mormon period ended and more than 900 years too late for Christ to have stood in front of either of them during his alleged visit to the Nephites. This type of deliberate misrepresentation is commonly used in the Church's attempts to give the Book of Mormon credibility, apparently without a twinge of conscience on the part of the Mormon hierarchy.

In trying to find historical support for the Book-of-Mormon visit of Christ to America just after His resurrection, Mormons have grasped at the legends of Quetzalcoatl. Milton R.Hunter states: "Quetzalcoatl could have been none other than Jesus the Christ, the Lord and God of this earth, and the Savior of the human family. Thus Jesus Christ and Quetzalcoatl are identical."¹⁴ The tradition of Quetzalcoatl dates from about 2000 B.C., when this mythical pagan deity, to whom human sacrifices were offered, began to be represented as a feathered serpent. The Feathered Serpent Cult was rampant throughout the Americas during the alleged Book-of-Mormon period. The only benign figure associated with the myth was a Toltec king who took the name of Quetzalcoatl between 950 and 1000 A.U. and was banished by the bloodthirsty priests-a bit late to be confused with an alleged visit of Christ to America. The Mormon leaders' persistence in this fantasy says as much about their "Jesus Christ" as it does about their honesty. Milton R.Hunter's attitude is typical Mormonism. In his book about Christ's alleged visit to America, after expounding upon the relationship of the "feathered serpent" of the Americas to the "plumed serpent" of Egypt and the Serpent in the Garden of Eden, Hunter goes on to say:

In this chapter and throughout the book, the serpent will be presented as a symbol of Quetzalcoatl or Jesus, and no further reference will be made to its identification with the Prince of Darkness or Lucifer.¹⁵

Having called the Serpent's lie to Eve "the truth," and having made his seductive promise of "godhood" their ultimate goal, and having accepted his offer of the fig-leaf apron patterned after his own Masonic apron, and having adopted this emblem of Satan's "power and priesthoods" as the most prominent part of their Priesthood Temple clothing to be worn in life and in death-it is not surprising that Mormons also identify their "Christ" with the plumed serpent deity Quetzalcoatl. The comments in the Masonic Entered Apprentice's Handbook concerning the serpent depicted on the Masonic apron provide further evidence of the occult roots and meaning behind the all-seeing eye, apron, beehive, square and compass, grips (special handshakes), moon, star, sun, and other secret signs and symbols pertaining to Mormonism's Aaronic and Melchizedek Priesthoods (all of which Joseph Smith borrowed from Masonry):

... The Serpent is regarded as "the Shining One"-the Holy Wisdom itself. Thus we see that the Serpent on our apron denotes that we are encircled by the Holy Wisdom....

The snake is peculiarly associated with [the Hindu god] Shiva, the Destroyer, whose close symbolic association with the third [Masonic] degree is obvious.... He is depicted making the... [sign] of a Master Mason.¹⁶

The Strange Paradox of Unworthy Saints

Prior to its dedication and sealing off to the "unworthy" in November 1980, the newly constructed Mormon Temple in Seattle was opened to visitors for guided tours of its 1 10,000-square-foot interior of opulent symbolism set on a beautiful 23.5-acre site. Thousands of Mormons and non-Mormons came from near and far to stand even in the rain in long, snail-paced lines for up to two hours to take the tour. Strangely enough, even for most of the Mormons this would probably be their only opportunity ever to enter one of the Temples built by their beloved Church—a Church that boasts of its perfection and the family togetherness and high morals of its members, yet excludes the vast majority of them from its most important functions on the ground that they are not worthy.

Almost 75 percent of Mormons have never even taken the steps required to become worthy enough to be initiated into Mormonism's inner secrets, so they don't know what takes place inside their own Temples. However, the very aura of mystery surrounding these forbidden-to-be-talked-about rituals gives the Temples a mystique that convinces the average Latter-day Saint that his Church must be the only true Church on earth. Having been told so often in such a tantalizing way about the "too-sacred-to-be-revealed" nature of Temple work, Mormons look forward to someday becoming worthy enough to enter these sacred sanctuaries and faithfully participate in the secret ceremonies—yet somehow most of them never make it.

President Joseph Fielding Smith declared: "... No person can receive an exaltation in the Celestial Kingdom without the ordinances of the Temple."¹⁷ Consequently, the small percentage (probably about ten percent) of Mormons regularly involved in Temple work is just one more of the many strange contradictions in Mormonism. It doesn't seem to occur to most Mormons that this represents a 90 percent failure rate for their Church, nor to question how they can be "Saints" and yet not be "worthy"; or to ask themselves what kind of Church would deny the vast majority of its "Saints" participation in the most important part of the religion it represents. Whether "worthy" or not, however, Mormons stand in awe of their Temples.

Three Confusing Gods of This World

During the Seattle Temple open house, Saints Alive had volunteers distributing about 50,000 informative booklets, and a camera crew filming interviews with "Saints" who were eagerly lined up to get their first (and probably last) glimpse inside a Mormon Temple. One of the standard questions the volunteers asked many of the Mormons was, "Do you consider Mormonism to be Christianity?"

"Yes, I do," was the typical confident Mormon response. "We believe in God the Eternal Father and in His Son, Jesus Christ, and in the Holy Ghost." Dr. Goodman had told us in England, "Anyone who believes in Jesus Christ is a Christian." The June 5, 1983, Salt Lake City Church News declared that the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints is Christian because Jesus Christ is in its name.

As recently as April 1997, the present Prophet of the Church, Gordon B. Hinckley, reiterated this inclusion of Christ's name as justification and evidence that Mormonism is truly Christian. When asked by Don Lattin, the reporter for the San Francisco Examiner and Chronicle, on April 13, 1997, about misconceptions regarding the Church, Hinckley laughed and said, "Well, the greatest misconception is that we are not Christians. That's the dominant misconception. And, of course, there isn't a bit of truth to it. If there's anybody who believes in Jesus Christ, we do. His name is a part of the name of the church."

In the January 1984 LDS Church magazine The Ensign (pages 17-19), Elder Robert E. Wells of the First Quorum of the Seventy wrote a 20-point article titled "We Are Christians Because..." and described the 20 key reasons Mormons consider themselves truly Christians. While he came close to the real reason most people are Christians in reason No. 12 (with the mention of Christ's Atonement), he negated the truth by adding that one must obey the law to receive the benefits of Calvary:

We are Christians because "we believe that through the atonement of Christ, all mankind may be saved, by obedience to the laws and ordinances of the Gospel" (Articles of Faith 1:3). There is no other way to salvation.

Like every other cult, Mormonism is a works religion which denies both the full payment of sin's penalty by Christ on the cross and that salvation must be received as a gift of God's grace (Ephesians 2:8- 10). The Mormon is saved only by total obedience to all those laws and ordinances of the Mormon gospel. Yet the Bible clearly tells us that Jesus Himself blotted out the writing of the ordinances that were against us, moving them out of our way by nailing them to His cross (Colossians 2: 14,15). The Mormon Church has brought the curse of the impossible law back upon the shoulders of its own people.

For 140 years Mormons tried to emphasize that as the "only true Church" they were different from Christians. That approach changed a few years ago, and now there is a big push by the Mormon hierarchy to become accepted as "Christians." This deceptive campaign has been very successful. Today the Church's television and radio ads talk about calling a toll-free number to get a free copy of the Holy Bible, and the response is greater than ever before.

However, the Mormon Jesus is not the Jesus of the Bible and of Christians, but the literal brother of Lucifer in the "pre-mortal existence," who was conceived in mortality not by "a virgin... with child of the Holy Ghost,"¹⁸ but through Elohim coming from Kolob to have sex with Mary (she is one of Elohim's many wives for eternity). The Mormon Jesus was not God who became a man, but he was a man who had to prove himself in a mortal body in order to become a "god." Mormons have a different heavenly Father, a different Jesus, and a different Holy Spirit from Christians.

Yet there seemed to be not the slightest suspicion by the average Mormon we interviewed in Seattle that his "man-become-God" the Father, his "spirit-brother-of-Lucifer" Jesus Christ, and his "couldn't-possibly-be-God" Holy Ghost were any different from the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit in the Bible, who are three Persons comprising one triune God. By Mormon theology, which ridicules the Trinity, their Father, Son, and Holy Ghost are declared to be "three separate Gods."¹⁹ Yet over and over, God in the Bible is declared to be unchangeable, God from all eternity to all eternity, the one and only God.²⁰

The Mormon Holy Ghost couldn't possibly be God, because he lacks both the physical body and eternal marriage that Mormonism claims are absolutely essential for godhood. To be bodiless and marriageless is the judgment meted out to the Devil, according to Mormonism.²¹ There is much confusion about the Mormon Holy Ghost, who, for unknown reasons, has never come to earth to get a physical body and "prove" himself in a mortal state, which is the only way to become a Mormon "god." Yet in apparent contradiction to Joseph Smith's "revelation," by the latest calculation the Holy Ghost is still recognized as a "god" in Mormonism. In "Lectures on Faith," which was part of Mormon scripture in the Doctrine and Covenants from its first edition in 1835 until suddenly being deleted without notice in 1921, the Holy Ghost was not even acknowledged to exist. The Godhead was described as consisting of the Father, "a personage of Spirit," and the Son. Joseph Smith originally taught that the Holy Ghost was the common mind possessed by Father and Son;²² Orson Pratt was not sure whether the Holy Ghost existed,²³ but if so, then "it" was probably "a living, all-pervading and most wonderful fluid."²⁴ President Joseph Fielding Smith wrote:

I have never troubled myself about the Holy Ghost whether he will sometime have a body or not....

In this dispensation, at least, nothing has been revealed as to his origin or destiny; expressions on these matters are both speculative and fruitless.²⁵

When asked, "Who is God to you?" those Mormons standing in that long line outside the Seattle Temple were quite confident in their response, which usually approximated: "He is like you and me and every other human being on the face of the earth."

"You mean that he's a man?" we asked.

"Yes, he is."

"How did he become God?"

This question was usually answered with less dogmatism and a good deal of uncertainty. The general idea proposed was that God had moved from manhood to "godhood" by somehow becoming perfect, and that Mormons could become "gods" in the same way, following the same path. This uncertainty only reflects the fact that no Mormon really knows how or when "godhood" can be reached for sure. All of the Mormons, however, seemed to have a vague idea that becoming a "god" very much involved and hinged upon certain secret ceremonies that take place in the Temple-and, of course, upon the Priesthood, which functions there and is of paramount importance in Mormonism.

A Tale of Two Priesthoods

In Masonry there are two priesthoods: the Aaronic and the Melchizedek. It is therefore not surprising that Mormonism has the same two priesthoods. Some Mormons would insist this is just one more in an astonishing number of "coincidences," as is the fact that in the LDS Temple ceremony Lucifer states that the markings on his apron (which are the same as those on the undergarment and the Veil) are the emblems of his power and priesthoods [plural].

The Melchizedek, or "High" Priesthood, derives its name from the most mysterious figure in the Bible, who appears suddenly and briefly in Abraham's day. With no information about his ancestors or descendants, birth or death, he is simply identified as "Melchizedek king of Salem... the priest of the most high God."²⁶ So intriguing has the Melchizedek Priesthood always been that numerous occult groups and secret societies, including modern UFO cults, have laid claim to it. During the ritual for the Masonic 19th degree of Grand Pontiff, the initiate swears oaths of secrecy and total obedience, and is anointed with oil. Then these words are spoken to him: "Be thou a Priest forever after the order of Melchizedek." Likewise, Mormon members of their "Melchizedek Priesthood" are anointed with oil in Mormon Temples, where they swear similar oaths of secrecy and unquestioning obedience. One of the foundational doctrines of the Mormon Church that is earnestly believed by millions of sincere Mormons is that-... no one may officiate in any ordinance of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints unless he has been ordained to the particular order or office of Priesthood by those possessing the requisite authority.

Thus no man receives the Priesthood except under the hands of one who holds that Priesthood himself; that one must have obtained it from others previously commissioned; and so every bearer of the priesthood today can trace his authority to the hands of Joseph Smith the Prophet, who received his ordination under the hands of the Apostles Peter, James and John; and they had been ordained by the Lord Jesus Christ.²⁷

Unfortunately, there is no historical evidence whatsoever that Joseph Smith was ever so ordained. In a letter dated September 26, 1960, Apostle LeGrand Richards admitted: "While we are a record-keeping people, as the Lord commanded, nevertheless our records are not complete.... We do not have the date that Peter, James and John conferred the Melchizedek Priesthood upon them [Joseph Smith and Oliver Cowdery]."²⁸ Mormon historian B.H.Roberts likewise admitted that "there is no definite account of the event [the conferring of the Melchizedek Priesthood] in the history of the prophet Joseph, or, for that matter, in any of our annals... "²⁹ That may come as a shock to most Mormons, but the convincing fact is that there were many journals kept and even histories published during the early years of the Church, but none of them contains so much as a passing mention of this most important event until many years after the alleged occurrence.

Beginning with its October 1834 issue, the official Church publication Messenger and Advocate carried a series of eight articles written by Oliver Cowdery with the close collaboration of Joseph Smith that should have mentioned this tremendously significant event, yet it was conspicuously absent. Entitled "Early Scenes and Incidents in the Church," the series was represented to be "founded upon facts... a full history of the rise of the church... [containing] the most interesting parts of its progress... a correct statement of events as they have transpired...." This history related that an angel appeared to Joseph and Oliver and declared, "Upon you my fellow servants, in the name of Messiah, I confer this priesthood and this authority...." There was only this one visit, by an unnamed angel, conferring one unspecified Priesthood. However, eight years later, when Times and Seasons published the serialized "History of Joseph Smith" in a number of installments in 1842, the story had changed remarkably: There were two visits, two Priesthoods, and four heavenly messengers. The Aaronic Priesthood had allegedly been conferred upon Joseph and Oliver by John the Baptist, followed some months later by Peter, James, and John conferring the Melchizedek Priesthood.

The facts are clear that: 1) there is absolutely no record in Mormon history of the alleged Melchizedek Priesthood ordination as an actual event; 2) Mormon authorities themselves admit that there is no evidence to substantiate this claim about the "restoration" of the Melchizedek Priesthood by Peter, James, and John, which forms the very foundation of Mormonism; and 3) there is much evidence that documents were later altered and scriptures falsified with the deliberate intent of making it appear that this ordination had occurred as claimed. We can only conclude that all of the evidence gives the ring of truth to David Whitmer's sad accusation:

You have changed the revelations from the way they were first given... to support the error of Brother Joseph in taking upon himself the office of Seer to the Church. You have changed the revelations to support the error of high [Melchizedek] priests....

The office of high priests was never spoken of and never thought of being established in the Church until Rigdon came in. Remember that we had been preaching from August, 1829 until June 1831 almost two years-and had baptized about 2,000 members into the Church of Christ, and had not one high priest.

During 1829 several times we were told by Brother Joseph that an elder was the highest office in the Church... ³⁰

A Cut-and-Paste History

To any unbiased investigator, all of the evidence points to the conclusion that the 1842 account was fabricated in order to enhance the image of the Mormon Church in the eyes of its critics and to shore up the "Prophet's" sagging authority in the face of mounting rebellion, much of it due to growing rumors concerning his adulterous affairs. How else can anyone explain rationally why the 1834 official "full history" of events that claimed to be "particular [and]... minute" failed to mention these most important events that represent the entire basis for the Priesthood power and authority that the Mormon Church boasts is its exclusive right and possession under the so-called "restoration"? How else can we account for the undeniable fact that journals, letters, diaries, and printed matter written during this crucial time in Mormon history, as LeGrand

Richards and B.H.Roberts admit, make absolutely no mention of these remarkable events that are so essential to the support of the entire structure of Mormonism? To explain this as an "oversight" by so many writers is simply not credible. Had these events actually occurred, they would undoubtedly have been among the first "proofs" mentioned to prospective converts then as now; and had they been known, it is unthinkable that they wouldn't have been mentioned by anyone. One can only conclude that these crucial events for the establishment of the Mormon Church did not in fact ever happen. This is further evidenced by what LaMar Petersen so clearly points out:

The important details that are missing from the "full history" of 1834 are likewise missing from the Book of Commandments* in 1833. The student would expect to find all the particulars of the Restoration in this first treasured set of 65 revelations, the dates of which encompassed the bestowals of the two Priesthoods, but they are conspicuously absent.

The only reference to an angelic visitation is in Chapter 24, paragraph 7: "But after truly repenting, God ministered unto him by an holy angel... that he should translate a book."

- Most of the original printing was destroyed by a mob and fire, and it was later republished and added to as Doctrine and Covenants.

The notable revelations on Priesthood in the Doctrine and Covenants... are missing, and Chapter 28 gives no hint of the Restoration which, if actual, had been known for four years.

More than four hundred words were added to this revelation of August 1829 in Section 27 of the Doctrine and Covenants, the additions made to include the names of heavenly visitors and two separate ordinations.

The Book of Commandments gives the duties of Elders, Priests, Teachers, and Deacons and refers to Joseph's apostolic calling, but there is no mention of Melchizedek Priesthood, High Priesthood, Seventies, High Priests, nor High Councilors. These words were later inserted into the revelation on Church organization and government of April 1830, making it appear that they were known at that date, but they do not appear in the original Chapter 24 of the Book of Commandments....

Similar interpolations were made in the revelations now known as Sections 42 and 68.³¹

That we are dealing with a cut-and-paste job is evidenced by the numerous contradictions that remain in the record, which it was impossible to eliminate after the fact. For example, we have Joseph Smith's own recorded statement that "the authority of the Melchizedek Priesthood was manifested and conferred for the first time upon several of the elders" at the fourth conference of the Church at Kirtland during June 3-6, 1831. This agrees with David Whitmer's statement that the Melchizedek Priesthood was first introduced in June 1831. No one remembered to rewrite this telltale statement when the later (and now official) claim was made that Peter, James, and John had already conferred this Priesthood two years earlier, in 1829. It is clear that, just as Whitmer charged, the "revelations" were changed. The cut-and-paste-job made it progressively more difficult to cover the fraud as the evolution of the "restored Priesthoods" continued to necessitate changes in prior "revelations" and "history."

In 1835, for example, Joseph Smith pronounced by "revelation" (now known as Doctrine and Covenants 107) that "the office of an elder comes under the priesthood of Melchizedek." Unfortunately, this "revelation" created further contradiction vis-a-vis Smith's earlier statement that elders had already existed prior to conferment of the Melchizedek Priesthood. We might generously put this down to a slip of the pen-except this would mean that William Smith made the same slip by coincidence when he reported that elders were instructed concerning "the priesthood of Melchizedek, to which they had not as yet been ordained."³² Furthermore, the 1835 "revelation" declared that "the second priesthood is called the Priesthood of Aaron.... It is called the lesser priesthood, because it is an appendage to the greater, or the Melchizedek Priesthood."³³ How the "appendage" could exist [by earlier ordination] independent of and prior to conferment of the Priesthood to which it is appended has never been explained.

The Baptism/ Ordination Charade

The strange manner in which, according to Joseph Smith's testimony, this "appendage" was "restored" raises further questions. In LDS doctrine, only a baptized person can baptize others, and only one who has the "Priesthood" can confer it. Because of the alleged total apostasy, the "authority" to baptize and ordain no longer existed on earth and had to be "restored" from heaven.* Yet under the alleged direction of an "angel" (who became John the Baptist years later), unbaptized Smith baptized Cowdery; then Cowdery, whose baptism was invalid, baptized Smith. Next, improperly baptized Smith conferred upon also improperly baptized Cowdery the Aaronic Priesthood, which Smith himself didn't have to confer; after this, improperly ordained Cowdery conferred upon Smith the Aaronic Priesthood by virtue of having supposedly received it from Smith, which clearly wasn't possible, since Smith hadn't yet received it, and never did.

The whole thing sounds like a farce, yet this is the foundation upon which the Mormon Church stands today. It would have been far more believable if John the Baptist, who certainly was competent, had simply baptized Smith and Cowdery. Why didn't he? No explanation is given. That question is answered by the evidence. By the time the angel had been turned into John the Baptist, it was too late to rewrite the entire story. So the absurdity of two unqualified men baptizing and ordaining each other, while John the Baptist watches, had to remain as the basis for Mormon Priesthood authority being "restored" from heaven after a total apostasy.

In 1839, after his excommunication for rightly accusing Joseph Smith of adultery with Fannie Alger, Oliver Cowdery had written in disillusionment that when the Church had first been organized, Joseph had been "First Elder, and I was called to be the Second Elder, and whatever he had of Priesthood (about which I am beginning to doubt) also had I."³⁴ No one could argue with that, for even by Joseph Smith's own testimony both had played at the charade together. Neither could claim to have received any more authority than the other, since they had mutually and equally conferred it upon themselves. After rejoining the Church in 1848, however, Cowdery declared: "I was also present when the higher or Melchizedek Priesthood (the second ordination) was conferred by the holy angel from on high."³⁵ It was a worthy attempt at getting back in good graces; however, someone had unfortunately failed to inform Cowdery that the "angel" had become "Peter, James, and John" during his absence from the Church. The mistake might have been worse, because some "angels" had even metamorphosed into God the Father and Jesus Christ while Cowdery had been in apostasy.

It must be shocking if not devastating to any Mormon today to realize that whatever Priesthood authority Joseph Smith ever had was received from Oliver Cowdery. It may be equally disconcerting to be reminded that, as the Deseret News Church Almanac faithfully makes unobtrusive notice of each year, it was those three "counterfeiters"-Cowdery, Whitmer, and Harris who ordained all of the first 12 Apostles of the Church. In a letter dated December 16, 1838, Joseph Smith called these Three Witnesses to the Book of Mormon "too mean to mention; and we had liked to have forgotten them."³⁶ Unfortunately, there is no way they can be forgotten, because of their crucial role in the foundation of Mormonism. So the Church plays a deceitful, hypocritical game. When it comes to their excommunication, they are called "liars, cheats and blacklegs."³⁷ As for their renunciation of Mormonism,³⁸ the Church distorts facts, suppresses documents, and rewrites history.

Yet when mentioned in connection with their alleged "witness" of the gold plates, these apostates are described as "competent men, of independent minds and spotless reputations... [and] unchallenged honesty... [who] remained true to their testimonies throughout their lives without deviation or variation."³⁹ The Church has even built a monument to its own astonishing hypocrisy in the form of the Martin Harris Memorial Amphitheater, located near Harris's grave in Clarkston, Utah. In this monument the Church honors a man whom its own scriptures describe as that "wicked man"⁴⁰ and whom the Millennial Star said was "partially deranged, [subject to] fits of monomania... filled with the rage and madness of a demon... [and] a lying, deceptive spirit from the beginning."⁴¹

Such were the founders of the Mormon Church. Nor will it help to argue that their subsequent apostasy doesn't affect their earlier ordination of the original 12 Apostles. The problem is worse than that. Joseph Smith himself claimed he "saw the 12 in the celestial Kingdom of God." In fact at least half of the original 12 Apostles were excommunicated; and two of them in particular, William E. McLellin (of whom the Prophet had a most marvelous but false vision of him performing miracles "in the South") and Joseph Smith's own brother, William Smith, did their best to expose the lies, frauds, and rewritten "revelations" of the Mormon Church.⁴²

If You're Going to Tell a Lie

Long before Hitler and Stalin used the technique so effectively, Joseph Smith had already learned by trial and error that if you tell a big enough lie often enough, many people will eventually believe it. Every Mormon Temple stands as an astonishing monument to a lie so huge and so bold that it becomes convincing. These Temples are supposed to be like the ones Enoch, Noah, and Abraham worshiped in, yet there were no such temples.

Only a "Prophet" who said the moon was inhabited and the Holy Ghost turned Gentile blood into Jewish blood could think up a lie so preposterous: Jewish-Gentile-Christian-Mormon Temples that prominently display the upside-down, five-pointed star (Goat of Mendes) that symbolizes Satan; blond, blue-eyed, pseudo-Aaronic Priests posing as both the true Israel and true Christians while performing secret pagan rituals and openly wearing a fig-leaf apron that symbolizes Lucifer's "power and priesthoods."

In the everlasting kingdom in the new universe after earth's final rebellion⁴³ at the end of the millennium, there will be no temple in the "new Jerusalem."⁴⁴ Nor is there so much as a hint in all the Bible that temples of any kind, except the one temple for Israel in Jerusalem, are or ever were authorized of God to be built anywhere or at any time. Yet the great dream of Mormons today and of the various "restoration" groups that have splintered off from the main Utah Church is to erect that fabled Temple that Joseph Smith prophesied would be located in his lifetime on the sacred site he designated in Independence, Missouri, "Zion." Though that prophecy, as so many of the others, proved false, nevertheless, it is still believed that this must occur to prepare the way for Christ to return with Joseph Smith to rule the world.

The Secret Ambition

It is only when we see Mormonism as a revolutionary secret society determined to take over the world that we begin to understand the real purpose behind its Priesthoods. Apostle Parley P. Pratt wrote: "This Priesthood... holds the keys of revelation of the oracles of God to man upon the earth; the power and right to give laws and commandments to individuals, churches, rulers, nations and the world; to appoint, ordain, and establish constitutions and kingdoms; to appoint kings, presidents, governors or judges..."⁴⁵ Just six weeks before his death, Joseph Smith boldly declared: "I intend to lay a foundation that will revolutionize the whole world."⁴⁶ Apostle Orson Hyde boasted: "What the world calls 'Mormonism' will rule every nation."⁴⁷ Third President of the Church, John Taylor, stated: "... That kingdom which the Lord has commenced to establish upon the earth... will not only govern all people in a religious capacity, but also in a political capacity."⁴⁸ That this determined goal was adopted early in Joseph Smith's career is evident from the following excerpt of an affidavit sworn to in 1838 by Thomas B. Marsh, disillusioned former President of the Council of the Twelve Apostles:

The plan of said Smith, the Prophet, is to take this State, and he professes to his people to intend taking the United States and ultimately the whole world.⁴⁹

The Temple ceremonies performed by the Mormon Priesthoods, as the considerable evidence indicates, have nothing to do with the grace of God or the sacrifice of Christ for our sins. They involve secret names, signs, symbols, handshakes, and formulas of classic occultism and ritual magic which the initiate must use to ascend the ladder of hierarchy and thereby gain access to the coveted powers of the "gods." This was Satan's promise and this was Joseph Smith's dream. Gaining this power is the aim of the Melchizedek Priesthood. To achieve it in the afterlife, one must first grasp all the power available in this world here and now. That was the secret kingdom over which Joseph Smith was crowned as king and which he expected to expand to control the entire world. That is still the secret ambition of the Mormon hierarchy, though the average Mormon may be ignorant of it. Brigham Young alluded to this when he explained the occult power and real purpose behind the Melchizedek Priesthood in an important talk delivered in the Bowery, Salt Lake City,

July 31, 1864:

Our religion is founded upon the Priesthood of the Son of God-it is incorporated within this Priesthood.

We frequently hear people inquire what the Priesthood is;
it is a pure and holy system of government.

It is the law that governs and controls all things, and will eventually govern and control the earth and the inhabitants that dwell upon it and all things pertaining to it.⁵⁰

A NON-PROPHET ORGANIZATION

If Mormonism is really what it claims to be, then the entire human race ought to submit to the authoritarian claims of The Brethren and thereby hasten the return of the Mormon "Messiah" and Joseph Smith to rule the world. It is one thing, however, to submit to the real Lord and Savior, Jesus Christ, when He returns from heaven to reign upon earth, and it is quite another to give unquestioning obedience to Mormon "Prophets," who claim to speak and act for their "Christ" who is the spirit-brother of Lucifer. The absolutely authoritarian position of the Mormon "Prophet, Seer and Revelator" who fronts for The Brethren is evident from Brigham Young's description of himself on more than one occasion as "dictator."¹ Today The Brethren still follow in the footsteps of their founding "Prophet," whom they honor and from whom they have received their authority. Indicating how absolute that authority is and how submissive and compliant all Mormons are required to be, Joseph Smith declared:

God... will make me to be god to you in His stead, and the Elders to be mouth to me; and if you don't like it, you must lump it!²

Before submitting to such totalitarianism, it is only prudent to ask what it is based upon. Mormon doctrine claims that the true Church cannot exist without a "living Prophet" to head it, that there is only one true Prophet on earth at a time, and that the head of the Mormon Church is that one and only "living Prophet." How is this justified? Strangely enough, this belief has nothing to do with the actual performance of any Mormon "Prophet," past or present, none of whom has a record of prophecies that would inspire any confidence in anyone. In fact, the list of proven false prophecies beginning with Joseph Smith on down is so staggering that it ought to frighten away any prospective convert who takes the time to investigate.³

If the Mormon Church were truly led by actual prophets, one would think the missionaries would be actively handing out authorized books of those prophecies. But the reality is that there are none, because there are no prophecies beyond those uttered in futility by Joseph Smith.

Prophets Who Don't Prophecy

Joseph Smith used his "seer stone" to prophecy, but it has never been used by any Mormon "Prophet" since then, and is in fact locked away in the vault of the First Presidency. How then do Mormon "Prophets" prophecy? The astonishing answer to that question is that they don't! This is all the more startling because Mormons boast that they alone have a "living Prophet," and assert that Catholics (and Protestants by implication) are proven to be in apostasy because they have not added one single book to their canon since they first formed it.⁴ They triumphantly declare: "The presence of revelation in the [Mormon] Church is positive proof that it is the kingdom of God on earth."⁵ This is the blindest hypocrisy. As the Tanners point out:

Excluding the Manifesto and the statement (not a revelation) on blacks, only three [Mormon] Presidents received revelations which were added to the "standard works."

None of the [other] presidents has given revelations that have been canonized.⁶

Ask any Mormon to name the three most important prophecies uttered by the current "Prophet, Seer and Revelator," Gordon B.Hinckley, and he won't be able to mention one, because there have been none. Even the great Mormon "Prophet" Brigham Young admitted: "I am not a visionary man, neither am I given to prophesying. When I want any of that done I call on brother Heber [C.Kimball] - he is my prophet...." Yet there is no evidence that Heber C.Kimball or any other Mormon leader made any prophecies that came true.

Yes, the Mormon Church does claim that it is daily receiving heavenly guidance through its "living Prophet." However, its criticism against Catholics and Protestants for not adding to the canon of Scripture applies equally to itself, and by its own doctrines condemns it as apostate. The following excerpt of testimony given by Joseph F.Smith (sixth President of the Mormon Church) before a U.S.Senate hearing is significant:

SENATOR DUBOIS - Have you received any revelations from God, which have been submitted by you and the apostles to the body of the church in their semi-annual conference... [and] sustained by that conference, through the upholding of their hands?

MR. SMITH-Since when?

SENATOR DUBOIS - Since you became President of the Church?

MR. SMITH-No, sir, none whatever.... I have never pretended to nor do I profess to have received revelations.⁷

All of the evidence indicates that in spite of its proud boast that it is led by a "living Prophet" and on this basis is proven to be the only "true Church" on earth, in actual fact the Mormon Church is a non-prophet organization. Its "Prophets"-at least those in the past 100 years-don't prophesy. And, as we have shown, its earlier "Prophets" were dismal failures when they attempted to do this, for their "prophecies" were mostly wrong. Therefore, any justification for accepting the Mormon "Prophet" as king or dictator and giving him unquestioning obedience does not rest upon qualifications as a genuine "Prophet" that he himself has demonstrated. The fact is that all subsequent Mormon "Prophets" have relied upon the credentials of Joseph Smith, from whom they received their "authority."

If Joseph Smith were a true Prophet, it would be expected that the Mormon Church would have widely published his prophecies and gained many converts thereby. Yet even the most ardent student must labor endlessly to search out the many prophecies of the founding Mormon "Prophet." Why this strange paradox? Simply because his prophecies, with rare exceptions, were false and often ludicrous.

We have already seen that "Prophet" Smith's claim that he was ordained by John the Baptist and Peter, James, and John cannot be substantiated historically as an actual event, but that the evidence all supports the conclusion that this claim was pure fabrication. There is, however, one alleged justification for this claimed "authority" that we haven't yet examined. It is called the "First Vision," and is in fact the real foundation of every Mormon pretense to authority and "restoration."

The First Vision

Any sincere attempt to get at the true facts and form a rational understanding of the actual history of Mormonism eventually involves the dizzying unraveling of contradictory accounts of fantastic events in a mind-numbing, frustrating journey through what Walter Martin has called The Maze of Mormonism.⁸ This effort to sift fact from fancy is made all the more difficult, as we have already seen, by the countless changes in "revelations" and personal accounts, effected by the Mormon hierarchy without notice. The saga of the "First Vision" is a prime example.

The official account now published by the Church alleges that in 1820, when he was 14 years old, Joseph Smith "saw two Personages whose brightness and glory defy all description, standing above me in the air. One of them spake unto me, calling me by name, and said-pointing to the other-This is My beloved Son. Hear Him!"⁹ Seizing this unusual opportunity to ask which church he should join, young Joseph was told that he "must join none of them for they were all wrong, and... all their creeds were an abomination in His sight..."¹⁰ This "vision" is crucial to all of Mormonism's claims. It is in the first lesson the Mormon missionaries teach to prospective converts, and a "testimony" of its authenticity is a prerequisite for baptism. The following foundational Mormon doctrines are implicit in this vision: 1) that God is a man with a physical body; 2) that the Father and Son are two separate Gods each with His own body; 3) that there had been a total apostasy, leaving all churches in hopeless heresy; and 4) that Father and Son had put in their first and only appearance on earth together in the history of mankind for the specific purpose of calling this young boy to "restore" the truth by founding the true Church.

There are a number of glaring contradictions in this story. The official account that the Church relies upon today was not published until 1842, some 22 years after it was alleged to have occurred. It is difficult to believe that the most important event in thousands of years-and in fact in all of human history-would have been kept secret for so long. Great importance is put upon this momentous happening by Mormons today; all the missionaries point to it as evidence that theirs is the only true Church-and yet the First Vision was unknown during those early years when the Church was struggling for recognition and needed something like this story to help give it credibility. Surely no Mormons should complain if this fact causes a great deal of skepticism. Assistant Mormon Church Historian James B. Allen admits that during the 1830s "the general membership of the Church knew little, if anything, about it [the First Vision]." ¹¹ Dr. Allen states that:

... None of the available contemporary writings about Joseph Smith in the 1830s, none of the publications of the Church in that decade, and no contemporary journal or correspondence yet discovered mentions the story of the first vision... ¹² as spurious, or at least have commented upon how his case was an exception? Moreover, if he had seen God the Father in a physical body as a glorified man in 1820, why would Joseph Smith have approved the "Lectures on Faith" that declared the Father to be "a personage of Spirit"?¹⁴ The "Lectures" were incorporated into Mormon scripture in 1835 and remained there until 1921, when they were quietly removed without explanation. And if Smith had seen Father and Son in two separate bodies in 1820, why would the "Prophet" in the mid-1830s (in the course of rewriting the entire Bible to correct alleged errors in translation) change Luke 10:22 to read (as it still does in the Mormon "inspired version"), "that the Son is the Father, and the Father is the Son"?

The statement by the "Personages" in this vision that all of the Christian creeds on earth "were an abomination" also doesn't ring true. The Apostles' and Nicene Creeds that were accepted by most Christian churches in 1820 simply state such basics as belief "in God the Father Almighty, Maker of Heaven and earth... in Jesus Christ, His only Son, our Lord, who was conceived by the Holy Ghost, born of the Virgin Mary, suffered under Pontius Pilate, was crucified, dead, and buried, and resurrected," etc. One wonders what could be an "abomination" in creeds that are so biblical and even in agreement with what Joseph Smith himself believed for at least another ten years after this alleged vision. Stranger still is the fact that Joseph Smith and his family at that time were heavily involved in necromancy and divination, communicating with spirits of the dead and divining the location of buried treasure, which the Bible declares to be an abomination to God in no uncertain terms. What "God" could this be who has no word of reproof for Joseph's necromancy and divination, yet abominates all biblical creeds? Could that be why the "truth" that he calls Joseph Smith to "restore" turns out to be identical to the lie that Satan used to deceive Eve?

Joseph the Methodist

One of the strangest contradictions in the entire episode of the alleged First Vision is the fact that, having been twice forbidden in this same vision by the Father to join a church, the young "Prophet," who by this time has had many angelic visits, has been led to the gold plates and is translating the Book of Mormon, proceeds in 1828 to join the Methodist Church in Harmony, Pennsylvania. There is more than enough evidence to establish this as historical fact, and it is admitted even by Mormon writers.¹⁵ Joseph's wife, Emma, had been a Methodist since the age of seven, so Joseph may have joined the Methodists to please her-but join he did. There are only two possibilities: 1) Joseph Smith was an incredibly disobedient and irresponsible "Prophet" and his "God" extremely forgetful in not reproving him for joining the Methodist "abomination," or 2) the First Vision didn't really happen, but was invented later. If Joseph Smith's "God" thought all Christians were an abomination, the Methodists had the same opinion about His "Prophet." The account given by two of Emma's cousins, Joseph and Hiel Lewis, of this incident in their local newspaper when questioned about it later is most interesting:

I, with Joshua McKune, a local preacher at the time, I think in June, 1828, heard on Saturday that Joe Smith had joined the church on Wednesday afternoon....

We thought it was a disgrace to the church to have a practicing necromancer, a dealer in enchantments and bleeding ghosts in it. So on Sunday we went to father's, the place of meeting that day, and got there in season to see Smith and talked to him some time in father's shop before the meeting.

Told him that his occupation, habits and moral character were at variance with the discipline, that his name would be a disgrace to the church, that there should have been recantation, confession and at least promised reformation—that he could that day publicly ask that his name be stricken from the class book, or stand investigation.

He chose the former, and did that very day make request that his name be taken off the class book.¹⁶

The mention above of "bleeding ghosts" refers to the manner in which Joseph claimed he had found the gold plates. The Lewis brothers recalled hearing Joseph tell that he had learned "by a dream" the location of the buried gold plates, and having gone to dig them up had been confronted by a ghost that looked "like a Spaniard having a long beard... with his throat cut from ear to ear, and the blood streaming down," who told him how to obtain the release of the plates from the enchantment that held them.¹⁷ This is most interesting in view of an authenticated letter in the handwriting of Joseph's mother, Lucy Mack Smith, dated January 23, 1829, and written to her sister-in-law, Mary Pierce, of Royalton, Vermont. The letter was purchased in July, 1982, by Provo, Utah, lawyer Brent F. Ashworth and is an enthusiastic account by Mrs. Smith of the finding and translating (and contents in summary) of the marvelous gold plates. There is not a word of heavenly visitors, whether angels or "Gods," but Mrs. Smith relates to her sister-in-law that the Lord "has made his paths known to Joseph in dreams... and he is able to translate [the gold plates] and he is able to recover these things also in dreams therefore beware that you do not mock."¹⁸

Dreams and Angels

The mention of a dream is the way that the story of finding the gold plates was at first told. From its absence for 20 years from diaries, letters, and Church publications, it is also quite clear that the "First Vision" was a later concoction. Interestingly enough, Lucy Smith ends the letter with "adieu" just before signing her name. This probably explains the origin of this French word for "goodbye" that appears in the Book of Mormon, supposedly from the lips of Jewish Indians living in America who allegedly communicate in "reformed Egyptian." In the confused and contradictory roots of Mormonism, the brazenness of the "First Vision" concoction is hard to top. There are nine different accounts, each of which contradicts the others on major points. As Sandra Tanner remarked when we interviewed her for the film:

He changes the date, he changes how old he is, he changes the motivation, why he went into the woods to pray. He changes who was there and he changes what the message was that they gave him.

If he were giving us an actual account of a real experience, we would assume he would have known the first time around whether it was God or Jesus, if it was both of them, what their message was, and when it happened.

Yet we find him re-drafting this story. Well, if you were a witness of an accident and someone asked you to tell about it and you gave accounts as divergent as those, people would say you couldn't have witnessed the event.

The one thing that all the nine accounts (except the revised 1842 version) agree upon is that Joseph Smith in none of them claims to have seen God the Father, much less in a physical body. Yet this is the major point now made by the Mormon Church in what has to be a classic case of deception. For 130 years they kept hidden the one and only account written in Joseph Smith's own hand. Copies finally leaked out, and it proves the blatant and deliberate deceit behind this whole scam. Apparently written about 1833, in this account Joseph tells of a heavenly vision of the Lord (Jesus), not an earthly visit of Father and Son; and it is the Lord in heaven who says, "Joseph my son, thy sins are forgiven thee," not the Father who says, pointing to Jesus, "This is my Beloved Son."

Until the days of Joseph Fielding Smith, Mormon "Prophets" and "Apostles" testified that the "Personages" that Joseph saw in his "First Vision" were not the Father and Jesus, but one or more angels. Orson Pratt said that "God sent his angel to the 14-year-old Joseph."¹⁹ Orson Hyde made it even clearer: "Why did not the Savior come himself... because to the angels was committed the power of reaping the earth..."²⁰ From 1851 to August 1877, Brigham Young delivered 363 sermons, but in none of them does he assert that the Father and Jesus appeared to Joseph. He does say, however, that "the Lord sent his messengers to Joseph."²¹ President Wilford Woodruff said "an angel."²² John Taylor said, "The Prophet Joseph asked the angel which of the sects was right."²³ Heber C. Kimball said "an holy angel," and George A. Smith spoke of "the ministration of angels."²⁴ A hymn that Joseph Smith approved, loved, and sang-"An angel from on high the Long, Long Silence broke"-refers to the "First Vision." Still sung today, its very presence in the Mormon hymnal is an indictment of the blatant dishonesty of a Church that builds its claim to world domination on a lie so gross that the contradictions are still there to haunt believers after decades of suppression, revision, and deception.²⁵

The Prophet with the World's Greatest Ego

Next to polygamy, there were two subjects that obsessed the founding "Prophet" of the Mormon Church more than any other. One was the destruction of the United States for failing to embrace Mormonism's "restored gospel," and the other was the establishment of "Zion" in Independence, Missouri. In the course of prophesying the destruction of his enemies, Joseph Smith pronounced his own greatness and triumph with such bursts of blind pride that the language is embarrassing to read even today. He continued these pronouncements right up to the time of his assassination, which dramatically proved all such prophecies false. Typical was the defiantly egotistical boast in the form of a "prophecy" at the semiannual General Conference a few months before his death, to the effect:

... that he could not be killed within five years from that time; that they could not kill him till the Temple [in "Zion"] would be completed, for that he had received an unconditional promise from the Almighty concerning his days, and he set Earth and Hell at defiance....²⁶

Considering himself to be greater than any person who ever lived, including Jesus Christ ("I have more to boast of than ever any man had"²⁷), Joseph Smith was dominated by a giant ego that was inflated to the point of mania. Although he hadn't even finished elementary school, much less law school, the "Prophet" declared: "I am a lawyer; I am a big lawyer and comprehend heaven, earth and hell, to bring forth knowledge that shall cover up all lawyers, doctors and other big bodies."²⁸ "... I know more than they all."²⁹ In one of the most astonishing flights of braggadocio in recorded history, the "Prophet" was so carried away with presenting his own importance that his "God" came off as little more than a junior partner or assistant to Joseph Smith in his mythical heroic accomplishments:

The whole earth shall bear me witness that I, like the towering rock in the midst of the ocean, which has withstood the mighty surges of the warring waves for centuries, am impregnable....

I combat the errors of ages; I meet the violence of mobs; I cope with illegal proceedings from executive authority: I cut the gordian knot of powers, and I solve mathematical problems of universities, with truth-diamond truth; and God is my "right hand man."³⁰

Spoiler of the Gentiles

The obsession with his own greatness was closely intertwined with the twin obsessions of the destruction of the United States and the establishment of "Zion." No egomaniac can endure rejection. It was an unbearable affront not only to his "God" but also to Joseph Smith that the "Gentiles" had not admitted that he was wiser than Solomon and submitted to his benevolent kingship. Mormon writer Hyrum L. Andrus explains that the "Gentiles" apparently understood well enough that the Mormon "Kingdom of God" would "require a major concession on the part of non-Latter-day-Saints: that of granting the appropriate Priesthood Councils in Zion the power to name men to governmental office...."³¹ Quite naturally the "Gentiles" were not enthusiastic in leaping at the opportunity to surrender themselves to The Brethren. This unwillingness to join the "restoration" movement was taken by Joseph Smith and the Mormon Apostles to be an unreasonable and blasphemous rejection of the "restored" gospel, and it required sterner methods of persuasion. The St. Clair Banner of September 17, 1844, carried this sworn testimony of G.T.M. Davis:

The great aim of Joseph Smith was evidently to clothe himself with the most unlimited power; civil, military and ecclesiastical, over all who became members of his society...

... [and] to satisfy his people... that the authority with which God had clothed him... extended over all mankind... [and that] the Latter-day Saints, under Joe as their King and Ruler, were to conquer the Gentiles, and that their subjection to this authority was to be obtained by the sword.³²

Although Mormon apologists have tried to deny the facts, the evidence now seems overwhelming that Joseph Smith taught, organized, and encouraged his followers to rob, murder, and plunder those who opposed them. This was called "spoiling the Gentiles," and the plunder was "consecrated" to the "treasury" to be communistically shared among the poor "Saints" under the direction of a Bishop.³³ Several Mormon writers, such as Leland Gentry, have been honest enough to admit the truth, or at least part of it. Gentry says, "It was frequently observed among the [Mormon] troops... that the time had come when the riches of the Gentiles should be consecrated to the Saints."³⁴ Of course the "Gentiles" fought back, and the isolated skirmishes grew into what became known as the "Mormon War" in 1838. Mormon George M. Hinkle later testified in a Senate hearing:

I spoke to Mr. Smith, Jr., in the house, and told him that this course of burning houses and plundering, by the Mormon troops, would ruin us; that it could not be kept hid, and would bring the force of the State upon us; that houses would be searched and the stolen property found.

Smith replied to me, in a pretty rough manner, to keep still... that it would discourage the men; and he would not suffer me to say anything about it...

I saw a great deal of plunder... brought into camp; and... I understood this property and plunder were placed into the hands of the bishop at Diahmon....

Until lately, the teachings of the church appeared to be peaceable... but lately a different idea has been advanced—that the time had come when this kingdom was to be set up by forcible means, if necessary. It was taught that the time had come when the riches of the Gentiles were to be consecrated to the true Israel....

While the last expedition was in progress... Rigdon held in his hand a letter from Joseph Smith... in which, he said, there was a profound secret.... The letter as near as I recollect it, was as follows:

That our enemies were now delivered into our hands, and that we should have victory over them in every instance.

The letter stated that, in the name of Jesus Christ, he knew this by the spirit of prophecy...³⁵

Like almost every other "prophecy" that Joseph Smith uttered, this one also turned out to be false, in spite of the bluster and determination of the false "Prophet" and his army. Determined to fight to the bitter end, the Mormons called it a "war of extermination." In one famous sermon to the Church, President Sidney Rigdon said, "... It shall be between us and them a war of extermination; for we will follow them until the last drop of their blood is spilled; or else they will have to exterminate us."³⁶

Proving again the falseness of Mormon "prophecies," the "Mormon War" ended with the ignominious surrender of the warring "Prophet" and his rebels to the Missouri state militia at the end of October 1838. John Corrill related that, when the showdown came, "Smith appeared to be much alarmed, and told me to beg like a dog for peace.... [He] had rather die himself than have the people exterminated."³⁷ Indeed, the militia almost shot the "Prophet" on the spot. Imprisoned in Liberty Jail, Smith and his men were charged with "treason, murder, arson, burglary, robbery, larceny and perjury."³⁸ Sampson Avard, leader of the secret Mormon extermination squad called the Danites, testified in the trial that:

I consider Joseph Smith, Jr., as the prime mover and organizer of this Danite Band. The officers of the band, according to their grades, were brought before him, at a schoolhouse, together with Hiram Smith and Sidney Rigdon: the three composing the First Presidency of the whole Church.

Joseph Smith, Jr., blessed them, and prophesied over them: declaring that they should be the means in the hands of God of bringing forth the Millennial Kingdom. It was stated by Joseph Smith, Jr., that it was necessary this band be bound together by a covenant, that those who revealed the secrets of the society should be put to death.

The covenant taken by all the Danite band was as follows, to wit: They declared, holding up their right hands, "In the name of Jesus Christ, the Son of God, I do solemnly obligate myself ever to conceal, and never to reveal, the secret purposes of this society... [or] I hold my life as the forfeiture."

Lyman Wight observed that before the winter was over he [Joseph Smith] thought we would be in St. Louis and take it.... Smith said... that one should chase a thousand, and two put ten thousand to flight; that he considered the United States rotten.

He compared the Mormon Church to the little stone spoken of by the Prophet Daniel; and the dissenters first, and the State next, was part of the image that should be destroyed by this little stone....

Smith, after erecting his bulwarks [the night after General Lucas with his militia arrived], asked me if I did not think him [Smith] pretty much of a general; and I answered in the affirmative.

We were advised, all the time, to fight valiantly, and that the angels of the Lord would appear in our defense and fight our battles.³⁹

Destruction of the U.S.A.

In spite of the fact that every time he opened his mouth to "prophecy" he only further confirmed that he was a false "Prophet," Joseph Smith's giant ego wouldn't allow him to quit. Revenge upon the "Gentiles" became his obsessive madness. That revenge was to work itself out in two ways: the destruction of all of his enemies throughout the entire United States, and the establishment of his Independence, Missouri, "Zion," which was the key to reigning over the entire world. Mormons sometimes refer to Joseph Smith's so-called "Civil War Prophecy" as proof that he did indeed foretell the future. Of course, they cover up the fact that the "prophecy" was made in the midst of an earlier rebellion in December 1832. That rebellion ended quietly a few months later. It was years later, after Joseph Smith's death, that the Civil War (which had been generally considered inevitable) did break out and the earlier prophecy published. Even beyond its obvious reference to the earlier rebellion that never materialized, the "prophecy" was clearly false, for it never developed the international proportions he predicted:

Verily, thus saith the Lord... behold, the Southern States shall be divided against the Northern States... and the war shall be poured out upon all nations.⁴⁰

Mormon writer William E. Berrett admits that a secret society called "the Danites," "as historians agree," was organized within the Mormon Church "for the purpose of plundering and murdering the enemies of the Saints."⁴¹ Leland Gentry, also a Mormon, adds that the "Danites were apparently taught to obey the commands of their superiors without question or hesitation."⁴² Joseph Smith, however, was above the law and would admit to having done no wrong. The "Gentiles" had rejected the "restored" gospel given to him by extraterrestrials from Kolob, so they had to be destroyed as apostates. What Mormons had failed to do by force of arms and subterfuge they called upon their "God" to do. "Revelations" that confirmed their desires began to come through the "Prophet." Illinois Governor Thomas Ford, who later had Joseph and Hyrum jailed in Carthage for inciting to riot and treason, thereafter reported:

The Mormons openly denounced the government of the United States as utterly corrupt, and as being about to pass away, and to be replaced by the government of God, to be administered by his servant Joseph."⁴³

After the "Prophet's" death, the obsessive desire to see the destruction of the United States took on the added dimension of a means to avenge Smith's death. As Brigham Young later declared:

God Almighty will give the United States a pill that will put them to death, and that is worse than lobelia.

I am prophet enough to prophesy the downfall of the government that has driven us out.... Wo [sic] to the United States: I see them going to Death and destruction.⁴⁴

It was Joseph Smith who began this series of false "prophecies." In May 1843 he said:

... And I prophesy in the name of the Lord God of Israel, unless the United States redress the wrongs committed upon the Saints in the state of Missouri and punish the crimes committed by her officers that in a few years the government will be utterly overthrown and wasted, and there will not be so much as a potsherd left.⁴⁵

This is an obviously false prophecy again, identifying Joseph Smith as one of the false prophets that the Bible warns about. In 1833 Joseph Smith declared:

And now I am prepared to say by the authority of Jesus Christ, that not many years shall pass away before the United States shall present such a scene of bloodshed as has not a parallel in the history of our nation; pestilence, hail, famine, and earthquake will sweep the wicked of this generation from off the face of the land, to open and prepare the way for the return of the [ten] lost tribes of Israel from the north country.

The people of the Lord... have already commenced gathering together to Zion, which is in the state of Missouri....

... Flee to Zion, before the overflowing scourge overtake you, for there are those now living upon the earth whose eyes shall not be closed in death until they see all these things, which I have spoken, fulfilled.⁴⁶

Instead of the wicked of that generation being swept off the land and the Mormons finding refuge in "Zion," it was the "Saints" who were swept off the land, while the "wicked" remained. Driven from Missouri, they established themselves in Illinois, until they had to flee for Utah. The dream of Zion never left them, however, and down through the years the hope inspired by the many "prophecies" concerning the return of the "Saints" to "Zion" has never died. This is the heart of "restoration" groups today.

The Restoration of Zion

False prophecies, broken promises, lies, deception, egomania, and an incurable lust for power and sex were not enough to make the early "Saints" admit the awful truth about their "Prophet" and his Mormon religion. He had told them something that they desperately wanted to believe: that they were somebodies, the best people on earth, the real Israel, the only true Church, potential "gods"; that the "keys" to the promised "exaltation" were secret grips, names, signs, and occult incantations that could only be learned and practiced in the Temple. Nothing was going to shake the early "Saints" loose from that fantastic hope. At the heart of this delusion was the belief that the ultimate Temple must yet be built in "Zion" on the very "Temple lot" in Independence, Missouri, that the "Prophet" had pointed out. Of course, he had prophesied that he would live to see it built; and even after that was proven false, they still believed.

There was even a definite time limit set by Joseph Smith that held out a false hope for sincere but deceived Mormons for decades; and in spite of the overwhelming evidence that he was a false prophet, millions of Mormons today still base their hope for eternity upon the alleged "revelations" of Joseph Smith. On February 14, 1835, Oliver B. Huntington recorded in his diary that Joseph Smith had said that "God had revealed to him that the coming of Christ would be within 56 years."⁴⁷ The official History of the Church records the same false prophecy.⁴⁸ From that point on, the "Saints" fell back upon the vain hope that if not before then, at least no later than February 14, 1891, all would be well in "Zion." In 1886, the Millennial Star quoted Apostle Moses Thatcher's statement: "The time of our deliverance will be within five years; the time indicated [by Joseph Smith's "prophecy"] will be February 14, 1891."⁴⁹ Mormon writer Klaus J. Hansen makes this staggering admission:

... In 1890 there was a widespread belief among Church members that Joseph Smith's prediction of 1835, that fifty-six years would "wind up the scene," would be fulfilled.

But such enthusiasm was short-lived. In 1903, Patriarch Benjamin F. Johnson... could not conceal his disappointment when he remarked that "we were over seventy years ago taught by our leaders to believe that the coming of Christ and the millennial reign was much nearer than we believe it to be now."⁵⁰

It is heart-wrenching to read the continual and blustering assurances that "Zion" would be built "in this generation" which were repeatedly trotted out and paraded before the Church long after the hopelessness should have been obvious to everyone. The "Apostles" and "Prophets" who followed Joseph Smith had to close their eyes to facts and common sense and uphold him as a "Prophet" of God or else renounce their own claims to the authority they had inherited from him. The price was too high then, as it is now. So they continued to insist that what was and is so obviously false was really true. In a sermon in 1845, Brigham Young bravely declared, to the accompaniment of loud "Amens," that `... as the Lord lives we will build up Jackson county in this generation."⁵¹

Apostle Heber C. Kimball stoutly affirmed:

... We are as sure to go back there as we exist.... Joseph the Prophet dedicated that land.... I shall yet see the day that I will go back there with brother Brigham and with thousands and millions of others, and we will go precisely according to the dedication of the Prophet of the living God."⁵²

They believed it would happen because they believed Joseph Smith was "the Prophet of the living God." It was a false prophecy, proving that he was a false prophet-yet millions of Mormons today still believe him. Apostle George A. Smith exhorted the faithful, "Let me remind you that it is predicted that this generation shall not pass away till the temple shall be built...." ⁵³ It is astonishing that as late as 1900, nine years after the time limit Joseph Smith had set, President Lorenzo Snow "affirmed at a special priesthood meeting in the Salt Lake Temple that `there are many here now under the sound of my voice, probably a majority, who will live to go back to Jackson County and assist in building that temple.' "⁵⁴ In spite of their "testimony" that Joseph Smith was a true Prophet, and the repeated affirmation that they believed the "promise of God" given through him, it never happened.

Millions of Mormons bear their "testimony" today in spite of the evidence to the contrary; but their repeated affirmations that Mormonism is true won't make it so. No one could have a stronger or more completely misplaced faith than that expressed by Apostle Orson Pratt:

We believe in these promises as much as we believe in any promise ever uttered by the mouth of Jehovah.

The Latter-day Saints just as much expect to receive a fulfillment of that promise during the generation that was in existence in 1832 as they expect the sun will rise and set tomorrow.

Why? Because God cannot lie. He will fulfill all His promises. He has spoken. It must come to pass. This is our faith.⁵⁵

Yet it didn't come to pass. Therefore, by the criterion established by God Himself, the Lord had not spoken through Joseph Smith. Speaking through the great prophet Moses, God warned of false prophets with these words:

When a prophet speaketh in the name of the Lord, if the thing follow not, nor come to pass, that is the thing which the Lord hath not spoken, but the prophet hath spoken it presumptuously; thou shalt not be afraid of him."⁵⁶

It would take an entire book to deal adequately with all that Joseph Smith solemnly prophesied in the name of his "God" from Kolob that never came to pass, and thus proved him again and again to be a false prophet.

The Coming Kingdom

After being put out of his own house, and heartbroken by words from Mormon family members saying that they wanted nothing further to do with him, Dick Baer wrote a letter begging his family to face the facts for their own sakes. In that letter Dick spelled out in detail dozens of inescapably false prophecies by Joseph Smiths.⁵⁷ To his disappointment, he has found few Mormons inside or outside his family who are willing even to consider the evidence. Such is the astonishing power that Joseph Smith still wields through appealing lies which millions wish to believe.

Ed Decker and Bill Schnoebelen did a further study and came up with even more documented and absolutely false prophecies. To be fair, they also found five true ones, none of which had dealt with a single "kingdom" issue.⁵⁸

It is tragic that so many Mormons are still clinging to the impossible dream of "exaltation" to a mythical "godhood" based upon their misplaced confidence in "prophecies" so fraudulent that it would seem impossible for anyone who openly and honestly examined the facts to continue to be deceived by Joseph Smith's false claims. The "prophecies" concerning "Zion" have obviously all failed.

Yet 10 million Mormons today, many of them sincerely deceived, are still entranced by the "restoration-of-Zion" theory. The rest of the package, which must be accepted in toto, includes the belief that The Brethren, by virtue of authority inherited from Joseph Smith, must be blindly obeyed because they hold the keys to exaltation and godhood.

The Mormon "Zion" fits into an emerging pattern of increasing occult activity leading to a one-world government that could well prepare for the fulfillment of biblical prophecies concerning Antichrist. To understand it properly, the "Zion" kingdom must be viewed in the broader context of the planned Mormon takeover of the world. This is the real "key," the secret hope Mormons cling to, and the basis for storing one year's supply of food, guns, and ammunition.

If you were to go through the avalanche of correspondence we have gathered over the years, you would see that while the individual stories are vastly divergent, one central question leaps from the pages: "How could anyone in his right mind believe such teachings?"

This is not meant to be some railing complaint against the mind-set of the Mormon people. Whenever Dave or Ed ask this kind of question, we are severely chastised for being unkind to the very people to whom we claim a ministry calling. But this kind of response has held back serious analysis of the problems and absurdities of the LDS gospel. How in fact do intelligent, well-educated, normal people end up with a complicated belief system that is more in line with Star Wars than with biblical and historical evidences of faith?

Simply, it comes down to the unshakable Mormon testimony: Everything The Brethren utter is God-breathed, and anything said otherwise is a lie. There is no moving off this line drawn in the sand of the Mormons' minds, because without this subjective testimony, based on feelings instead of facts, there would be no Mormonism at all.

Several years ago, Ed slipped quietly into an LDS Fast and Testimony Meeting. He went to just sit and listen. "I was transfixed by the testimonies I heard there. They were the exact wording of so many of those I had heard and shared myself while an active Mormon years before."

I bear you my testimony that I know the Book of Mormon is true (or the Word of God), I know that Joseph Smith is a true Prophet of God (and that Gordon B. Hinckley is the true Prophet of God today), and I know that the Church is the only true church on the face of the earth today, and I know that Heavenly Father's Priesthood is on the earth today and I thank my Heavenly Father that I am a member of this Church (and/or Priesthood) and for the Bishop and for family home evening (or the Temple, Relief Society, genealogy), and I am so grateful for my home teachers (or visiting teachers, Priesthood leaders, the Stake Presidency) because [short faith-promoting story], and I say these things in the name of Thy Son, Jesus Christ, Amen.

While Ed sat and listened, he realized that there was a subtle mind-warp taking place in that meeting. Only two testimonies contained more than a few words out of sync. One lady who was obviously not a member of the fully approved group apologized in tears for not being worthy enough as the rest of the Ward sat nodding their heads in agreement. A little girl stood on the pew and gave a very sweet and halting rendition of the above, and everyone sighed happily with her beaming, teary-eyed parents.

Ed explains what was happening:

My mind went back to an encounter I had some years earlier. I was asked by a local pastor to go with him to a Mormon Bishop's office. It seems that the pastor had led a young neighborhood girl to the Lord. The girl had been coming to his church with a few of her friends. The girl was an inactive member of the LDS Church, and when she had shared the joy of her new-found faith with her family, they were frightened and immediately called in the Bishop. The Bishop demanded that the errant pastor come to his office and get straightened out.

When we arrived, the Bishop was there with the girl and her parents, but when he recognized me, he phoned someone and left his office until two other men arrived, apparently skilled in running off infidels. The meeting was difficult at best, but what made it so unique was that during their defense of the only true faith, one of the men backed himself into an indefensible corner from which there was no possible escape.

He then did what every single Mormon will do in a similar situation: He started to "bear his testimony." But this time I was sitting at a desk with my face just 15 inches from his. As he began his recitation, I noticed that his eyes had dilated just as though he were hypnotized. He was at the part where... "I know the Book of Mormon is the Word of God..." and I slapped my hands together right in front of his nose and loudly asked, "What proof do you have that it is the word of God?" The man bounced back, his eyes slowly returning to normal, and he sat there confused and stuttering. He had no answer.

I had broken through what I call the mind-warp of the LDS testimony, and this man was through for the rest of the meeting. The pastor was able to reinforce that special experience for the young girl, and with love and true spiritual authority he brought Christ's words home to those in the meeting.

I had learned a valuable lesson that night and have used that knowledge during literally scores of similar encounters since then. What actually happens at every LDS Fast and Testimony meeting is a form of group hypnosis, and is a key part of the answer to this mysterious question of how so many people could be so misled.

I know some will say I am being sensational, but the fact is that it is true! Every single member of the LDS Church listens to the same words being repeated over and over again with almost no variation. After years of doing this during a time of sacred fasting and avowing one's reason for faith in the supposed presence of one's god, the chant becomes bedrock truth.

It often seems that only when a Mormon is confronted or shocked with the real truth that we are able to get past the powerful control of his or her testimony and get down into the level of reason and analysis. Perhaps that is why The God Makers book and film have been so effective, and why so many active Mormons hate even the name of the book/film/authors.

Look at the words of the Mormon testimony. They testify of the Church, its authority, its scripture, its true Prophet leader. Not one word talks of a relationship with God through Christ, as Jesus Himself states in Scripture. The only Mormon connection to God (and godhood itself) is through the LDS system. The testimony will override every bit of logic, evidence, or scriptural truth that would challenge the faith of someone who has been brought through the mind-warp techniques described above. It is the same kind of system used on POWs, the same kind used by the hard cults, the same techniques used by the New Age mind-development programs. These groups all use it because it works effectively upon every surrendered mind it touches.

Look at the subjects of the LDS testimony. How can anyone irrefutably know that the Book of Mormon is true when it defies every historic and anthropological kind of evidence? Not only does scientific evidence refute any kind of Book of Mormon civilization, but there is concrete evidence of a totally different civilization in its place. Yet any faithful Mormon KNOWS it is true.

THE SECRET KINGDOM

Investigative reporter Jeffrey Kaye concluded, "The Mormon Church, this American Zion, wields more economic power more effectively than the state of Israel or the Pope in Rome."¹ Actually, the word church is misleading when applied to Mormondom, for the power structure controlling its staggering resources is organized for the kind of absolute authoritarianism that one usually associates with a cult and not with a responsible church. Nor are the ultimate goals of The Brethren compatible with the normal aims of Christian leaders. They are essentially the same as those of cults in general and especially those of secret revolutionary groups working toward a takeover of the world. As one former teacher at Brigham Young University has said:

The Mormons do intend to take over the world.... There is no secret about that-it's in the writings of Joseph Smith right on down.

The Constitution of the United States will "hang by a thread" and the Church will save it by establishing a theocracy.²

Any who think the Mormon kingdom is a democracy are under a delusion. In fact it is a dictatorship ruled by its inner elite circle. As the front page of The Wall Street Journal recently said, "Today, from their 28-story marble-and-glass Church headquarters building in Salt Lake City, Mormon Church leaders oversee a vast and growing world-wide financial empire."³ From these offices, their dictatorial control reaches out to every Church level and into every facet of Mormon life. Whatever "vote" there seems to be at the Ward, Stake, and individual levels is part of a cleverly contrived illusion that continues to deceive millions of Mormons into imagining that they actually have some say in Church affairs. Although they do have the "freedom" to disagree with their leaders, to do so means excommunication and damnation. Excommunicated for openly disagreeing with The Brethren's position on ERA, Sonia Johnson has said:

The Mormon church has become more powerful than we dare believe. It's downright terrifying, especially when you see how rich and influential it is....

I really think if we could ever get an investigation, it would uncover something so like Watergate, it would blow everything wide open.⁴

Totalitarian Theocratic Communism

Saints Alive was once involved in some litigation arising out of a physical attack upon one of its missionaries by an LDS tour guide on the street just outside Salt Lake City's Temple Square. In an interrogatory exchange, the surprising response by the Mormon Church revealed that it was an unincorporated association without assets! All wealth and power is owned and controlled by the closely held Corporation of the President of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, Inc. Church members who have faithfully and sacrificially contributed their tithes, time, and energy are powerless to demand an accounting or to change a single action by the First Presidency, even if all ten million of them stood up in unison and "voted" unanimously for it.

The startling fact is that Mormon Church members have no vote or participation of any kind in the corporate entity that controls Mormondom. They can sincerely perform their functions as Bishops, Elders, High Priests, and Sunday school superintendents all they wish, but in the real world of legal ownership and raw power they are only pawns subject to manipulation from the top. All of this is part of a secret kingdom that Jeffrey Kaye has called the "Invisible Empire" and about which most Mormons have only the vaguest notions. This theocracy was alluded to by late Apostle Bruce R. McConkie: "Through this church and kingdom a framework has been built through which the full government of God will eventually operate."⁵

That "full government of God" involves what is known as the "United Order." "Revelations" that came through Joseph Smith described it as a theocratic communistic society. All property and income were to be given over to the control of the Church and then distributed to everyone according to his need as The Brethren defined it, so that "the poor shall be exalted, in that the rich are made low."⁶ Those who transgressed were to be put out of the Church, in which case the property they had given into the "treasury" would not be returned to them.

Serious problems prevented full implementation of the "United Order." It never really worked. However, the Mormon Church still looks forward to the day when these "revelations" of God through the "Prophet" will be fulfilled and Mormon theocratic communism firmly established worldwide. That can only happen when the Church has taken full political power. When that time comes, woe to all who transgress the "laws" of the Mormon gospel. Excommunication with loss of earthly property will be supplemented with the death penalty.

The Doctrine of Blood Atonement

Since the early days of the Church it has always been Mormon doctrine that ". under certain circumstances there are some serious sins for which the cleansing of Christ does not operate, and the law of God is that men must then have their own blood shed to atone for their sins."⁷ It is generally thought that these "serious sins" are in the category of murder and adultery. However, this is not clearly defined in Mormonism. Brigham Young said that "any man or woman, who violates the covenants made with their God will be required to pay the debt. The blood of Christ will never wipe that out, your own blood must atone for it."⁸ In the same general vein, President J.M. Grant declared: "If they are covenant breakers we need a place designated where we can shed their blood."⁹ Besides murder and adultery, blood atonement was also advocated for stealing¹⁰ and taking the name of the Lord in vain.¹¹ Likewise, the penalty for marrying an African "under the law of God is death on the spot. This will always be so."¹² (The 1978 decision opening the Priesthood to blacks didn't change that law.) Blood atonement was also required for lying¹³ or "damn[ing] old Joe Smith or his religion...."¹⁴ That most serious of all crimes, apostasy, bears the death penalty, and those who kill an apostate are saving his soul. This is a real concern of ex-Mormons. Many have received death threats and some have even been shot at. Brigham Young was very firm on this subject, as the following excerpt from one of his sermons as reported in Journal of Discourses indicates:

I say, rather than that apostates should flourish here, I will unsheath my Bowie knife and conquer or die. (Great commotion in the congregation, and a simultaneous burst of feeling, assenting to the declaration.)

Now, you nasty apostates, clear out, or judgment will be put to the line, and righteousness to the plummet. (Voices, generally, "go it, go it.")

If you say it is right, raise your hands. (All hands up.)

Let us call upon the Lord to assist us in this, and every good work.¹⁵

The doctrine of "blood atonement" was practiced in Utah prior to statehood, until the Mormon leadership realized that they must obey federal laws or have them enforced by the United States Army. There are rumors that this doctrine is still practiced secretly in Utah today. It would be strange if it were not, for Mormons boast that they of all people "practice what they believe"; and as Joseph Fielding Smith said, blood atonement "is scriptural doctrine, and is taught in all the standard works of the Church."¹⁶ Certainly, Church leaders would openly carry this out today if they could. In fact, the Utah State Legislature with its Mormon majority has succeeded in legalizing one method of practicing blood atonement. Utah is the only state where the condemned may elect to be executed by a firing squad, which causes his own blood to be shed and thus by Mormon belief atones for his sins. The execution some years ago by a firing squad of condemned murderer Gary Gilmore, who was a Mormon, is an example. Brigham Young made blood atonement sound like a generous provision that the guilty would willingly embrace and the executioners gladly perform "in love":

Now take a person... [who] knows that by having his blood shed he will atone for that sin.... is there a man or woman in this house but what would say, "shed my blood that I may be saved and exalted with the Gods"?... He would be glad to have his blood shed....

I could refer to plenty of instances where men have been righteously slain, in order to atone for their sins....

This is loving our neighbor as ourselves.... If he wants salvation and it is necessary to spill his blood on the earth in order that he may be saved, spill it.... That is the way to love mankind.¹⁷

Regardless of the understanding of the average Mormon, The Brethren look forward to the day when they will once again be able to practice openly not only polygamy but blood atonement. When will that day come? In answer to that question, Bruce R. McConkie has written: "This doctrine can only be practiced in its fullness in a day when the civil and ecclesiastical laws are administered in the same hands."¹⁸ If the Mormon Church should ever succeed in taking over the world, Mormonism in its most fanatical and bizarre practices will become the rule enforced unbendingly upon everyone. Dare anyone call this a conspiracy? Thinking he was denying it, one Mormon recently told us, "This isn't a conspiracy, it's our destiny!" As with polygamy in the past, the obsessive ambition of world domination is openly denied today but secretly plotted. Though less blatantly proclaimed, that ultimate goal hasn't changed since the early days when Mormon leaders brazenly boasted, as First Presidency member Heber C. Kimball declared in 1859: "... The nations will bow to this kingdom, sooner or later, and all hell cannot help it."¹⁹

Global Goal: A One-World Government

Of course, Mormon leaders call their empire the "kingdom of God." However, their "God" is an extraterrestrial from Kolob, definitely not the God of the Bible; and the "Zion" to which their spirit-brother-of-Lucifer

Jesus Christ will return to reign is Independence, Missouri. Most Christians believe, as the Bible declares, that Christ will return to Jerusalem, Israel, to establish His millennial kingdom, whereas Mormons believe that they must establish a worldwide Mormon kingdom dictated from their Missouri base in order to make it possible for Christ to return. Therein lies a great difference, which is why the Mormon hierarchy, beginning with Joseph Smith himself, has always had worldwide and absolute political power as its goal. Mormon historian Klaus J. Hansen has written, "The idea of a political kingdom of God, promulgated by a secret Council of Fifty, is by far the most important key to an understanding of the Mormon past."²⁰ Mormon writer John J. Stewart has said:

The Prophet established a confidential Council of Fifty, or "Ytfif," (Fifty spelled backwards), comprised of both Mormons and nonMormons, to help attend to temporal matters, including the eventual development of a one-world government, in harmony with preparatory plans for the second advent of the Saviour.²¹

The close relationship between Masonry, the Mormon Priesthood, and Joseph Smith's growing ambition to rule the world (in order to bring Christ back) has been pointed out by a number of Mormon writers. Like the Temple ceremonies, the secret Council of Fifty grew out of Masonry. The Prophet's divine "revelation about the political kingdom of God" came just three weeks after the Nauvoo Masonic Lodge was installed and Smith became a Master Mason.²² These men were all members of the Priesthood, they all wore special robes, and the records of their meetings were often burned (those that remain in the possession of the Church today are not available even for Church historians to peruse). In 1884 Mormon spokesman Elder Lunt said, "We look forward with perfect confidence to the day when we will hold the reins of the U.S. government.... After that we expect to control the continent."²³ This secret organization was referred to in a "writ issued for the arrest of prominent citizens of Nauvoo for `treasonable designs against the state.' "²⁴

Numerous sources report that shortly before his death Joseph Smith was crowned by this secret council as king over the Mormon kingdom that he believed was destined to control the world. Not only was Joseph Smith crowned "king on the earth,"²⁵ but so were Brigham Young²⁶ and John Taylor.²⁷ The authority claimed even today for Mormondom's "living Prophet" is still that of an absolute monarch or dictator. One of the greatest authorities on Mormon doctrine, the late Apostle Bruce R. McConkie has said:

The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints as it is now constituted is the kingdom of God on earth....

The Church is not a democracy... [but] a kingdom... and the President of the Church, the mouthpiece of God on earth, is the earthly king.²⁸

The "Secret Government"

The current importance of this ambition to rule the world is evident in the secret oaths still taken by each Mormon going through the Temple ceremonies. In one such oath, the patron "consecrates" all he owns, earns, and is "to the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints for the building up of the Kingdom of God on the earth and for the establishment of Zion."²⁹ In the "Law of Sacrifice," Temple patrons swear even to sacrifice their lives to this cause.³⁰ This is not what Christians think of as the kingdom of God to be established by Christ Himself, but, as Mormon writer J.D. Williams has pointed out, it involves "a secret government, responsible not to the governed but to ecclesiastical authority, which will provide benign rule for all people, without election."³¹ That most Mormons are not aware of the real purpose behind Mormonism doesn't change the facts. Mormon researcher Klaus Hansen's comments are of interest:

Even among the Mormons, few were themselves aware of the revolutionary implications inherent in the concept of the political kingdom of God as taught by their prophet Joseph Smith to a small group of faithful followers, after he had initiated them into a secret Council of Fifty in the spring of 1844....

Indeed, if few Mormons, in 1844, knew what kind of kingdom their prophet had organized that year, fewer know today.³²

The fact that so few Mormons themselves, to say nothing of non-Mormons, know the truth about Mormonism today reflects the secrecy involved and the apparent intention of its leaders. Is so much of Mormonism plotted and practiced in secret because The Brethren know it can only be "sold" under false labels? Can Mormons reasonably expect the world to convert to a religion that is so dishonestly and secretly presented and much of it held back in secret because it is so "sacred"? If Mormons are indeed "the only true Christians," then let them emulate the founder of Christianity, who said, "I spake openly to the world... and in secret have I said nothing."³³

Corruption Rooted in Power

History confirms common sense in bearing witness that whenever the absolute control which The Brethren wield has rested for very long in human hands, the results have been tragic. The Bible declares that the heart of every human is "deceitful above all things, and desperately wicked...."³⁴ This applies to The Brethren as well as to everyone else. The worst despots in history have been those who claimed to be divine. This is because humans were never intended to exercise godlike power and control either over themselves or over others. When they attempt it, disaster results as surely as night follows day.

Much of the dishonest unwillingness to face facts unfavorable to their religion and the gullible willingness to believe the most outrageous lies that Mormons themselves admit is endemic among them can be traced to their belief that they are in the process of becoming "gods." How can a "god" ever be wrong? Surely the temptation to live by the adage "The end justifies the means" would be overpowering for anyone who really believes that his "end" will be "exaltation" to "godhood."

Under the grandiose dream that they are the God Makers, Mormonism's leaders have developed an utter contempt for truth when it conflicts with their goal of extending the Mormon kingdom, in the name of Jesus Christ, to encompass the entire world. As the absolute leaders of Mormonism, The Brethren have rewritten "revelations," suppressed facts, promoted fraud, honored false prophets, misrepresented their true beliefs and practices, and pretended to possess a divine authority which they obviously don't have, in order to control those under them and ensnare fresh millions in Mormonism. Though their religious zeal may be genuine, they have divorced their faith from truth and built an earthly empire upon the insistence that their followers dare not think for themselves or examine facts, but must blindly obey whatever The Brethren decree.

Some Extremely Grave Questions

Mormonism seems as American as apple pie, and Mormons seem to be the perfect citizens with their close families, high morals, patriotism, Boy Scout programs, Tabernacle Choir, and conservative politics. A Los Angeles Times article implied that Mormons have recently gained the image of "super-Americans... [who] appear to many to be 'more American than the average American.'"³⁵ This may explain why such a high proportion of Mormons find their way into government. Returned LDS missionaries have "the three qualities the CIA wants: foreign language ability, training in a foreign country, and former residence in a foreign country."³⁶ Utah (and particularly BYU) is one of the prime recruiting areas for the CIA. According to BYU spokesman Dr. Gary Williams, "We've never had any trouble placing anyone who has applied to the CIA. Every year they take almost anybody who applies."³⁷ He also admitted that this has created problems with a number of foreign countries, who have complained about the "pretty good dose of [Mormon] missionaries who've gone back to the countries they were in as Central Intelligence agents."³⁸

This may at least partially explain the reported close tie between the Mormon Church and the CIA.³⁹ A disproportionate number of Mormons arrive at the higher levels of the CIA, FBI, military intelligence, armed forces, and all levels of city, state, and federal governments, including the Senate, Congress, Cabinet, and White House Staff. Sincere and loyal citizens, most of them may be unaware of the secret ambition of The Brethren. What could be better than having such patriots as these serving in strategic areas of government and national security? Unfortunately, as we have noticed in every other area of Mormonism, the real truth lies hidden beneath the seemingly ideal image of patriotism presented by Mormons in public service. In fact their very presence in responsible government positions, particularly in agencies dealing with national security, raises some extremely grave questions that were expressed by Ed Decker in the following letter mailed to the addressees:

An open letter to:

The President, First Presidency and members of the General Authorities of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints

August 21, 1980

Gentlemen:

I was recently reflecting that although the actual blood oath and the oath of vengeance were removed from the Temple ceremonies sometime after 1930, you gentlemen [listing ten of the above] are of an age to have received your own endowments prior to their removal, and therefore, are still under these oaths.

I am particularly interested in your personal position on your oath of vengeance against the United States of America. As you recall, the oath was basically as follows:

You and each of you do solemnly promise and vow that you will pray and never cease to importune high heaven to AVENGE THE BLOOD OF THE PROPHETS (Joseph and Hiram Smith) ON THIS NATION, and that you will teach this to your children and your children's children unto the third and fourth generation.

Have you officially renounced this oath? Or are you still bound by it?

If you have not renounced it, how can you presume to lead fourand-one-half million people under item 12 of your Articles of Faith and still be bound to call upon heaven to heap curses upon our nation? ("We believe in being subject to Kings, Presidents, Rulers and Magistrates, in obeying, honoring, and sustaining the law.")

If you have renounced it, how can you justify having sworn such an oath in the most holy of holy places on this earth, before the sacred altar of your omnipotent God, and then renounce it? Gentlemen, I call upon you to repent of this abomination and proclaim to both the Mormon people and to the people of the United States of America that you renounce that oath and all it represents.

I also call upon all members of the Mormon Church who hold office in our government, serve in the Armed Services, work for the FBI and CIA who have gone through the Mormon Temple and sworn oaths of obedience and sacrifice to the Church and its leaders (above), to repent of these oaths in the light of the obvious conflict of interest between their pledge of allegiance to the USA and their higher loyalty to a group of men who are sworn to seek vengeance against this great nation.

Sincerely,

(signed) J.Edward Decker

Mr. Ronald Reagan

No response was received to this letter. The Brethren are so powerful that they are immune to criticism and feel no need to explain themselves or account to anyone for their actions. The Mormon Church already packs a political punch far out of proportion to its size. The Wall Street Journal explained how, in spite of the Constitutional separation between Church and State, public schools in Utah are used to instill Mormonism in young minds. It mentioned political reapportionment, airline deregulation, the basing of the MX missile, and the ERA as political issues affected by the power of the Church. For example, when the Church opposed the MX for Utah, those plans were immediately dropped by the federal government. The same Wall Street Journal article quoted the following statement from J.D.Williams, a University of Utah political science professor:

There is a disquieting statement in Mormonism: "When the leaders have spoken, the thinking has been done." To me, democracy can't thrive in that climate.

They [Mormon politicians] don't have to be called to Church headquarters for political instruction. They know what they're supposed to do.

That's why non-Mormons can only look toward the Mormon Church and wonder: "What is Big Brother doing to me today?"⁴⁰

A Disturbing Possibility

While the election of a Mormon U.S. President seems unlikely, it is highly probable under the present swing toward conventional morality and conservatism that a Mormon could one day become a Republican Vice-Presidential nominee. With the power, wealth, wide influence, numerous highly placed Mormons, and large voting block under their virtual control, The Brethren have a great deal to offer a Republican Presidential candidate. Let's assume that a Mormon Vice-Presidential candidate is on the winning ticket, and thereafter the President dies in office or is assassinated, causing the Mormon to succeed him as President of the United States.

There is every reason to believe that the new President would immediately begin to gather around him increasing numbers of zealous Temple Mormons in strategic places at the highest levels of government. A crisis similar to the one which Mormon prophecies "foretold" occurs, in which millions of Mormons with their year's supply of food, guns, and ammunition play a key role. It would be a time of excitement and zealous effort by the "Saints" to fulfill Joseph Smith's and Brigham Young's "prophecy":

The time will come when the destiny of the nation will hang upon a single thread.

At that critical juncture, this people will step forth and save it from the threatened destruction.⁴¹

Not only does Mormonism predict the "saving" of America, but the precedent for an attempted takeover by force or subterfuge through political means has been set by the founding "Prophet" himself. In 1834 Joseph Smith organized an army and marched toward Independence, Missouri, to "redeem Zion." In spite of a humiliating surrender to the Missouri militia that proved his bold "prophecies" false, the "Prophet" later formed the "Nauvoo Legion" and commissioned himself a lieutenant-general to command it. Lyman L. Woods stated:

I have seen him on a white horse wearing the uniform of a general....

He was leading a parade of the Legion and looked like a god.⁴²

Joseph Smith was not only ordained king on earth, but he ran for President of the United States just before his death, at which time Mormon missionaries across the country became "a vast force of political [power]."⁴³ Today's Church leaders are urging Mormons to prepare themselves for the coming crisis in order to succeed where past "Saints" have failed. A recent major article in Ensign about being prepared included this oft-repeated warning reminder:

The commandment to reestablish Zion became for the Saints of Joseph Smith's day the central goal of the Church.

But it was a goal the Church did not realize because its people were not fully prepared.⁴⁴

Going back to our hypothetical crisis, what Mormons unsuccessfully attempted against impossible odds in the past they might very well accomplish with much better odds in this future scenario. Under cover of the national and international crisis, the Mormon President of the United States acts boldly and decisively to assume dictatorial powers. With the help of The Brethren and Mormons everywhere, he appears to save America and becomes a national hero. At this time he is made Prophet and President of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints and the Mormon kingdom of God, while still President of the United States. There is no provision in the Constitution to prevent this.

With the government largely in the hands of increasing numbers of Mormon appointees at all levels throughout the United States, the Constitutional prohibition against the establishment of a state church would no longer be enforceable. Mormon prophecies and the curse upon the United States government in revenge for the blood of Joseph and Hyrum Smith would seemingly have been fulfilled. In effect, the United States would have become a theocracy exactly as planned by The Brethren, completing the first step in the Mormon takeover of the world. President John Taylor boasted of it 100 years ago:

Let us now notice our political position in the world. What are we going to do? We are going to possess the earth... and reign over it for ever and ever.

Now, ye Kings and Emperors help yourselves if you can.

This is the truth and it may as well be told at this time as at any other.

There's a good time coming, Saints, a good time coming!⁴⁵

A More Likely Scenario

While the above presents an extremely disturbing possibility, it may seem highly speculative and improbable. There is another scenario, however, which is equally disturbing and much more likely. It arises from the fact that Mormonism is actually part of something much larger. We have already noted that the "revelations" that Joseph Smith received, far from being unique, were in fact very similar to the basic philosophy underlying many occult groups and secret revolutionary societies. Thus far in history, these numerous occult/revolutionary organizations have remained largely separate and in competition with one another.

If something should happen to unite them, and at the same time their beliefs should gain worldwide acceptance, a new and unimaginably powerful force for world revolution would have come into existence. There is increasing evidence of a new and growing secular/religious ecumenism persuasive enough to accomplish this unprecedented and incalculably powerful coalition. It could be the means of creating the one-world government that has not only been the long-standing hope and plan of The Brethren and many other occult/revolutionary leaders, but is increasingly gaining a wide acceptance through New Age networks as the only viable option to a nuclear holocaust and/or ecological collapse.

Improbable? Perhaps. But certainly it can no longer be summarily dismissed as impossible.

A TIME TO CHOOSE

Out of genuine concern for those who are committed to or are seriously considering Mormonism, we have attempted to present carefully and factually the truth about what the Mormon Church really believes and practices. Any mistakes that can be pointed out to us will be quickly acknowledged and corrected. Likewise we would hope that our Mormon readers would be willing to admit and face the consequences of whatever we have said that is factual. It has not been our desire to attack Mormons, but only to help them by documenting the truth about Mormonism that many Latter-day Saints themselves do not understand.

Cindy discovered the truth for herself, but not until Mormonism had destroyed her marriage. With ancestors who had crossed the plains to Utah in handcars, Cindy had been born into an LDS pioneer family and was an active Mormon for 30 years. Her husband, however, lost interest in the Church and wasn't living up to its standards. "He had no desire to be active in the Priesthood," Cindy told us, "so the Mormon leaders encouraged me to divorce him." It was in the midst of that trauma that Cindy began seeking some answers. Her story gives hope to others:

As far as I was concerned, the Mormon Church was totally the right thing, and I would do whatever they said. I spent my entire life working in it and doing everything I could to promote it. I started teaching when I was 17 and was teaching seminary and genealogy when I finally left the Church.

What happened was that I began to study the Bible and became aware that the god of Mormonism was not the real God of the Bible. He was a counterfeit, probably one of the best counterfeits that Satan has come up with to keep people away from knowing the real and living Jesus Christ.

I had to make a choice, and I chose Jesus over Joseph, and being a Christian instead of becoming a goddess wife to some Mormon man /god.

Mormonism's Long-Standing Controversy with Christianity

Cindy's opinion that the Mormon "god" is a satanic counterfeit designed to keep Mormons from knowing the true God may seem harsh. However, we have given more than enough documentation-not only from former Mormons but also from Mormon Prophets and Apostles-to show that Mormonism (like Masonry, from which its secret Temple rituals came) is a Luciferian religion within the mainstream of anti-Christian pagan tradition. It is not even based upon the Book of Mormon, and is certainly not based upon the Bible. Brigham Young made the astonishing admission that he had "not read the Bible for years" and that when he had attempted to study it, he "did not understand the spirit and meaning of it...."¹ He further admitted that in his day the 12 Apostles of the Mormon Church included men who believed in reincarnation, rejected the existence of God, and denied that there was any value in the death of Christ for salvation.² One would think that such admissions as these and the many others equally damaging that we have quoted would cause every Mormon to seriously reevaluate his religion.

Sadly, however, from The Brethren on down, Mormons generally have not responded well to constructive criticism. They are afraid even to consider momentarily the possibility that there might be any error at all in their Church or its Prophets or doctrines. Any attempt to point out even the most obvious fallacies is met by the standard Mormon response: a wounded complaint that they are being attacked, along with the seemingly sincere protest that they attack no one. Mormons seem to forget that Joseph Smith declared all Christian creeds to be an abomination. Brigham Young said that all Christians were "groveling in darkness,"³ and that the Christian God is "the 'Mormon's' Devil...."⁴ John Taylor, third Mormon President, said that Christianity was "hatched in hell,"⁵ and "a perfect pack of nonsense... The Devil could not invent a better engine to spread his work...."⁶ Continuously around the world, for over a hundred years (until the publication of this book and film and others like it forced the ritual to be changed), hundreds of times each day in secret ceremonies before thousands of Mormon Temple patrons, all Christian ministers were ridiculed and slandered as absolute fools hired by Satan to deceive their congregations.⁷

Clearly, Mormonism from its very beginning has had a deep controversy with Christianity and has aggressively pressed its attack. The differences between the two are very real and need to be understood rather than denied. We have attempted to contribute to that understanding. If Christianity were indeed "hatched in hell" and the Christian God is "the 'Mormon's' Devil," then the change in tactics that now has Mormon missionaries protesting to Christians, "Our God is the same as your God," is extremely dishonest. Nor does it contribute to a mutual understanding or serve the cause of truth for well-meaning Christians to accept this misrepresentation in the name of broad-mindedness. If Christianity were not "hatched in hell," then Mormonism was. All sincere Christians and Mormons must decide for themselves. We have tried to provide a factual basis for choosing between these two diametrically opposed beliefs.

Perpetuating the Myth

Those Mormons who, after examining the evidence for themselves, choose "Jesus instead of Joseph" as Cindy did and become Christians, learn very quickly and often to their great surprise just how antagonistic Mormonism really is toward Christianity. They discover that it is impossible to be both a Mormon and a Christian. Any Mormon for whom Jesus Christ becomes more important than Joseph Smith and the Church he founded is in for serious trouble. The Brethren won't tolerate this for a moment, because it challenges their entire authority structure that is built upon Joseph Smith and the belief that membership in the Mormon Church is essential for eternal life. All those who meet the real Jesus of the Bible immediately learn that Christianity is based upon a relationship with Him and not with any organization. Such a person is a threat to Mormonism, and therefore friends and even family members will be warned not to have anything to do with him or her.

Even after leaving the Church, however, one's name will still be kept on the Church rolls. It will only be removed after a formal excommunication trial, which is a process the Mormon Church generally pursues only if it is insisted upon by the person who has left. Thereafter, false charges will very often be circulated in order to make it appear that the Church initiated the excommunication for some moral reasons. It would look bad to admit that an "apostate" insisted upon having his name removed because he had met the real Jesus and had discovered that Mormonism is anti-Christian.

Recently a young single woman who had become a Christian and was trying to have her name removed from Church rolls was told that her records would read, "Excommunicated for fornication." This was absolutely false, but the Bishop was firm. He claimed that with his "spiritual discernment" he "knew" that a single young woman living alone and outside the only true Church would inevitably be guilty of this sin. It was a brazenly dishonest yet common way of applying pressure to remain in the Church. Not until he received a stern call from her attorney did the Bishop decide to stop playing that game.

Tony told us, "After we left the Church, our friends were told to have nothing to do with us. My wife was very uncomfortable at the grocery store-people stared and then turned their backs without saying anything." When Janet became a Christian, her daughter Brenda, a student at BYU at the time, was warned not to talk to her own mother. After the entire family became Christians and left the Mormon Church, the rumor persisted that they had been excommunicated because the parents were guilty of adultery. It was another blatant lie, but apparently Mormon leaders consider such fabrications to be necessary in order to perpetuate the myth of Mormonism.

Passing On Occult Power and Bondage

Only after breaking away completely do former Mormons begin to realize that it wasn't just pressure from family and friends that held them, but that they were under heavy occult bondage that made it extremely difficult to escape. The spiritual power within Mormonism is very real and very strong. As with all occult groups, this power is passed on through special rituals, especially those imitating the biblical "laying on of hands." Temple Mormons are especially firmly bound by this occult bondage, for they wear the magic underwear as well as the apron emblem of Lucifer's "power and priesthoods" in life and in death; and at the Temple Veil they call down the "power in the priesthoods" upon themselves and their posterity. As we have documented, the entire Temple ceremony involves occult chants and rituals that bind participants under heavy spiritual control.

One of the most telling evidences of this occult demonic control within Mormonism came out recently when Bishop Glenn L. Pace of the Presiding Bishop's Office dropped a bombshell on the Church. In a special report to the Church's Strengthening Church Members committee dated July 19, 1990, and titled Ritualistic Child Abuse, Pace reported the activities of satanic ritual abuse taking place within the LDS Church. In part, he said:

"Pursuant to the committee's request, I am writing this memorandum to pass along what I have learned about ritualistic child abuse. Hopefully it will be of some value to you as you continue to monitor the problem. You have already received the LDS Social Services report on Satanism dated May 24, 1989, a report from Brent Ward, and a memorandum from myself dated October 20, 1989, in response to Brother Ward's report. Therefore, I will limit this writing to information not contained in those papers.

I have met with 60 victims. That number could be twice or three times as many if I did not discipline myself to only one meeting per week. I have not wanted my involvement with this issue to become a handicap in fulfilling my assigned responsibilities. On the other hand, I felt someone needed to pay the price to obtain an intellectual and spiritual conviction as to the seriousness of this problem within the Church.

Of the 60 victims with whom I have met, 53 are female and seven are male. Eight are children. The abuse occurred in the following places: Utah (37), Idaho (3), California (4), Mexico (2), and other places (14). Fifty-three victims are currently living in the state of Utah. All 60 individuals are members of the Church. Forty-five victims allege witnessing and/or participating in human sacrifice. The majority were abused by relatives, often their parents. All have developed psychological problems and most have been diagnosed as having multiple-personality disorder or some other form of dissociative disorder.

I'm sorry to say that many of the victims have had their first flashbacks while attending the temple for the first time. The occult along the Wasatch Front uses the doctrine of the Church to their advantage. For example, the verbiage and gestures are used in a ritualistic ceremony in a very debased and often bloody manner. When the victim goes to the temple and hears the exact words, horrible memories are triggered. We have recently been disturbed with members of the Church who have talked about the temple ceremony. Compared to what is happening in the occult along the Wasatch Front, these are very minor infractions. The perpetrators are also living a dual life. Many are temple recommend holders. This leads to another reason why the Church needs to consider the seriousness of these problems. In effect, the Church is being used.

I go out of my way to not let the victims give me the names of the perpetrators. I have told them that my responsibility is to help them with spiritual healing and that the names of perpetrators should be given to therapists and law enforcement officers. However, they have told me the positions in the Church of members who are perpetrators. Among others, there are Young Women leaders, Young Men leaders, bishops, a patriarch, a stake president, temple workers, and members of the Tabernacle Choir. These accusations are not coming from individuals who think they recognized someone, but from those who have been abused by people they know, in many cases their own family members.

Frightening, yes. Unexpected, no. For a Church which was founded on the principles of the occult and witchcraft (folk magic, to use a kinder word), it is only to be expected. You don't get rid of these kinds of demonic powers and influences by hiding them from view. You can only get rid of them by repenting and confessing them as sin. It gets worse without repentance. Not better-just worse.

The greater sin (of which the above are merely offshoots) is the refusal to face the overwhelming evidence that Joseph Smith was a false prophet and the persistence in embracing the anti-Christian false gospel he taught. It is that sin which binds Mormons to Satan's lies and for which repentance is required of every Mormon.

It is not only Temple Mormons who are in occult bondage. Repeatedly throughout their lives the power of Lucifer's Priesthoods is given dominion even over Mormons who never go through the Temple. This begins shortly after birth, with the dedication ceremony, when the new infant is "blessed" by his father in front of the congregation at the Sunday morning Sacrament Service. Priesthood members gather around, support the babe on their hands, and bind it spiritually through Priesthood power to perpetual membership in the Mormon Church. The babe is named and pronouncements made over it by the power of the name of the "Holy Melchizedek Priesthood," such as that it will go on a mission, be married in the Temple, and never leave the Mormon Church.

Periodically thereafter, as a growing child, teenager, and adult, the active Mormon will be "called" to perform various jobs and offices in the Church. At such times, usually the hands of a Priesthood member will be laid on the head of the one "called" to the task, and once more the Luciferian claim upon this life is renewed by the power of the Mormon Priesthoods. Mormons are well aware of the power of this "laying on of hands" and consider jobs where this is not involved to be of lesser importance. In this way the occult bond is strengthened continuously. At confirmation as a member of the Church, hands are again laid on in the name of the Priesthood, and the person is commanded to receive the Holy Ghost. As we have already noted, the Mormon Holy Ghost is definitely not the Holy Spirit described in the Bible.

The Patriarchal Blessing

Each Mormon "Stake" has at least one and sometimes two or three "Patriarchs," of which there are several thousand. These men exert a spiritual influence upon active Mormons that is comparable to anything in the Temple, and is often even more powerful. Mormons eagerly look forward to the day when one of these "High Priests" will lay hands on their heads and bestow the "Patriarchal Blessing" upon them. It is like a "life reading" from Edgar Cayce or having one's fortune told. The Patriarch comes forth with an inspired utterance, often quite lengthy and specific about future events in the person's life and sometimes amazingly accurate. This is taken down by a tape recorder and a signed typed copy is presented. Most Mormons implicitly believe in the accuracy of and highly prize the official copy of their own personal "Patriarchal Blessing."

This can be one of the most powerful spiritual experiences in a Mormon's life. Devout Mormons will often fast for several days in preparation for it. Sometimes when the Patriarch's hands are laid upon the head, the recipient of the blessing begins to vibrate under a mysterious force and experiences a strange ascension into a "higher consciousness," where there is an extreme openness to occult power and bondage. Former Mormons testify that in such a state it is no longer necessary to listen to the words being spoken. Even before the Patriarch's thoughts are audibly expressed, the one being "blessed" is already hearing the words-and sometimes is even seeing everything in a fantastic moving vision. Similar experiences are common among numerous occultists; and the power over one's life that is produced thereby can only be broken by a complete renunciation of these forces in the name of Jesus Christ and receiving Him into one's heart and life as Savior and Lord. This personal relationship with Jesus Christ is the key in breaking occult bondage.

It is therefore no coincidence that The Brethren discourage their followers from having a personal relationship with Jesus Christ. They know that those who receive Christ as Savior and Lord will no longer be in their power. Apostle Bruce R. McConkie warned that those who seek "a personal relationship with Christ" and take this relationship with Him as "a goal in life and focus on it... become unbalanced."⁸ McConkie also suggested that each Mormon have his "own personal plan of salvation." He claimed that "no two persons should have the same Plan" and that those who do "the best they can are charting a course to Eternal Life."¹⁰

In contrast, the Bible teaches that there is only one plan of salvation, and Jesus carried it out when He died for our sins, paying a debt we could never pay. On that basis, God is able to forgive those who will receive Christ, and eternal life is offered as a free gift to anyone willing to receive it on God's terms.¹¹

Preparation for Delusion

Jesus warned that the last days prior to His return would be characterized by religious deception involving false prophets, false Messiahs, and false miracles so convincing that they would deceive if possible the very elect.¹² The apostle Paul explained that this deception would sweep the world under the leadership of a man who would claim to be God and seemingly prove it by performing miracles through the power of Satan,¹³ thus demonstrating that the Serpent's promise of "godhood" was genuine. Under the influence of a "strong delusion," this powerful lie would be believed by the world.¹⁴ As we have thoroughly documented, this belief is the common foundation of Mormonism and paganism (occultism). Its ultimate goal is a one-world government under a false Messiah, as the apostle John prophesied.¹⁵ From this perspective Mormonism takes on its real significance.

Far from being unique (as claimed), and in spite of Christian terminology, Joseph Smith's "revelations" were simply variations on timeworn occult themes common to numerous secret societies for centuries. Although these groups have been widely scattered and many of them have had no contact with similar groups, they all share the same basic Hindu concepts that also lie at the heart of Mormonism. This presents compelling evidence that Joseph Smith's inspirations came from the same nonhuman source that has been communicating with occultists worldwide as far back as history records. That these "revelations" consistently promise godhood and immortality on the same terms that the Serpent offered these to Eve conclusively identifies the mastermind behind Mormonism and all other occultism.

Even much of the esoteric terminology is the same. Not only the Mormon Church, but also many other neopagan organizations have long been obsessed with "restoration" doctrines, secret "revelations," and various kinds of "seer stones." Another recurring theme has involved mysterious "hieroglyphics" translated by a "Urim and Thummim," exactly as Joseph Smith claimed he had done. Myths about "Enoch," similar to Joseph Smith's, figured not only in Masonry, but among Rosicrucians and many others, who also had their "High Priesthoods" and "Melchisedec" degrees and Lodges.¹⁶ The "laying on of hands" for passing on occult power, as well as reports of healings and other "miraculous" occurrences, are also common to most of these groups—just as among Mormons. The similarities are too close and too many to be dismissed as coincidence.

Mormonism's founding Prophet both employed the stock-in-trade occult jargon common to secret revolutionary groups of his time and shared their obsessive vision of uniting the world under a new order of government ruled by an esoteric "Priesthood." This was expanded upon by Joseph Smith's successors and is still the real goal of Mormonism. In 1878 President John Taylor declared: "God is determined to carry out his purposes, and to build up his [Independence, Missouri] Zion.... Hear it, you Latter-day Saints... it is a revelation from the Most High...."¹⁷ Presidents Wilford Woodruff, Joseph F. Smith, and Lorenzo Snow confirmed this in no uncertain terms. Snow stated with conviction in 1898: "... You will go back to Jackson County, many of you whom I am addressing this afternoon. I am sure of this."¹⁸

Having failed to establish their worldwide theocracy within the designated time limit, Mormons refuse to admit that this proves Joseph Smith and all those who followed him as "Prophet, Seer and Revelator" of the Latter-day Saints were false prophets. Though still obsessed with Smith's vision of a Missouri-based world takeover, the Mormon Church no longer flaunts that ambition but keeps it in the background. In a significant change in tactics, The Brethren have spent millions of advertising dollars and decades shedding the former image of the rebelpolygamist-heretic Mormon and building a new reputation of solid citizenship, good morals, and conservative politics. More recently the Mormon Church has begun to cultivate cooperation with "Gentiles" as part of its new strategy for fulfilling Joseph Smith's grandiose dream.

The Divine Rights of the Mormons

Mormons believe that the United States Constitution "was given by the inspiration of God"¹⁹ and is both a divine²⁰ and global document that holds the key to a coming peace and prosperity for the whole world.²¹ President Taylor said:

When the people have torn to shreds the Constitution of the United States, the [Mormon] Elders of Israel will be found holding it up to the nations of the earth....²²

Brigham Young declared:

... As Joseph Smith said, "The time will come when the destiny of the nation will hang upon a single thread. At that critical juncture, this people will step forth and save it from destruction." It will be so.... The "Mormon" elders... will step forth and do it.²³

The prophesied Mormon takeover (to save the Constitution and the nation) was to have been administered through Joseph Smith's Council of Fifty. Today the work is expected to be administered by the Prophet reigning from his Temple in Washington D.C. and his Priesthood leaders spread across the nation. President David O. McKay declared in 1956:

Next to being one in worshipping God, there is nothing in this world upon which this Church should be more united than in upholding and defending the Constitution of the United States.²⁴

Mormons know what this means. The Brethren are dedicated to reviving the "United Order." Every Temple Mormon swears absolute obedience to the Law of Consecration which means that when the time comes the Church will own and control all his assets and income.²⁵ President Joseph F. Smith said, "Zion can only be built up by the law that God revealed for that purpose, which is the law of consecration-not the law of tithing." (This means turning over 100 percent to the Church, not just 10 percent.)²⁶ President Wilford Woodruff declared:

... We should commence to prepare and fit ourselves for the United Order.

... The New Jerusalem [in Independence, Missouri] will be built up in our day and generation, and it will have to be done by the United Order of Zion and according to celestial law.²⁷

From "Zion" The Brethren expect to rule the world, and everything they do is directed to that ultimate goal. This is the great hope of every devout Mormon.

New Age Ecumenism

Mormonism can best be understood in relation to the larger occult conspiracy of which it is a part. The pieces are now beginning to fall into place. Joseph Smith's revelations blueprinting the human path to "godhood" were right on target with the Hindu-Buddhist occultism that is sweeping the West today as the New Age movement.^{*} It offers numerous here-and-now shortcuts to the "godhood" that Mormons can only hope to reach during eons of time into the future. For this reason, Mormons who become disillusioned with their Church are particularly susceptible to New Age delusions.

Similarity in beliefs and goals could bring about increasing cooperation between Mormons and New Age groups. Already Mormons have begun to work closely with the Unification Church, headed by Korean "Messiah" Sun Myung Moon. The New Republic has said, "Sun Myung Moon is to cults what Henry Ford was to cars."²⁸

The Mormon Church has a great deal in common with the Unification Church.

Much like Joseph Smith, Sun Myung Moon claims to have been visited by angels, Moses, Buddha, and Jesus. Jesus allegedly gave Moon at age 16 the same assignment that Joseph Smith's "god" from Kolob had already given him at the same age: to "restore" true Christianity, beginning in the United States, and eventually to take over the entire world. Although the main characters are different, the basic Unification Church scenario, including blind obedience by members, is much the same as Mormonism's. Reminiscent of Joseph Smith, Sun Myung Moon says:

I am your brain. Every people or every organization that goes against the Unification Church will gradually come down and die.²⁹

The Unification Church hopes to install Sun Myung Moon as world ruler; the Mormon Church holds the same ambition for its "Prophet, Seer and Revelator"; and Christians await the return of Jesus Christ to establish His kingdom. The Bible declares that the world will be united first under a great political and religious leader known as the Antichrist.³⁰ This gives the new ecumenism special importance and perhaps even frightening possibilities. Yet this New Age ecumenism is growing in popularity.

Unity by Lunacy

The Bible declares that the world will be united religiously under the Antichrist, who will declare himself to be God.³¹ Under a "strong delusion,"³² the entire world will accept this preposterous claim and worship him.³³ Such worldwide religious unity seems impossible. Yet in the popular motion picture Gandhi, that amazing hero embraces this very impossibility and makes it sound heroic and generous if not reasonable. Gandhi declares: "I am a Muslim, I am a Hindu, I am a Buddhist, I am a Christian!" He should have added, "And I am irrational!" No one can rationally be all of these, because they strongly disagree in the three most basic elements of religion: God, heaven, and salvation.

In Buddhism there is no God; in Hinduism there are millions of gods; in Islam there is one God, Allah, who is a single Person; in the Judeo-Christian Scriptures three Persons-Father, Son, and Holy Spirit-comprise the one God. "Heaven" in Buddhism is Nirvana, a return to the void or nothingness; in Hinduism the goal is Moksha or self-realization, to realize that one is God; in the Judeo-Christian view the goal is to be in heaven with God,³⁴ not to be God; and in Islam the goal is Paradise. These concepts of God, heaven, and the way to reach it are all different. So it is indeed irrational for a person to declare that he is a Muslim, Buddhist, Hindu, and Christian. Nevertheless, moviegoers find this particular statement by Gandhi to be one of the most moving and appealing parts of the film. This unity by lunacy seems to be an idea whose time has come.

If morality is to be based upon more than changeable fads, opinions, customs, or fanaticism, it must come as a communication from God in the conscience. There must be a higher basis than culture for determining what is right and wrong if those concepts are to have any real meaning. This is exactly what the Bible claims.³⁵ There is no real hope for moral stability in family or society until immorality is seen as not just "hurting others," but as sin against God. Again, this is what the Bible teaches.³⁶ But who is God, and how can we be sure that He exists-and if He does, how can we know Him? This is very important, because our view of God determines our morality and everything else.

The atheist counters with this standard argument: "You only believe in God because science hasn't yet explained everything. One day science will have explained everything in terms of cause and effect governed by natural laws, and there won't be any need for God anymore." However, if everything is explainable in terms of natural processes, then the very theory that says so must itself be explainable as the result of natural causes and would therefore be meaningless. As C.S. Lewis says, "It would be like proving that there are no such things as proofs." This is why atheism has no basis for morality in spite of its proud and specious talk about "ethics." If everything results from natural causes, then to say "I love you!" or "That's beautiful" or "That's wrong" would be no more significant than to say, "I'm hungry" or "I have a headache."

Unless there is a transcendent Creator-God above and outside of nature, a God who made us in His image, we would not have the power to reason or choose any more than a computer could write its own program. Unlike the Mormon "gods," the God of the Judeo-Christian Bible created everything out of nothing. He established the laws that govern the universe and therefore these natural laws don't govern Him. This means that, unlike the "gods" of Mormonism and occultism, the biblical God can reach into the universe and into human hearts with forgiveness, redemption, and resurrection. It also means that salvation cannot be demanded, earned, or induced by ritual; far from flowing from natural laws, it must overcome them. This transcendent God cannot be found by our reasoning, no matter how brilliant, but must reveal Himself. This He has done when He came in the Person of Christ through the virgin birth. God demands to be known for who He is and on His terms.

Mormonism, Atheism, Humanism, and Occultism

A "God" that fits anyone's definition is clearly man's creature and not his Creator. The human arrogance that defines God in its own terms has already enthroned self in His place. Self-deification is at the heart of Hinduism, is the foundation of all occultism, and is the meeting point between atheism and false religion. As with the Yogi, self-realization has always been the goal of classical atheism and humanism, and is being expressed in psychological terminology in the West today as the Human Potential (New Age) movement.

Most Mormons are naively unaware of the fact that Mormonism is simply classical atheistic humanism deceptively packaged in pseudo-Christian terminology. Secular humanism, which most Mormons would sincerely see as their enemy, makes man the center and measure of all things. So does Mormonism. Atheist/humanist Henri de Lubec declared: "The turning point in history will be the moment man becomes aware that the only God of man is man himself."³⁷ Like many other New Age cult leaders, Werner Erhard is trying to bring about that very transformation through est (Erhard Seminars Training) by brainwashing his disciples (trainees) into believing that "human beings [are] God."³⁸ In perfect agreement with Lubec, Erhard, and countless other atheists/humanists/occultists, Joseph Smith declared that all "gods" are men and that men are the only "gods"; that the "intelligence which man possesses is co-equal with God himself"; and that men and all spirits are co-equal.. .[and] self-existent with God."³⁹ How odd that the current Mormon president seems unaware of this key doctrine!

If all "gods" were once men, one logically wonders who was the first god who created the first man. In Mormonism that is a meaningless question, because Joseph Smith taught that the universe of "matter and intelligence" has always existed.⁴⁰ As in all nature (witchcraft) religions, so in Mormonism there is neither creator nor creation. The Mormon "gods" don't create but manufacture suns and worlds out of available materials.⁴¹ According to Joseph Smith, "God... never had the power to create the spirit of man" or anything else.⁴²

Mormonism's Restored Gospel of Atheism

Joseph Smith was a classical humanist atheist. He rejected the one true God of the Bible, and in His place proposed an infinite and ever-increasing number of self-made "gods" who had each once been a man. No Mormon "god" even pretends to be God in the biblical-classical sense: always God,⁴³ the only true God,⁴⁴ and Creator of everything that is.⁴⁵ As in classical occultism and atheistic humanism, the Mormon "gods" are "Ascended Masters" men who through initiation into ever-higher levels of secret knowledge have learned to apply universal laws and principles and have thereby become Masters over the forces of nature that have somehow always existed on their own.

Far from being omnipotent, omniscient, and omnipresent-as is the biblical God-the Mormon "God" is a highly evolved creature of the cosmos governed by these self-existent laws that are therefore greater than the "gods" themselves. To become this kind of a "god" through absolute obedience to The Brethren is the ambition of every Mormon male. This celestial existence can be achieved by recognizing that we are all gods-in-embryo and lifting ourselves up by our spiritual bootstraps. In the same terms that a thousand pagan myths have recited and modern occultists still employ, Mormon General Authority Milton R. Hunter gives this astonishing LDS definition of "the Gospel of Jesus Christ":

Our heavenly parents have through eons of time and a multitude of experiences gradually become acquainted and applied in Their lives an untold number of these everlasting laws.

As they learned these verities and how to operate them, these laws thereby became subject unto Elohim and henceforth were His laws-or, in other words, the Gospel of Jesus Christ.⁴⁶

Many sincere Mormons are not aware that: 1) the "godhood" they pursue in obedience to The Brethren will take "eons of time" to achieve at great effort and danger; and 2) once gained, it can be lost in a moment if they fail to perfectly obey the thousands of laws that govern Mormon "gods." Milton R. Hunter writes, "He became God by absolute obedience to all the eternal laws of the Gospel...."⁴⁷ The Mormon "god" is an ambitious man who has become a "white magician" through acquisition of occult powers and can as readily lose them.

The "god" of Mormonism is unquestionably not the God of Christianity and the Bible. Therefore, even if every prophecy Joseph Smith uttered came true (in fact, almost none did), the people of God would still be required to reject him. The very first mark of a false prophet in the Bible is that he entices people to follow "other gods" than the God of Israel.⁴⁸ Joseph Smith fits that description.

Today's world trembles under the threat of nuclear devastation and teeters on the brink of ecological, financial, and social collapse. We have been on a selfish binge that is destroying ourselves as God's creatures and the creation in which He has placed us. The theory of man's inherent goodness and infinite potential for good as a "god-in-embryo" hardly fits the rampant lust, jealousy, hatred, murder, rape, disease, hunger, war, and other sorrows and crimes that are a blight on planet Earth. A much better explanation would be that all of this horror and shame can be traced to the fact that we have almost six billion little counterfeit gods in the world. The only hope is to give up our rebellion and surrender to the one true God on His own terms.

Thousands of Mormons are doing exactly that, but not without a struggle. It is not an easy step to take. The Mormon Church offers a great deal of comfort and security, and to step away from all that and in the process see family and friends become enemies is more than anyone can bear without the comfort of the real Jesus Christ. Jolene became a Christian, and her Church-destroyed marriage to Greg has been restored. The family that encouraged her to leave Greg has now rejected her. Sadly, Jolene told us:

When I was growing up, my sisters and I were the best of friends and had a beautiful relationship. Since I've come out of the Mormon Church, however, my sisters and I have no relationship at all.

It's primarily because they're Temple Mormons, and one of the rules is that Temple Mormons can't associate with "apostates," which is what the Mormon Church calls me.

Although she knew that much was wrong with Mormonism, Janet went back "just one more time" to a Relief Society meeting. There she was reminded that she could become a "goddess." Hooked on that vain hope, she lingered for another three years of frustration. Finally she could keep up the pretense no longer. However, it seemed as though there was nowhere else to turn. "I believed," Janet told us, "that if the Mormon Church wasn't true, there was no true Church. I had one of those burning testimonies of the Mormon Church."

Doug and Janet were an ideal Mormon couple. Janet had been raised in the Church, and Doug had become a Mormon when he was 24 years old. "We were married in the Temple," Doug said, "and raised seven beautiful children as Mormons. I had served a stake mission and we were very happy in the Mormon Church." Then he learned of Janet's disillusionment and unhappiness, and of the person she had met who was telling her of the Jesus in the Bible—the Jesus that she realized for the first time was not the Jesus of Mormonism.

"This man told me how wonderful Jesus was and how He had changed his life," Janet related. "That really threw me. I had never heard a Mormon talk that way. We would talk about the Church, the organizations, and the Prophet, but this man talked about Jesus with such love as if he knew Him personally." Janet's story was like that of many others:

Reading the Bible, I began to understand it for the first time. I realized that the Bible was teaching something different from the Mormon Church.

That sent me into great despair. If the Mormon Church wasn't true, then we have been teaching a lie to our children all of their lives, and we were all doomed. I was beside myself with grief.

I remembered then that my Christian friend had encouraged me to ask Jesus into my heart. So I got down on my knees when I was all alone and did just that. I didn't know what I was doing, but something wonderful happened. I knew that I had been born again, and that salvation and eternal life are in Jesus Christ, not in an organization.

The joy I felt to know that Jesus had really come to live in my heart was inexpressible. I fell in love with the Bible also, and couldn't read it enough.

I sat down and wrote a letter to all of my Mormon friends, relatives, and everyone in the ward, telling them about Jesus. I immediately got a visit from the Bishop, who told me that if I didn't stop writing letters I would be excommunicated.

Her husband Doug's life was shattered when Janet became a Christian, even though until that time he would have argued that Mormons were Christians. Now he realized that Mormonism and Joseph Smith, not the Christ that Janet knew, were everything to him. Bewildered and angry at first, her family began to notice a tremendous change in Janet that intrigued and finally convinced them that they needed what she had found. It was long until she had won them all to Christ. Her eldest son told us:

I had been looking all my life for something in the Mormon Church. And I couldn't put my finger on what I was looking for. Now when my mom accepted Christ into her life, she shared it with me.

I saw a joy in her life that I had never seen before in all her activity in the Mormon Church. And this was what I needed.

The lawyers refused to file that class-action suit. They told Ed Decker and Dick Baer, "You've taken us to Kolob and back, but we don't think we could get a jury to accompany us. The Mormon Church has billions of dollars. You don't have the money to fight them through the courts."

At first, Ed and Dick were bitterly disappointed. However, it was out of that disappointment that the inspiration for the movie and for this book came. It was one way to tell the story, to explain the truth. At least now many thousands of people who might otherwise have been deceived will know what lies behind those sincere words and innocent smiles the next time two well-groomed and wholesome-appearing young men ride up on their bicycles, knock at the door, and pleasantly say:

Hello! We'd like to talk to you about the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints....

9 The Hebrew words for sin and sin offering are the same. The better rendering is obvious. Sin requires an offering and would therefore hardly be a hindrance to an offering. The problem wasn't that Cain had sinned, for this is true of all, but that he refused the sin offering that God had commanded and that was available.

Chapter 17 - A Time to Choose

- 1 From an October 8, 1854 Conference discourse in which he clearly stated that Adam is God. The Brethren have suppressed this, and it is presently located in the LDS Archives in order to persist in denying that Brigham Young taught the "Adam-God Doctrine." Although the Mormon Church has never published this sermon, others have. This quote was taken from Brigham Young 1854 (States West Publishing Co.: Scottsdale, AZ).

- An evil being obsessed with the dead.
- For a more complete explanation of these four lies and their place in Satan's overall strategy, see Dave Hunt, The Cult Explosion (Harvest House Publishers, 1980).
- Joseph Smith taught that black or dark skin is a curse from God upon the descendants of Cain for not fighting valiantly against Satan in the preexistence. This is an apparent reference to a similar judgment upon those who don't fight valiantly for polygamy.
- A photograph of this letter was discovered by Michael Marquardt in the George Albert Smith Collection at the University of Utah Library.
- Further contradictions arise here. Mormons believe that John the Apostle as well as three Nephite disciples of Jesus in America (3 Nephi 28:4- 12) never died, but remain to the present on earth. Where they have been hiding all these centuries, what value that is, and why with four Apostles on earth a total apostasy could have occurred requiring "restoration" from heaven is not explained.

For an in-depth analysis of the New Age Movement and its place in biblical prophecy, see Dave Hunt, Occult Invasion (Harvest House Publishers, 1997).

"This book reveals the subtle dangers of the fastest-growing religious cult in America. I believe every Christian should read it because no family is immune to this cult's deception."

HAL LINDSEY

Author of The Late Great Planet Earth

"The God Makers is a landmark book that is a must-read for anyone with a heart for Mormons. A clear, concise exposé regarding the truth of Mormonism."

DR. RON CARLSON

President, Christian Ministries International

Mormons claim to follow the same God and the same Jesus as Christians. They also state that their gospel comes from the Bible. But are they telling the truth? The God Makers, one of the most powerful books to penetrate the veil of secrecy surrounding the rituals and doctrines of the Mormon Church, has been updated to reveal the current inner workings and beliefs of Mormonism. Through personal interviews and well-documented evidence, you'll discover the true nature of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints and its hidden worldwide agenda.

Acknowledgments

Before this book, our contacts with the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints were limited but benign. One of us dated a woman who was a devout Mormon; the other was acquainted, through secular channels, with a senior member of the Church leadership, a man of considerable stature and integrity.

But books often take unexpected, even unwanted, turns.

In one of our last interviews, a respected Mormon historian asked us how the Church fared in our account. He obviously understood what we had come to understand—that there was much about the Mark Hofmann case the Church would prefer not to see in print.

We answered his question with another question: What is the Church? Is it the body of Mormon doctrine? If so, which doctrine—Mormon doctrine as currently held or Mormon doctrine as held at the time of the Prophet Joseph Smith? Or is it the current leadership of the Church, as most Church leaders maintain? Or is it the community of Mormons and the shared values that bind them together?

Each of these “churches” fares differently in our account.

This book is based largely on a series of interviews, most of which were conducted in Utah during nine months in 1987. Some were brief; some lasted days. No one was more generous with their time and recollections than Detectives Jim Bell and Ken Farnsworth of the Salt Lake City Police Department. We are also especially indebted to the members of the victims’ families: Scott Christensen, Joan Gorton, Heidi Sheets Jones, Terri Christensen Lauder, Joseph Robertson, Katie Sheets Robertson, Gary Sheets, Gretchen Sheets, and Jimmy Sheets, all of whom went out of their way to make us feel comfortable in a situation that had to be as awkward for them as it was for us.

In addition, we would like to thank Julius Andersen, Richard Anderson, Carl Arrington, Leonard Arrington, Brent Ashworth, John Ashton, Ralph Bailey, James Barber, Brent Bateman, Lary Ann Bateman, Don Bell, Curt Bench, David Biggs, Davis Bitton, Jill Brady, Cherie Bridge, Mike Bridge, Wilford Cardon, Mike Carter, Betty Lynn Davis, Gerry D'Elia, Duffy Diamond, Sue Dunster, Fred Esplin, Mildred Evans, Ralph Feurer, Peggy Fletcher, William Flynn, Dick Forbes, Ernie Ford, Jack Ford, Jane Forsgren, John Foster, Mike George, Jennie Glover, Demoin Gold, Don Gottfredson, Paul Grant, Rick Grunder, Charles Hamilton, Mark Haroldsen, John Harrington, John Heinerman, Charles Honts, Bob Jack, Lyn Jacobs, Franklin Johnson, John Johnson, Chris Jones, Kyle Jones, Grant Kesler, Faye Kotter, Leslie Kress, Don LaFevre, Dean Larsen, Wade Lillywhite, Richard Lindsay, Leo Lindsey, Bruce Lubeck, Paul Markosian, Richard Marks, Michael Marquardt, Brent Metcalfe, Jill Metcalfe, Thomas Moore, Eric Nielsen, Jorgen Olsen, Mike Orchard, Lynn Packer, Bruce Passey, Hal Passey, Robert Pitts, Daniel Rector, Kirk Rector, Janet McDermott, Randall Rigby, Kenneth Rigtrup, Al Rust, Gaylen Rust, Jeff Salt, Darlene Sanchez, Donald Schmidt, Jeff Simmonds, Connie Smith, Jack Smith, Nick Smith, Diane St. Thomas, Gregory St. Thomas, Stephanie St. Thomas, Robert Stott, Don Tanner, Jerald Tanner, Sandra Tanner, Paul Toscano, George Throckmorton, Dawn Tracy, Bradley Volmar, Wesley Walters, Brent Ward, Brooke Wells, David West, Bud Willoughby, Kenneth Woolley, Ron Yengich, David Yocom, Michael Zinman, and Mark Zobrist, as well as a dozen other people who asked that their names be withheld.

While the conventions of storytelling require that books on criminal cases focus on the efforts of a few key investigators, such cases are almost always solved through the efforts of many. The Hofmann case is no exception. Among those whose contributions deserve recognition are C. Larson of the B.Y.U. Police Department; Steven Bauer, Clive Barnum, Jo Ann Becker, Elliott Byall, Richard Chase, John Dehaan, Allan Galyan, Michelle Guthrie, Larry Hall, Jordan Lowe, Jerry Miller, James Newberry, Carl Newton, Edward Peterson, Steve Pirotte, Mary Riker, Marvin Rennert, Joyce Seymour, Robert Swehla, Jerry Taylor, James Thompson, and Frank Wandell of the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms; Philip Dinan of the Denver City Police Department; Scott Bakken, David Barker, Ned Christensen, Steve Clark, Calvin Clegg, Russell Dalrymple, Robert Gallacher, Richard Graham, William Hanes, Al Jacobsen, Morris James, Melvon Jensen, Terry Knowles, Theresa Mack, Dennis Molder, Stephen Moore, Rhead Richards, Donald Roberts, Don Rogers, Jeffrey

Sarnacki, William Walker, and Mark Wilson of the FBI; Paul Hardy, Rudy Reit, and Steve Sweeney of Utah's Office of the Medical Examiner; Craig Geslison of the Provo City Police Department; Steve Bartlett, Sam Dawson, Dick Forbes, Michael George, Jennie Glover, George Throckmorton, and Olin Yearby of the Salt Lake County Attorney's Office; Russ Adair, Chris A'Hearn, David Askerlund, David Aylor, Jim Bell, Jim Bryant, Don Cahoon, Joel Campbell, John Campbell, William Cawley, James Chandler, George Clegg, Billy Collier, Ray Dalling, Mike Davis, Steve Diamond, Ralph Evans, Ken Farnsworth, Jim Faraone, Mike Fierro, Mike Fithen, John Foster, Scott Foulger, Bob Gillies, Jim Grandpre, Bill Gray, Bo Grimes, Scott Hallock, Frank Hattonward, Sam Hemingway, Dave Hendrick, Mack Humphries, Jed Hurst, Jim Jensen, John Johnson, Kyle Jones, Kelly Kent, Joseph Kattenring, James Leary, John Longson, Edward Lyman, Doug Maack, Henry Mark, Scott Marks, Chris Martinez, Jerry Mendez, Louis Muniz, James Nelson, Nick Paloukos, Richard Parkin, Gordon Parks, Mark Peck, Oran Peck, William Peglau, Kim Plouzek, Morgan Sayes, Greg Smith, Doug Shupe, John Stoner, Veda Travis, Dan Varoz, Richard Walton, Scott Warensky, Dave Ward, Bud Willoughby, and Mark Zelig of the Salt Lake City Police Department; Glen Bailess, Fred Baird, Bart Bellon, Garth Beckstead, Vern Beesley, Dale Bullock, David Burdett, Dick Carlson, Dean Carr, Alex Churchich, Dennis Couch, Mike Crebbs, Barry Dalton, Ken Davis, Steve Debry, Gaylord Dent, Syd Elliott, Steve Fife, Dan Fletcher, Dennis Floto, Ben Forbes, Jim Glover, Jim Grant, Steve Grogan, Marv Hammer, Pete Hayward, Tube Horiuchi, Ron Huber, Robert Jack, Brian Jackson, Leigh Kilpack, Dennis Knudsen, Rex Nelson, Tim Nielson, Lloyd Prescott, George Sinclair, Dave Smith, John Terry, Jerry Thompson, Doug Townsend, and Larry Wadsworth of the Salt Lake County Sheriff's Office; Don Bird of the University of Utah Police Department; and John Graber of the Utah Highway Patrol.

In fairness, we should acknowledge those major players whom we were not able to interview. Shannon Flynn and Tom Wilding both demanded payment for interviews, a precedent we could not afford to set. LDS Church officials in the Public Communications Department were helpful in answering routine questions, but currently active Church officials uniformly denied us substantive interviews. Finally, despite the repeated assurances of his attorney, we were not able to interview Mark Hofmann prior to his first parole hearing on January 29, 1988—too late for our purposes.

However, we were able to supplement our own interviews not only with the massive record from the preliminary hearing but also with transcripts of interviews conducted by police and prosecutors with all of the principals, including Hofmann and Church officials.

We owe a debt of gratitude to a number of books, including Leonard J. Arrington's Brigham Young; Fawn M. Brodie's No Man Knows My History: The Life of Joseph Smith; Linda King Newell and Valeen Tippetts Avery's Mormon Enigma: Emma Hale Smith; and Robert Gottlieb and Peter Wiley's America's Saints: The Rise of Mormon Power. We benefited immeasurably from Jerald and Sandra Tanner's many publications, especially their principal work, Mormonism: Shadow or Reality? As a counterweight to the Tanners', we also used The Story of the Latter-day Saints, by James B. Allen and Glen M. Leonard, and The Mormon Experience, by Leonard J. Arrington and Davis Bitton.

In addition, we would like to thank the Sunstone Review for permission to reprint excerpts from its interview with Mark Hofmann.

For their herculean efforts in transcribing hundreds of hours of interviews, we thank all our typists, especially Mari Hoashi and Robert Kurilla. Our agent, Connie Clausen, read the book with her usual unerring eye, and our editors at Weidenfeld & Nicolson, John Herman and Dan Green, gave us that rarest of authors' rewards, genuine editorial support.

Wherever dialogue appears within quotation marks, it represents an exact transcription of a conversation as related by a participant. In a few instances involving Steve Christensen, the dialogue is based on the recollections of friends to whom Christensen related the conversation at the time.

Wherever dialogue exceeds a few lines, it is based on either a tape recording or a stenographic transcription. The sole exception is the conversation between Brent Metcalfe and representatives of LDS Church Security. There the dialogue is based on notes made by Metcalfe immediately following each session.

For obvious reasons, we have tried to make clear in the text those few instances where we have relied solely on the testimony of Mark Hofmann.

For a variety of reasons, we have felt it necessary to change the names of certain minor players in the Hofmann drama. Deborah Bowdoin, Brad Carter, Fred Harmon, Nancy Loden, Carl Lundquist, Eric Palmer, John Steiner, and Jill Stone are all fictitious names, as are Paradise Cove and Garden Park.

Blood Atonement

LTo her friends, she was the perfect Mormon. Generous, thoughtful, forgiving, community minded, she represented everything that was good and right about their unique religion. If only outsiders, who always seemed preoccupied with the Church's unusual doctrines, missionary zeal, and Victorian politics, could meet Kathy Sheets. Then they would understand the strength and appeal of the Mormon way of life.

She was certainly no ideologue. The Book of Mormon invariably put her to sleep. (Her children once gave her an audio cassette version to play in the car, but that proved dangerous as well as boring, so she gave it up.) When the "big questions" came up in conversation—Did a tribe of Israelites really cross the Atlantic and settle in America? Did Joseph Smith really discover gold plates on a hillside in upstate New York in 1823? Was he led there by an angel? Was the Book of Mormon really another gospel that belonged right beside the Old and New Testaments?—she let others fight over them. She preferred Agatha Christie's mysteries to Joseph Smith's, slept soundly even when she missed church, and, like the rest of the country, spent her Sunday evenings watching "Murder, She Wrote." Her only tie to the Mormon power structure was a passing friendship with Hugh Pinnock, an old college pal of Gary's, who had become a bigwig in the Church hierarchy. She considered him an insufferable, sanctimonious windbag. "He-you rhymes with P.U.," she would say.

Kathy's philosophy, if you could call it that, was summed up in the aphorisms she had carved on wooden plaques and nailed up around the kitchen and family room:

THE EARLY BIRD GETS ITS OWN BREAKFAST.

BE ALERT. THE WORLD NEEDS MORE LERTS.

FORGET THE DOG, BEWARE OF MEAN KIDS.

More than ideology, more than catechisms, the signs provided what she really needed in the morning: a good laugh.

She especially needed them this morning, the Tuesday after a long Columbus Day weekend in October 1985. Gary had run out the door at the ungodly hour of 6:50 to take Jimmy to volleyball practice. (Volleyball practice at seven in the morning!) Then Gretchen, her eighteen-year-old joy and heartache, had left separately in her own car. God only knew what crisis would befall her today. Kathy wondered how she had ever survived when there were four kids in the house.

WHEN YOU REACH THE END OF YOUR ROPE, TIE A KNOT AND HANG ON.

She took advantage of the sudden quiet to sit at the kitchen counter, treat herself to a Hershey's Chocolate Kiss, and slowly recover her sense of humor. Then she called her sister, Joan Gorton. This was her other joy in the morning. "The Lovely Sisters" they called themselves—they had seen the name on an old print in a New England hotel. They traveled together every chance they got. Kathy would always ask, "Are we sorry we didn't bring the men?" and the answer was always, "Not on your life."

Without the men, they could play. "Now Joan," Kathy would say in an airport lounge, "you have to look at all the men who come through here and find one that you could have an affair with. It has to be someone our age. It can't be some young stud." That made it a frustrating exercise. "He might be pretty good," she would say when a prospect approached, "but no. Look at his dumb shoes." And then they would laugh for the millionth time.

This morning, Kathy was bursting to tell all about her recent trip to New York City with Gary. But somehow the conversation slipped into a subject she didn't want to talk about at all: their mother.

She was living—if you could call it that—in a nursing home and waiting at that very moment, they could feel it, for one of them to visit. "You just dumped me here," she would say. It wasn't that they didn't love her, it was just so hard to see her lying in the nursing home like a dead leaf clinging to the end of a branch, waiting to be blown away. They would have preferred to see her living on her own, but that was out of the question. After the last operation, she had left some grease on the stove and burned her house down.

The conversation brought the usual rush of guilt—about not seeing her more often, about expecting her to die anytime. After her visits to the home, Kathy always arranged to stop at her daughter Heidi's house to play with her grandchildren. That invariably got her thinking about life again, instead of death.

Joan had to run. Lloyd, her husband, was waiting to take her to the Department of Motor Vehicles. She had let her driver's license expire. Kathy thought that sounded like something Gary would do. They both leaped at the opportunity to laugh. WHEN GOD CREATED MAN, SHE WAS ONLY KIDDING. Joan said she would call back when she returned. "There's still lots I haven't asked you about your trip," she said, signing off.

A few blocks away, Faye Kotter waited. Kathy was late for their morning walk. That wasn't terribly unusual. More than once, Faye, an attractive, athletic-looking woman with cinnamon hair, had walked over to the Sheets house and roused Kathy out of bed when she overslept or crept back into bed after the house emptied. Faye remembered another of Kathy's signs: THERE'S A CURE FOR A POOR MEMORY BUT I FORGET WHAT IT IS.

Maybe she was still mad about their argument the other day. Faye had come unglued when she heard that Kathy's daughter Gretchen was going to a school dance with a black classmate.

Kathy was shocked. "You mean to tell me that you, Faye. . . ."

"Listen," said Faye, suddenly on the defensive. "I have nothing against blacks. I don't have anything against any race. But I don't want my children dating them. I don't wish them ill, of course. I mean, I'm against slavery."

Foursquare against slavery, thought Kathy. How brave.

"I just don't know why she would want to do it," Faye said.

"Because he's a neat kid," Kathy ventured.

"I'm sure he's a neat kid."

The discussion had gotten pretty heated. But it wasn't like Kathy to hang on to something that way.

Maybe she was depressed again. The troubles at Gary's business, CFS—Coordinated Financial Services—had caught her off guard. One week she was jetting off in Gary's private plane and inviting friends to use the company condo in downtown Salt Lake City, the next week she was buying bread and cheese and "picnicking" in the park. In fact, she and Faye had planned to spend the Columbus Day weekend at a condo in California, but Kathy had to back out. "We don't have the money," she confessed. (Another company had picked up the tab for the New York trip.) It didn't help matters that finally, at fifty, her age was catching up with her: she was going through menopause.

Faye had been in the house yesterday when Gary called. All she heard Kathy say was, "When will it end?"

Whatever was holding Kathy up, Faye decided to take advantage of the delay to put in a load of wash. Just as she finished, about 8:25, Kathy appeared, hopping mad.

"I am so mad at him," she sputtered, flinging her furry beret onto the sofa, exposing her short, salt-and-pepper hair. "He makes me so mad." Tuesday was garbage-pickup day, and Gary had absentmindedly put the garbage where the dogs could get at it. And they did. Kathy had spent the last fifteen minutes putting trash back in the cans. "If Gary had only put it out where he was supposed to," she fumed, "this wouldn't have happened."

In her anger, she had grabbed her gray winter parka, too heavy by half for an autumn day that was overcast and cold—you could see your breath—but not freezing by Utah standards. Faye had put on two sweat shirts.

Kathy had also brought her car, the one with the license plate URP GAG. She obviously didn't want to walk around Naniloa that day, she wanted to drive to some other neighborhood and explore. Faye wondered if it had anything to do with Gary's speech in church the previous Sunday. She wasn't there, but by now it was all over the community. As bishop of his ward (a kind of lay minister), Gary had told the congregation, "I am going through some really hard times, and I just don't know how things are going to look financially. I have a lot to struggle with, and I don't know what's going to happen."

That, of course, started Kathy Sheets's telephone ringing. "We feel so bad for you and Gary. Can we help? What can we do?" It was all meant well, but it made Kathy squirm. "I just don't want people to feel sorry for me," she had said during their walk yesterday. On their return, a friend from up the street had approached Kathy and said, "I just have to give you a hug." Faye and Kathy looked at each other with the same thought: she had heard Gary's speech. She knew all about the problems Gary was having with CFS. Kathy wanted more than anything to avoid a repeat of that scene.

So they drove to the Cottonwood area, a fashionable suburb nearby, parked the car, and started walking. Kathy didn't talk much—a sure sign of depression. Normally, they never ran out of things to gab about. As they passed some of the big houses with the huge yards, Kathy finally said, "I wonder what the people in these houses are doing?" Faye remembered a conversation they had had months before in the same area when Kathy was her more buoyant self, before Gary's problems had weighed her down. "Can't you just picture the ladies sitting around having a luncheon after coming off the tennis court, having their shrimp cocktails and chattering. . . ." She had done a whole routine.

But this gray morning she had a different take on the big houses with the huge yards. "You walk along here and you wonder what is going on in people's lives. I bet it's not really as rosy as it looks. People drive by our place, and they say, 'Gary and Kathy have really got it made. They have a neat house and wonderful kids.'" She paused a long time before adding, "If they only knew." Knowing that Faye and her husband had been through difficult times a few years back, Kathy turned to her. "Tell me. How bad can it get?"

Remembering how supportive Kathy had been, Faye offered, "It always seems worse than it really is. Anything you are imagining in your mind—even if you lose everything—imagining it is worse than actually losing it."

That seemed to help, Faye thought, so she continued. "It's not the end of the world. It really isn't. You live through it. We think we're so attached to everything, but life goes on. And people forget. You are worried about what people think. Who cares what people think? They think what they think anyway. It doesn't really matter."

Faye wanted to say more, wanted to say the perfect thing, but she couldn't think of it. "It's a matter of just being here, I guess," she told herself.

They returned to Naniloa Drive about 9:25. Faye had to get to school. At age forty, she had gone back to college at the University of Utah. Before getting out of the car, she reached over and took Kathy's arm. "Hey, you going to be okay today?"

"Yeah."

Faye jumped out of the car with a cheery "See you tomorrow, it'll get better," but couldn't help feeling guilty. Kathy never stinted on the time she gave friends in trouble.

Instead of going home, Kathy pulled back out onto Holladay Boulevard and drove to the bank. The long holiday weekend and the trip to New York had left her without cash. On the return trip, she stopped at the entrance to the cul-de-sac and took the paper from the mailbox. As she pulled her red Audi into the garage, she saw a package halfway onto the wooden catwalk that led to the main house. She had been in such a hurry on her way out, mad at Gary, she must have missed it. She parked the car and walked around to pick it up.

She had just enough time to tuck it under her arm before it exploded.

A second later, shreds of her gray parka hung from the tree branches overhead.

It was the second bomb that morning. If Kathy Sheets had turned on the radio in her car, she would have heard the frantic news reports that were already throwing Salt Lake City into a panic.

2 “There’s been an explosion at the Judge Building, and there’s all kinds of people dead.”

The police dispatcher sounded like her chair was on fire. She had to be new on the job, Jim Bell thought. Dispatchers were usually the coolest of the cool. They prided themselves on their deadpan delivery: “Riot in Temple Square, forty-seven dead, Tabernacle on fire, possible UFO, see the officer.”

“All kinds of people dead?” Bell repeated to himself.

“There’s at least one dead,” she clarified, “but I think there’s a bunch more.” Bell guessed it was probably a boiler explosion, something like that.

“I don’t need this today,” he mumbled, tugging at his mustache, and then, to pacify the dispatcher, “Okay, okay, I’ll go on over.”

He really didn’t need it. He and his partner, Ken Farnsworth, were just coming off two lousy weeks. A homicide detective’s nightmare: decomposed body, no leads, probable transient. No one knew who killed him, and worse, no one cared. But they had solved it anyway. A bunch of the dead man’s fellow transients had gotten drunk and shot him four times in the head. It was a damn good piece of police work and still no one cared. Papers didn’t even mention it and TV. . . . The thought of Channel 5’s Eyewitness News team doing a live report on the decomposed bum was enough to make even Jim Bell smile, even this morning.

On the way to the Judge Building, Bell remembered that the dispatcher wasn’t a rookie. She was day shift. Not the kind to flinch at nothing. There might just be something to this explosion. When Farnsworth turned on the radio, it was already the number-one story in town. Then they turned left off Third South.

It was like driving off the edge of the world.

Every patrol car and fire engine from a fifty-mile radius had converged on the Judge Building. Policemen, firemen, emergency medics, and a roaming horde of news people. It was pandemonium, all right, but still not enough to agitate Jim Bell—until he saw the dog. It was sitting obediently in the back of a big airport truck that pulled up with all lights flashing and siren screaming. It was a bomb dog. That made Jim Bell's heart skip a beat. This wasn't any boiler explosion.

Inside the lobby, uniformed officer Jim Brand Preeney confirmed it. "It's a bombing, and it's definitely a homicide, and there's one guy dead upstairs," he told them. "You can't go upstairs because the bomb dogs and bomb techs are sweeping the whole building."

When the bomb crew gave the all clear, Bell and Farnsworth took the stairs to the sixth floor. (The elevator had been turned off. Someone said the bomber had been seen using it.) The hallway looked like a war zone. The walls were blown in, the ceiling blown down, and one door frame blown free of the wall. The door had blown off its hinges and dangled from the frame. The walls were pockmarked with shrapnel craters. Chunks of wallboard and ceiling tile were scattered everywhere. Bell whispered under his breath, "We're in deep shit."

The victim lay just inside the doorway, on his back, his hips rotated slightly to the right. He had a deep laceration in his chest area, and his face was covered with black soot and some blood. It would be hard to make a positive I.D. until the medical examiner cleaned him up. (Bell didn't want to rummage for a wallet for fear of disturbing the evidence.) The pants covering his right thigh had been ripped open by the explosion, and the leg underneath shone bright red in the harsh, artificial light. The tips of some of the fingers on his right hand had been blown off in the explosion. His right leg from the ankle down was badly mangled. The heel of his shoe, and of his foot, was missing.

Surrounding the body were two six-packs of crumpled Tab cans and the remains of a bag of doughnuts. The victim did not have good eating habits.

Bell and Farnsworth herded everyone else off the floor, strung yellow Do Not Cross tape, and commandeered an office at the opposite end of the hall as a control center. Within minutes, Bob Swehla, a thirteen-year man at the Federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms, showed up. All bombings are federal cases, ATF cases, so Farnsworth was uncharacteristically deferential. "What do you want to do, Bob?"

Swehla, like most ATF men, was a professional. None of this inter-agency rivalry crap. He was used to cooperating with local law enforcement. It was a rare bombing that didn't bend some local noses. The Salt Lake police would retain custody of the evidence; ATF would provide its laboratory.

Farnsworth manned the control center while Bell and Swehla laid out the bomb scene. They ran fluorescent tape in a grid and made a chart so they could note with coordinates where each piece of evidence was found. They took Polaroids of the entire area, dozens of them. Bell drew a diagram of the floor plan. Each time he picked up a piece of evidence, it had to be labeled and a corresponding label placed on the map. He started with the big pieces: bomb parts, sack parts, cardboard box parts from the device, batteries, wires, chunks of plaster, bits of acoustic tile from the ceiling, shards of plastic from the overhead lights. Just the easy stuff took two and a half hours.

Meanwhile, they tried to identify the body. The office where the bomb went off had recently been rented by Rigby-Christensen, Inc., a small consulting company. Eyewitnesses placed Steve Christensen, one of the firm's principals, in the hall at the time of the explosion. But Bell needed a positive I.D. About ten, Shane Jones, a fellow officer and part-time male model who happened to know Christensen, provided it.

"Is it Christensen?" Bell asked.

Jones forced himself to look. "I can't tell for sure. It sure looks like him." Then his handsome face clouded over. "I'm sure that's Steve. His face is messed up, but that's his hair color; it's his size. I'm sure it's him."

Still, Bell didn't announce the victim's name officially until 1:30, when the body was finally moved and the wallet taken out of his pocket. Farnsworth followed the body to the medical examiner's office for the autopsy.

Now, with the body gone and the scene to himself, Bell could really get to work. With a magnifying glass in one hand and tweezers in the other, and a supply of plastic bags and vials, he got down on his knees and resumed the search.

For Jim Bell, this was almost heaven.

Heaven would have been standing knee-deep in a smelly bog somewhere along the shores of the Great Salt Lake at five on a frosty morning in November, waiting, 12-gauge shotgun in hand, often for hours at a stretch, for that rustle in the underbrush or that commotion in the sky, that moment when you raise your gun, aim, and bring down a big one. Duck, that is.

Jim Bell was a duck hunter.

The boys in the department got a lot of mileage out of that. "Hey, you know the only way to give Bell a hard-on?" they would joke. "Quack!"

During college at Weber State, Bell had gone duck hunting every day during the season, scheduling his classes so that he wouldn't miss a single frigid morning in the swamps of the Ogden Bird Refuge. When he married, his wife Patti found 250 ducks in his deep freezer, dressed and ready to cook.

But jokes or no jokes, everyone agreed that duck hunters made great cops. "When you do surveillance work, you want duck hunters because they're the only people who can sit still all day and not get bored," his fellow detectives would say. "They're used to it. They don't have any brain waves. They're perfectly content looking over the horizon for a speck in the sky." Bell himself admitted that duck hunting was for "slow people," people who could wait, people with patience and persistence, people who kept their own pace.

That was Jim Bell.

His parents had found that out early—to their dismay. Unlike most of the cops in his department who came from cop families, Bell was a crossover from the real world. His father was an executive with the Steelcase Corp., his brother also a prosperous businessman. Jim was supposed to follow in their footsteps, but he had his own ducks to hunt.

Being the only cop in the family didn't faze Jim. Nothing fazed Jim. It didn't even faze him when fellow detectives called him "Stretch"—an arch reference to his height, five feet, seven inches. As the shortest in his family, he was used to ribbing. He just kept at it, calmly ignoring the jokes, pursuing the cases—the more tedious, the more complicated, the more elusive, the better.

Like the murders of several young women in the Salt Lake area: they seemed unrelated at first, just random murders without rape. But the M.O. was precisely the same, and Bell was convinced a serial murderer was responsible. So he began his methodical pursuit, canvassing police departments across the country for similar crimes, similar M.O.s, anything that might tie in to his killer. He called agencies in Utah, Colorado, New Mexico, and Wyoming and brought officers from all the jurisdictions together for a meeting. Right away, two murders in Wyoming were solved. One of the cops had interviewed a man in a jail in Nephi, Utah, who confessed to killing two people in Wyoming.

That was the way Jim Bell liked to work: slowly, meticulously, patiently, tenaciously. He might have to spend all day wading through a swamp, but he had 250 ducks in the freezer to show for it.

So Bell moved slowly across the floor on his knees, picking up every fragment of evidence with tweezers and putting it in a plastic bag or a vial or a paper bag and carefully pinpointing its location on his map. In the end, there were 164 items on the floor plan: among them, pieces of wire, an Estes rocket igniter, and a mercury switch.

When that was done, he cut away pieces of the carpet and put them in plastic bags. Residue from the bomb powder was sealed in paint cans. Then he tore the hall apart looking for shrapnel. The bomb had been packed with two-and-a-half-inch carpentry nails—this bomber meant to kill—and the force of the explosion had driven them into walls, through the ceiling, and deep into the subflooring. Bell dug out as many as he could, using a huge pair of pliers on the stubborn ones, and left the rest. With a broom, he swept up small pieces of debris, and then used a vacuum cleaner to suck up anything he might have missed. Then he went back over the key areas with a magnifying glass for one last look.

Then, just to be sure, he arranged to have a search warrant issued for Christensen's office. They hauled away fourteen filing cabinets, a computer system, and fifty cardboard boxes full of materials. Eventually, he would have to wade through all that as well.

At 10:15 that night, after more than twelve hours, most of them spent on his knees, Jim Bell returned to his office to begin the paperwork.

3 For anyone else, the autopsy of Steve Christensen's body would have been a nightmare. In the time it usually took to complete the exam, Dr. Steve Sweeney, the state's chief medical examiner, hadn't even cleaned away the coagulated blood in order to see what he was doing. Pieces of evidence had to be pried out of the cavern where a chest should have been: lengths of wire, bomb parts, bits of a battery, and huge jagged shards of metal pipe. One piece proved particularly reluctant. It had entered through the chest and lodged under the armpit, where it bulged up beneath the skin, pressing the body out of shape. And there were nails everywhere. Some had gone in sideways, others straight, like arrows. One had entered through the left eye and lodged in the brain. That, at least, had killed him instantly.

For Farnsworth, gore was just a part of the game. His stomach for "goo spots" was legendary—not just dead bodies, not just decomposed dead bodies, but goo spots—bodies that have been left so long that they don't even look like bodies anymore, but more like puddles of slime. In the never-ending police search for litmus tests of machismo, tolerance for goo spots ranked high, and Ken Farnsworth held the departmental record.

Autopsies were his forte. One photograph that made the rounds showed the medical examiner cutting a body with one hand and holding his nose with the other while Ken leans over the rail, chin in hand, utterly fascinated, filling his nostrils with the experience. Someone had posted a cartoon on the wall showing two vultures sitting on the carcass of a dead hippo. "What could be better?" says one vulture to the other. "A hot day and a bloated body."

But the boys in the department had it all wrong. It wasn't the goo spots themselves that made Ken's day. It was the thrill they gave him—the sheer adrenaline rush he got from staring at something so horrible, so repulsive, so shocking.

It was the same rush he used to get as a patrolman. He loved the "controlled chaos" of patrol work, never knowing what was going to hit you next. He still told the story (a way of reliving the rush) about his brush with death—the ultimate adrenaline high. It was early morning, that last bleary-eyed hour before the end of an all-night shift. He had been on the force only eighteen months and was headed back to the station when he heard some shots just outside the Beehive Buck Club, a black hangout in downtown Salt Lake. He pulled around by the Greyhound bus terminal and waited for backup. At the end of an alley, he heard some arguing and saw two silhouettes dipping and dodging behind a pickup truck. He got out of his car, carrying a 12-gauge shotgun.

Then he did something only a rookie would do. He called out after them. They ducked out of sight, and he ran after them down the half-lit alley. When he got to the corner, he stepped out from behind a brick wall, completely exposing himself. Ten feet away, one of the men was standing there screaming at two others who were behind the pickup. He was holding a 410-bore shotgun, but it was pointing down.

It was a classic "shoot/don't shoot" situation. A split-second decision. If he shot, it would be to kill. That was the rule. Only cops on TV shoot to maim. The regulation was three shots: two in the chest, can't miss; then one in the head, no surprises. Farnsworth wanted to reverse the order, to shoot the guy in the face. No. A shotgun shoots high. Hit him in the throat. That can't fail. A shotgun blast from a 12-gauge, and he's history.

The gun was racked in, cocked, safety off, ready to blast off. If the guy moved that 410 even slightly, Farnsworth would blow his head off. No time for a warning. The 410 started to move up. Farnsworth's inner alarm said, "Shoot!"

But nothing happened. Something inside stopped his trigger finger at the last nanosecond.

He had gotten the same rush when he worked undercover for seven months in Utah's first sting operation. That was one long adrenaline high, from the time he walked into a meeting with one of the nastiest drug dealers in the Southwest, fully wired, and the guy started to frisk him, to the time a crazy lady, strung out on cocaine, held him at knife point. It got so bad—or good—that he was actually sleeping with his hand on a gun on his nightstand. After that, homicide duty, with its goo spots, was a definite comedown.

He still got the old rush from shooting his gun. Although the product of a solid police family (three relatives on the force), Farnsworth didn't fire a shot until he was twenty-two. But once he started, he couldn't stop. He loved the noise, the jerk of the recoil, the little black hole in the target a split-second later. He fired off twenty thousand rounds a year to maintain his standing as one of the top 100 marksmen in the country. His wall full of trophies had earned him the nickname—everybody on the force had a nickname—"Trophy Boy."

He got the same rush from women. Not from women per se, but from dating them, dating new ones as often as possible, dating two or more at a time. He never seemed to run out of them. At six feet, three inches tall and 150 pounds, with a sharp wit, remarkable intelligence, and winning grin, Farnsworth was that rarest of commodities in marriage-mad Utah, an attractive bachelor over thirty. And he had every intention of staying that way. Friends attributed it to his two years in France when he was a younger man. Despite his own family's rather loose Mormon affiliation, he had gone on a mission to convert the French to Mormonism, and instead had been converted to everything French: French food, French wine, French women, even French philosophy. Somehow the Mormon ideal of wife, family, and hearth had never looked as good to him since he had seen Paris.

Besides, there was no rush in family life. "If they just gave me bed and food," Farnsworth would say of police work, "I'd work here for nothing."

He left the autopsy room at University Hospital about six that evening and headed back to the department carrying the blood-covered nails, wires, and clothing in paper bags. He arrived in time to catch some details of the other bombing that day, the one at the Sheets residence in Holladay. That one happened in the county, not the city, so it wasn't their problem, thank God. They had enough on their hands. He also saw his boss, Chief Bud Willoughby, on the evening news trying to calm a panic-stricken city that had already been dubbed "the Beirut of the West."

A huge man with big, clear eyes, startling energy, and rare patience, Willoughby had cop in every capillary of his bloodline: father, brothers, even his mother was a cop. That probably explained his gut approach to crime solving. He had no ideology, no fancy theories. His only rule was "Whatever it takes is what it takes." If his men needed more money, more manpower, even more time to do a job, he fought for it. He had even been known to consult hypnotists and psychics when all else failed.

If Willoughby had a flaw, it was overeagerness, especially when dealing with press and public. No one would forget his efforts to calm the city, especially its tiny black community, when two black joggers were killed. The murders are not racially motivated, he announced confidently. That turned out to be dead wrong. The murders had, in fact, been committed by an avowed white racist, Joseph Paul Franklin. Willoughby was forced to eat his words—in court no less—when the defense attorney called him to the stand.

Now he was at it again.

The bomb that killed Kathy Sheets was meant for her husband Gary, Willoughby explained. Both he and Steve Christensen were officers in an investment company, Coordinated Financial Services. Recently, CFS had lost a lot of money, and a lot of its investors were mad about it—mad enough to kill. Obviously, they had hired professionals, Mafia types, to do the job. The bombs were sophisticated devices, undoubtedly the work of paid assassins.

There was no crazed bomber on the loose randomly killing passersby, Willoughby concluded reassuringly. This was strictly business. To emphasize the point, Captain Bob Jack of the sheriff's office held up an inch-thick computer readout of three thousand CFS investors and said, "Here are the suspects in the case."

That sounded fine, but Farnsworth hoped this didn't turn out to be another of Willoughby's faux pas.

Farnsworth went home about 4:30 the next morning and grabbed an hour and a half of sleep. Jim Bell, who had come into the office around ten P.M., stayed the rest of the night, although at one point he lay down under the table and closed his eyes for a few minutes.

4 J. Gary Sheets, a gray-haired man with soft, friendly features and dark eyes, stood in the pandemonium of the Salt Lake County Sheriff's Office in Holladay and cried. "We think it was a professional hit man, Gary," a homicide detective tried to tell him. "A disgruntled investor in your company, probably." Kathy's killing had been a mistake: the bomb had been intended for him. Somebody wanted both him and Steve Christensen dead. Until a few months ago, when he left to form his own consulting firm, Christensen had been the president of Sheets's company, CFS.

A few minutes later, the detective overheard Sheets telling a friend, "I did it. My friend's dead and my wife's dead because of a situation I got them into."

Visitors came and went and he hugged each one and cried some more. Church leaders called and so did Senator Orrin Hatch—Sheets had worked on his last campaign. Hatch gave his condolences and said he had called the head of the FBI and told him to "Get those bastards." Sheets repeated the story to everyone who came in after that. He seemed untouched by the police warnings—"A professional hit isn't paid until the job's done." The killer would try again. But he welcomed the company of the bodyguard assigned by the sheriff's office, a policeman who had once moonlighted at CFS.

Strangely, Sheets wanted to know about the condition of the bodies: "Is it true that the blast took off the upper portion?" he asked Lieutenant Ben Forbes of the homicide division. "Is it true that it literally cut Steve's body in half?"

"I didn't see the body," said Forbes, "but that's what I understand."

"Is that about the same way Kathy was found?"

"I'm really not sure, Mr. Sheets, but I am sure that your wife didn't suffer at all."

Then suddenly Sheets's mind was in another place. He looked at the can of Cherry Coke in his hand. "This is going to be the biggest seller that Coca-Cola has," he said with genuine wonder. "This Cherry Coke is really going to sell. This is going to be the biggest seller ever."

Fifty years earlier, a towheaded little boy edged nearer a coffin, trying to get a look at the beautiful, serene young blond woman inside. He understood only vaguely why she was there and why she was so still. When Doc Gledhill slipped into the back of the crowded parlor to pay his respects, the little boy ran to him and hugged his leg. "Please bring back my mommy," he cried. "Please bring back my mommy!"

The boy was Gary Sheets. He was three years old.

There was no father for Gary to hug. Lloyd Sheets, a traveling salesman, had passed through Richfield, a small town in southern Utah, only long enough to fall in love with and marry a beautiful blond girl named Iris Peterson. He was the first man who had paid much attention to her. Despite her beauty, boys had avoided the local lame girl with the withered leg, a legacy of childhood polio. But Iris Peterson was an incurable optimist. Instead of dating, she learned to play the mandolin, the ukelele, and the banjo. And when Lloyd Sheets left her, soon after their son Gary was born in 1934, she set her sights on business college, polio or no.

She was on her way there when she contracted pneumonia and died.

Three months after taking in his orphaned grandson, George Peterson, a local businessman, died of a heart attack. That left Gary and his grandmother Eva.

It was Gary's first partnership. Before long, he was doing her taxes, managing her property, and running the businesses George had left her. Spurred on by his mother's Mormon faith, his father's salesman genes, his grandmother's relentless optimism—"You can do anything you want to do," she exhorted him—and the memory of the blond woman in the coffin, he started running and never stopped.

In college, he sold rattraps to farmers. Then he moved up to encyclopedias. His Sigma Chi fraternity brothers at the University of Utah used to joke there was nothing Gary Sheets couldn't sell. In the world's oldest profession, he was a natural. A salesman, not a hustler. Someone who says, "I really believe in this product," not "Here's an opportunity to con some people." Someone, in the words of an associate, who "cons himself first."

Then he tried selling real estate and fell on his face. The problem was that he couldn't work over the phone, in an office, across a desk. He was, at heart, a direct salesman. He had to be there, with the client, hands-on—hugging, grasping, touching, stroking. He had to put his arm around the customer, wrap him in that warmth, that optimism, that guileless sincerity. Let him do that, and there was nothing he couldn't sell. So he went back to encyclopedias, door to door, and the income poured in again, enough to buy a first house for his young bride, Kathy Webb, whom he had almost refused to marry because she wasn't blond.

Insurance was next, working for an old fraternity brother, Hugh Pinnock, who was smart enough to know a good thing when he saw it. But insurance was too easy for a natural like Gary Sheets. By the 1960s, the action was in securities so he went after a securities license. Pinnock, who had ambitions of his own, found the competition from his brightest young salesman too hot for comfort and told him that if he moonlighted in securities, Connecticut Mutual would have to let him go. But there was no stopping Gary Sheets. In 1966 he turned in his resignation and set up his own brokerage agency. For anyone else, it would have been an unnerving gamble, a leap into the unknown, but Gary didn't even blink. He knew it would work.

Within two years, he had sold so many securities to so many clients that he was ready to move into another new area: total financial planning. That's where the really big money is, Gary said. He wanted to be where the sales were hottest. After only three years with a big, Atlanta-based company, he was ready to strike out on his own again. With two friends, he formed his own financial services company: Coordinated Financial Services.

Nothing could stop him now. Not even timid partners. In 1975 he was ready to expand to meet the market demand, but his partners balked. They weren't naturals. They weren't blessed with Gary's boundless optimism. So one day, they locked themselves in an office and knelt down to pray. Then they began dividing the company. At the end of the day, they called in an attorney to add the boilerplate to the deal that God had made.

Gary Sheets and CFS were now on their own.

It was beautiful to watch. In ward houses and on college campuses throughout Utah, Nevada, Colorado, and Texas, there was Gary Sheets, in his blue suit, red tie, and white starched shirt "talking sense" about investments. Part teacher, part cheerleader, part seducer, he talked profits and portfolios the way Moses talked milk and honey. He would lead them out of the Wilderness of taxes, over the River of deductibility, and into the Promised Land of high returns. You could practically hear the audience gasp. They were mostly doctors, drummed up with an extensive advance promotional campaign, including good word of mouth on the Mormon grapevine.

Not everyone there was Mormon. Gary kept a copy of The Best Doctors in the U.S. on his desk, making extensive marginal notes beside the names of prominent individuals, knowing that for every one of the big fish he could attract, a school of M.D.s would follow. "Physicians are suckers for scams," said a CFS employee, using language Gary would never have used. "They've got a lot of money and very little time to manage it. So they get very excited, overly excited, by high rates of return."

They couldn't wait to give Gary their money.

These investment seminars, offered free throughout the Southwest, became the lifeblood of CFS. At the end of a lecture, Gary would hand out business cards to anyone who wanted the lecturer's expertise "on a more personal and permanent basis." Out of a typical audience of sixty or seventy, usually twelve or more would sign up. Then those clients would bring in other clients. The money poured in like the Red Sea on the armies of Pharaoh.

Sheets hired a brigade of bright young men to help invest the money, syndicate deals, form partnerships, and manage properties: men like Steve Christensen, an eager, inexperienced twenty-eight-year-old who quickly became Gary's "boy wonder." More deals demanded more salesmen to bring in more money to fund more deals. It seemed that God truly was with him. Sheets turned the day-to-day management over to others so he could concentrate on sales and on reaching his new personal goal: $1 million in commissions—$10 million in sales. The new men, like Christensen, were all "high-quality people," as Gary liked to say, all active in the Mormon Church. By the early eighties, CFS had grown from two employees to 120, total syndications to almost 150, net worth to $6 million. The internal rate of return was running at a stratospheric 30 percent. To congratulate itself, the company bought the old Auerbach's Department Store building downtown and converted it, sparing no expense, into a gleaming new "headquarters" where the men were always handsome, the secretaries always "immaculately decked out," the plants always green, the restrooms always clean, and the receptionists always answered the phone cheerfully.

Even the building, where salesmen (they were called consultants) brought admiring clients, was a sharp investment. According to John Naisbitt's megaseller, Megatrends, Salt Lake City was one of the country's "top ten growth areas." Among the others who thought so was Adnan Khashoggi, the Saudi billionaire. His Triad America Company had just bought a huge chunk of downtown with plans for an immense new multi-use development. With new corporate offices for American Express, Sperry-Rand, and Western Airlines just opening up, downtown Salt Lake City was taking off the way Denver had ten years before. It was heady company for Gary Sheets's CFS, but anything seemed possible.

By 1983 Gary was earning $600,000 a year in commissions. It wasn't yet his goal of $1 million, but it was enough to build a beautiful rambling house by a fast-running creek in the toniest section of the tony suburb of Holladay. It was enough to buy fistfuls of season tickets to Utah Jazz basketball games, and to buy himself a seat on the board of the Utah Symphony—no one seemed to care that he didn't know anything about music. It was enough to give tens of thousands away to charities of every stripe, including $10,000 to the Osmond Foundation, set up by the singing Osmond family to benefit children's hospitals (a gift for which they made him chairman of the foundation). It was enough to merit glowing profiles in Church-owned publications like the Deseret News and evenings with Orrin Hatch, one of the many Republican politicians whose campaigns he supported generously.

But the choicest recognition came from even higher up. In April 1983, the same year he made $600,000, Gary Sheets was "called" by God to serve as a bishop in the Mormon Church. And there were whispers that one day, if his star continued to rise (and his fortune continued to accumulate), Gary Sheets might become a General Authority.

5 In 1837, a newspaper editor in Kirtland, Ohio, criticized Joseph Smith and the local Mormon community for "hav[ing] too much worldly wisdom connected with their religion—too great a desire for the perishable riches of the world—holding out the idea that the kingdom of Christ is to be composed of 'real estate, herds, flocks, silver, gold,' etc., as well as of human things."

On a cool Southern California night almost 150 years later, prosperous Mormons from all over the Los Angeles area filled a meeting hall in Pasadena. They had come from as far away as La Jolla to hear G. Homer Durham, a member of the First Quorum of the Seventy, address his fellow saints. Only the Council of the Twelve, known as the Apostles, and the three members of the First Presidency, including the Prophet, were more exalted. Together, these eighty-five men who governed the Mormon Church were known as the General Authorities.

When Durham spoke, he spoke with true authority, authority rooted in both this world and the next. His opposition to liberal politics, to the ERA, and to Democrats in general was well known and widely admired among the faithful. Many thought: If only the men in Sacramento or Washington had such vision.

The subject of the sermon tonight was money. Not the evils of money, but the joys. The sixty-nine-year-old Durham praised local Church members both for their devotion to God and for their balance sheets. He congratulated them not just because of their good works, which were considerable, but also because they belonged to one of the most affluent stakes in Mormondom. That, said Durham, was a direct reflection of God's favor, a sign that the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints was, in fact, the true Church of Christ on earth.

At each accolade, the crowd squirmed deeper and deeper into the comfortable seats. Elder Durham had apparently failed to see, scattered among the $400 suits and designer dresses, a considerable number of darker faces wearing clothes from Sears and K mart, most of them recent immigrants from Mexico and other Central American countries. After the speech, the word was discreetly passed to Temple Square in Salt Lake City: please don't send us G. Homer Durham again.

Durham wasn't wrong, he was just too blatant. Everyone knew that the Church equated bank accounts and blessings; that, as one Church official put it, "The accumulation of wealth" was "a sacred obligation." Why else would God call only successful businessmen to positions of authority? Why else would Church publications so relentlessly profile Mormon success stories like George Romney, J. Willard Marriott, and the Osmonds? Why else would the Church be so ironfisted about tithing, the rule that every good Mormon give 10 percent of his income to the Church?

Everyone knew where these vast sums of tithing money went. Not to orphanages or old-age homes or hospitals. Not to young missionaries in the field—they were generally expected to pay their own expenses. Not to welfare or disaster relief. In times of crisis, Mormons were expected to look to one another for help, not to the Church's tithing chest.

Everyone knew that Church money went into the Church's business, which was business: television stations, newspapers, banks, farms, ranches, real estate, and a stock portfolio to match that of the government of Saudi Arabia. The Church was, in fact, a giant conglomerate, freed by its religious, “nonprofit” status from both reporting requirements and taxes.

God had indeed been generous with his favor—from $15 billion to $50 billion generous, depending on who did the estimating. Whatever it was, it was a truly inspirational figure. More than a few of the Brethren agreed with Durham that “if [the Church] is rich, it must be true,” and must eventually triumph over other churches. Fifty billion compounded at 9.2 percent, tax free. In a few hundred years, the Mormon Church wouldn’t need to convert the world, it would own the world.

With the Lord on his board, there was nothing Gary Sheets couldn’t do. What worked for real estate, the bulk of CFS’s investments, would undoubtedly work for other investments as well. Besides, good real estate deals were getting harder to find. Investors were eager to branch out into new areas. If CFS didn’t oblige them, some other outfit would. The magic word became “diversify.” Soon Gary Sheets, encyclopedia salesman, was doing deals in alternative fuels, gold mines, airplanes, horse-breeding farms in Kentucky, and express lube shops in Las Vegas.

Instead of hiring people with expertise, Gary sent his able young men in their starched white shirts and Temple garments out on week-long “get-acquainted” trips. When they returned, they became in-company experts, each with his own pet project. Somebody thought solar energy looked promising, so CFS bought $700,000 worth of solar panels. The plan was to rent them out to heavy users of electricity, meter their usage, and charge only 70 percent of what the big utilities charged. It sounded fail-safe. Rich James, CFS’s president, had seen a high-tech waterslide, or “hydrotube,” at a mall in Portland, Oregon, and thought it was “neat.” So CFS syndicated a $750,000 investment in a similar slide for a mall in Denver. They bought airplanes—a Citation and a Lear—for a million and a half. Nobody knew anything about planes, but a good Mormon pilot, Brent Bateman, told them they could make a killing by leasing the planes to companies like Purolator and stars like Robert Redford. Their eyes twinkled.

One of CFS’s salesmen put the company in touch with John Steiner, the son of the salesman’s bishop and a missionary companion. Steiner had a Thoroughbred breeding farm in Kentucky that he was syndicating. Investors could buy a piece of a stud, and each time it bred—about forty times a year on average—they would get a piece of the fee, plus a tax break (if they borrowed) and depreciation. A CFS entourage went to Kentucky to see for themselves—and, as long as they were there, take in the Kentucky Derby.

They liked what they saw. Steiner was just the kind of guy CFS admired: so young, so good looking (in the white-bread, Midwestern insurance man way that so many Mormons are), so all-American, so Mormon. His operation was first class: fancy hotel, fine restaurant, a huge house with a swimming pool and a beautiful wife. And the guy was only thirty-three. CFS officers bought into the deal and came away thinking: Yet another gilt-edged investment found through the Mormon network. It had to be divine intervention.

Eric Palmer, a former mortician or shoe salesman, depending on whom you spoke to, introduced Gary and CFS to the wonders of ethanol, a gasoline substitute distilled from grain. The numbers were staggering. Because the government offered an 11 percent alternative-energy tax credit on top of the usual 10 percent investment tax credit, an investor could put $10,000 into an ethanol plant, borrow $90,000, and get $21,000 in tax credits the first year. So you could actually make money by investing. Then every year after that, you took out $10,000 in profits and saved $10,000 in taxes. This was truly a deal made in heaven.

Just to be sure, CFS sent a private investigator down to Portales, New Mexico, where Palmer already had one plant in operation. But when the investigator returned with grave doubts about Palmer's reliability, CFS officers were too busy fighting one another over who would get what cut of the action to notice. (Gary grabbed much of it for himself.) Besides, Kirk Rector, who put the deal together, was a smart, hard-working, young Mormon—the son of a General Authority, no less. Within a few months, CFS had plans for five ethanol plants in the works.

Meanwhile, the company continued to acquire commercial property despite a softening market. The men responsible for bringing properties into the company continued to pitch them—they made their commissions whether or not a property subsequently made money—and Gary continued to buy, sometimes over the objections of his own acquisitions board. After all, he had the magic touch.

But even if there were a few doubting Thomases, Gary Sheets was hardly the only officer who felt that CFS couldn't fail.

At a meeting to discuss the acquisition of a property called Paradise Cove, John Conrad, a young Mormon salesman who had only recently joined the company, looked at the projections and scratched his head. "What's wrong with me?" Conrad wondered. "This property is a dog. Why do I look at these numbers and see absolutely no purpose for anyone to buy it? What have I missed?"

The numbers showed a $52,000 investment that after five years, even if one accepted the projections—a true act of faith—would repay only $54,000 in a cash sale. "Why was this property purchased?" Conrad asked at the next meeting. "I am apparently missing something. Can somebody explain it to me? Why would I want to buy this thing? Two thousand over $50,000 over five years?—according to your figures. No cash flow in the interim. A little tax savings, but no profitability."

"We stole this property," said the man from the real estate committee. "We bought it cheap."

"Then I assume you're planning to sell it cheap," said Conrad, "because these numbers don't show the windfall return we should expect if we're buying it cheap. What am I missing?"

Just then, Steve Christensen walked in.

Someone said, "Steve, you were down there, explain it. Tell us about Paradise Cove."

"We stole it," said Christensen.

"Can you elaborate?" asked Conrad, still calm. "Where is that reflected in the numbers?"

Just then Tom Heal walked in. Christensen turned to Heal. "Tom. Tell us about Paradise Cove."

"We stole it," said Heal.

Perhaps they believed, Conrad thought, that if they said it often enough, that would make it true.

When an early real estate project went into bankruptcy, it wasn't a mistake, it was merely a "setback." To prove it, CFS resyndicated the property, Garden Park, signing on new investors to bail out the old ones. When profits started slipping, the company merely increased its share in partnership investments, from 2 percent to 3 percent.

When salesmen like Conrad started asking too many questions, Gary decided that the solution was to give them less information. What they really needed was more positive thinking. More faith. "If you give them facts," a company attorney warned him, "all they'll do is ask questions. They're not smart enough to understand the deal anyway. You put the deal together, and just don't tell them any more than you have to. Just go in and sell them the deal. Then you go run it and make it a success."

At a meeting to sell the Garden Park resyndication scheme to the salesmen, Conrad raised his hand again: "Gary, give us some facts. Give us some numbers. I haven't heard anything said that would convince me that this is a good investment. And please don't give me a sales job. No more hype."

Gary stood up, pointed his finger at Conrad, and said, "John. I have to do a sales job on you, because you're so damned stupid you can't recognize the best investment your clients will ever put their money into."

End of discussion. How do you challenge someone who has been called by God? "We were dealing with prominent members of the Church," says Conrad, a devout Mormon. "I admit that I put some faith in that. I felt that these guys were trying to do what was right. I knew I wasn't associated with a bunch of crooks."

6 The good Mormons of Kirtland, Ohio, undoubtedly told themselves the same thing when Joseph Smith, Prophet and founder of the Church, opened a bank.

Smith knew a good thing when he saw it, and in 1836, the best thing by far was land speculation. With the westward drive, land values were shooting up at such a frenzied rate that fortunes could be made virtually overnight. By the mid-thirties Smith had already spent every dollar he had buying up land around the Mormon community in Kirtland, hoping that a railroad would run a line somewhere across his property and make him a rich man. When he ran out of his own money, he started looking for other people's money to use. The best way to attract money, of course, was to open a bank, and in 1836, coincidentally, the Lord commanded him to do just that.

There was just one problem: you had to have money to open a bank. Never a stickler for details, Smith went out and borrowed the money to open the Kirtland Safety Society Bank and have plates made up for printing the currency the bank would issue. To assure depositors that their money would be secure, he filled several strong boxes with sand, lead, old iron, and stones, then covered them with a single layer of bright fifty-cent silver coins. Prospective customers were brought into the vault and shown the heaping chests of silver. "The effect of those boxes was like magic," claimed one witness. "They created general confidence in the solidity of the bank, and that beautiful paper money went like hot cakes. For about a month it was the best money in the country."

Smith wasn't fazed a bit when the state legislature refused to grant his bank a charter. With only a few additions to the printing plates (why waste the money to have new ones made up?), the Kirtland Safety Society Bank became the Kirtland Safety Society Anti-Banking Co. As far as Smith was concerned, a company, unlike a bank, didn't need a charter.

The faithful, of course, didn't care what it was called. It was enough for them that the bank was run by Joseph Smith. What safer place could they put their money than in the hands of the Prophet? Lest they miss the message, Smith wrote an article for the Mormon newspaper inviting his flock to "take stock in our safety society. . . . We would remind them also of the sayings of the prophet Isaiah, . . . which are as follows: 'Surely the isles shall wait for me, and the ships of Tarshish first, and to bring thy sons from afar, their silver and their gold (not their bank notes) with them, unto the name of the Lord thy God, . . .'" Smith added the parenthetical to the biblical text as a discreet reminder that his bank wanted deposits in hard coin, not in notes drawn on other banks.

After only a few months of operation, the Anti-Banking Co. collapsed. The single layer of silver coins didn't last long once the notes started coming in. Meanwhile, the Ohio state legislature, unamused by Smith's semantic games, charged him with operating an unchartered bank and fined him $1,000. To collect, however, they had to get in line with the other investors who were suing Smith (thirteen suits were filed against him between June 1837 and April 1839). On the night of January 12, 1838, Smith, like many other speculators, declared bankruptcy with his feet, fleeing Kirtland with his followers under cover of darkness. In his imaginative account of the event, Smith later claimed he left Kirtland "to escape mob violence, which was about to burst upon us under the color of legal process to cover the hellish designs of our enemies."

To prevent his creditors from hounding him to his new home in Nauvoo, Illinois, Smith declared legal bankruptcy, but not before transferring many of his assets to his wives, children, friends, and associates—some 105 people in all. (In 1844, the year of Smith's death, these transfers were declared fraudulent and illegal.)

"If Joseph Smith were alive today," says a prominent Mormon businessman, "he wouldn't start a religion, he would be a leverage buyout king on Wall Street."

A hundred and fifty years later, the U.S. Attorney's Office declared Salt Lake City "the fraud capital of the nation." Between 1980 and 1983, the Utah U.S. attorney estimated that about ten thousand investors lost approximately $200 million in fraudulent deals. Many of them involved or implicated Church figures, even General Authorities. Scam artists had a name for it: "the Mormon marketing strategy." Any scheme, they discovered, no matter how outrageous or flimsy, would fly if it could be tied to the Church—What safer place to put one's money than in the hands of the Prophet? Investing money in a scheme that had the blessing of a General Authority was as good as handing it to the Lord.

So eager were many Mormon faithful to accumulate wealth (and blessings), and so trusting of Church leaders, that they would buy the Brooklyn Bridge—twice. Or better yet, "gold certificates" worth, according to the nice young Mormon man who sold them, a hundred or even a thousand times the up-front investment. When he was finally caught, the nice young man had unloaded $612 billion worth of bogus certificates—an amount equal to half the national debt. "What you have out here," says a local newspaper reporter, "is a bunch of people who are basically educated from birth to unquestioningly believe what they're told, and they do, right up through adulthood. The conditions for fraud are perfect." In 1981 alone, Utah was third in the nation for business-loan defaults and suffered eleven major business frauds. SEC officials labeled Salt Lake City "the sewer of the securities industry."

The Church finally had to take note of the stink when in the early 1980s, a member of the Church's elite found himself embroiled in a multimillion-dollar mortgage fraud. Believing that Elder Paul Dunn, a member of the First Quorum of the Seventy, had blessed the deal, hundreds of trusting Mormons had mortgaged their houses and given the proceeds to a Mormon entrepreneur named Grant Affleck who promised to invest their money, make their mortgage payments, and give them a substantial profit to boot. In his sales pitch, Affleck showed pictures of himself, Dunn, and some of the Osmonds cutting a ribbon at the opening of one of his housing developments.

Like most Ponzi schemes, Affleck's scam went smoothly as long as new money poured in, but as soon as the flow of gullible investors stopped, the whole pyramid collapsed, leaving many without their money and some without their homes.

Fortunately for the Church, Dunn had pulled out of the company before the roof caved in, but the "Grant Affleck Affair," as it became known, was enough of an embarrassment that the Church felt compelled to make a rare public statement: "Beware of smooth talk," said the editorial in the Church News, a weekly supplement to the Deseret News, "claims of endorsements or participation by Church leaders are often false. . . . Some Church members think normal business formalities should be suspended when they are dealing with 'brothers and sisters.' This can lead to fraud." The author of those cautionary words was Gary Sheets's old frat brother, Hugh Pinnock.

But Gary Sheets was no Grant Affleck.

Even as the price of oil plummeted, the inflation rate fell, and real estate values began to tumble, Gary kept the faith. In a depressed market, the CFS building, once the company's pride, became a costly white elephant. Properties in Houston followed the whole oil-based Houston economy down the proverbial tubes. Everybody was hurting, but aggressive firms like CFS with high debt-to-equity ratios found themselves particularly far out on the limb when they finally heard the sawing. The project that Gary had approved over the objection of his acquisitions board went bankrupt, as did the resyndication of the Garden Park project and many others. The $700,000 worth of solar panels sat in the basement of the CFS building gathering dust. Not a single one was ever rented.

At first, everyone tried to blame the catastrophe on the economy, OPEC, or poor management. Rich James, the comptroller turned president, had been too mired in detail; he failed to delegate; the various parts of the company were too compartmentalized. In December 1984, Sheets dumped James (who was smart enough to transfer his assets to other members of his family) and handed the reins to his fair-haired boy, Steve Christensen.

But things only got worse.

Christensen discovered that large sums of money had been "borrowed" from solvent partnerships to prop up losing ventures. The officers responsible argued that these were merely loans—"plugs" was the word they used—from one company to another. Arm's length transactions. All very proper and above board. So what if none of them was ever paid back? That didn't make them illegal—just bad business decisions.

Not everyone took such a benign view. John Conrad was stunned when he heard about it. "It was like someone telling me that my mother, a sweet old farm lady in West Mountain, Utah, was a prostitute." Gary, too, was shocked by the extent of the "plugging," although when a $300,000 plug turned up and he loudly demanded to know who was responsible for it, his name was on the check. "I sign some things I haven't seen," he explained limply.

Meanwhile, the ethanol plants, the golden investments over which corporate officers had fought, followed the fortunes of the oil market. Profit projections that looked great when oil was $40 a barrel looked dismal when it fell to $15. The company made a recision offer and prayed that no one would grab it. Meanwhile, the plants themselves continued to consume vast quantities of increasingly hard-to-come-by cash. When a team of accountants flew to Portales, New Mexico, to find out what was going wrong, Eric Palmer ran them off.

The airplanes, another glamour investment, turned out to cost far more and be worth far less than everyone had expected—everyone, that is, except Brent Bateman, the good Mormon pilot who had brought the deal to CFS in the first place. What Bateman had failed to reveal was that the Learjet they had purchased for $800,000 had sold previously for only $650,000. In his enthusiasm for the deal, he had also overlooked the need for a maintenance reserve, an oversight that meant the plane began to lose money almost from the moment CFS bought it. When Nick Smith, the man in charge of the deal for CFS, found out about Bateman's "mistake," he couldn't believe it. "Brent was such a good Mormon, a religious person. Such a personable, likable fellow. I just didn't expect bad things to happen."

In Lexington, Kentucky, John Steiner, the good-looking young Mormon horse breeder and son of a bishop, stood up and gave a speech at a banquet following the Kentucky Derby. The next morning, he packed all the valuables he could into his Cadillac and drove off. More than $1 million in investor money disappeared with him, including about $200,000 that belonged to the CFS officers he had wine and dined. In his enthusiasm, Steiner had sold the same package to several different investors.

But nothing could shake Gary Sheets's confidence.

At every new piece of bad news, he would give another pep talk. "All we need to do is sell more product," he would say. "If the money keeps flowing in, then we can solve these problems.” No one could tell him that investors weren’t about to put more money into a failing company.

When told about a pathetic $5,000 debt that had to be paid with scarce cash to avoid a lawsuit, Gary offered, “Why don’t I just show him my financial statement? That ought to satisfy him. Because I’ll personally guarantee it.”

“Sure, but you can’t just show him the asset side. You’ve got to show him the liability side as well.”

Sheets stared at Toscano for a long time. It hadn’t occurred to him, the consummate salesman, that you had to show both sides of any statement.

At another meeting, Gary suggested that he could personally borrow enough money to keep the company afloat. He looked shocked and hurt when someone explained that he couldn’t borrow any money personally with a personal financial statement in the red.

“It was like Hitler’s bunker,” Toscano recalls. “Here was Gary talking about moving the Ninth Panzer Division in—and there was none.”

But Gary dismissed such talk. No matter what happened, no matter how bleak things looked, he still had faith that somehow CFS would be saved.

Steve Christensen tried to make him see the light—or the darkness. He formed a secret committee to draw up a plan for saving the company, or at least its most viable assets, by selling them off to a new independent entity—an entity independent of Gary Sheets and his “pathological optimism.” Christensen called it the “White Knight” plan. On August 1, 1985, he presented it to Gary.

Sheets was shocked at first, then angry. More defeatism, he thought.

“The only way to make this work is to be more optimistic,” he insisted. “There’s got to be a better alternative. I’m gonna come up with it. I can save this. I made this company happen and I’m gonna make it happen again.” Then he ordered Christensen to: “go back and come up with a plan that’s based on a more optimistic view of the company.”

Gary just didn’t get it. Optimism was no longer enough. Christensen retreated to his computer and gave it one last try, but the numbers were inescapable. He went back to Gary and said it again, “It’s all over.”

“Steve, can’t you tell people we’re gonna pull through?” Gary asked.

“But we can’t pull through,” said Christensen.

"Can't you just tell them we might have a chance?"

"But we don't have a chance."

"The only way to solve the problems is to get people to believe we can do it, that there's a fighting chance."

"But there isn't a fighting chance."

"If you're that negative," said Gary angrily, "if there's absolutely no chance at all, why stay around?"

"Either you accept what needs to be done, or I'm going out the door," said Christensen.

"So go out the door."

Gary Sheets would do it himself. He would take the reins again and turn the company around—a comeback to end all comebacks. He had brought CFS this far. Like H. Ross Perot and Lee Iacocca (whose autobiography he was reading at the time), he would turn defeat into victory and lead his company to even greater triumphs.

His strategy? Sell! "We've got to go out and continue to sell product," he told his salesmen, "and by doing that we'll be able to make money and solve the problems of the past."

Gary Sheets couldn't go under. God wouldn't let him. "I don't know how it can't work," said one of CFS's attorneys. "We have a stake president and a couple of bishops in this thing. I don't see how the Lord would ever let this thing sink."

Once in control again, Sheets finally realized just how dire the situation was. He tried to implement Christensen's plan to sell off the viable parts of CFS and repay at least some investors but it was too little too late. A letter went out to investors advising them of the company's dire situation. Salesmen glumly began giving their clients the devastating news. "There have been fabulous losses," the Salt Lake Tribune reported. "One man lost $500,000 in one of the partnerships in one hit. . . . There were marked mass losses and unhappy people."

One of those unhappy people, police suspected, had hired a killer.

The bombings put an end to any last-ditch efforts to save CFS. Potential buyers for the viable pieces disappeared overnight. Bankruptcy became inevitable. Not long afterward, Gary Sheets was asked to resign as a bishop in the Mormon Church.

8 On the day after the bombings, Brad Carter, a twenty-four-year-old florist, picked up a shipment of tulips from Holland at the Salt Lake airport and then drove downtown. He parked his truck in the usual spot, in front of the McCune Mansion on Main Street, just north of Temple Square, and walked down the hill to the Crossroads Mall, where he had lunch with a friend. A little after two, he left the mall and headed back up the hill to his truck, passing on the way newspaper machines displaying the latest headline in the story that had all of Salt Lake jumpy: 2 KILLED IN S.L.-AREA BOMBINGS: POLICE SUSPECT “HIRED ASSASSIN.” It was about 2:45.

Halfway up the hill, in front of the Deseret Gymnasium, he remembered what was wrong with this parking spot. It was lovely coming down, but murder going up. At the top of the hill, he had to stop to catch his breath. He saw a postman, a meter maid, a few others on the street—and, in the vicinity of the gymnasium, a white male, average height, a little stocky.

He saw the man go to his car, a sleek blue sports car, open the door and lean inside, keeping one foot outside on the pavement. His arms and shoulders were moving. It looked as if he was shifting something off the driver’s seat. At that point, Carter looked away—he had been hit twice by cars when he wasn’t paying attention, and besides, he had just broken up with his girlfriend. He had a lot on his mind.

He had time to cross the street before he heard the explosion. It sounded like a car backfiring and a gunshot combined—double that sound. He spun around and saw only smoke and debris where the blue car had been, and a man lying in the street. Some pieces were still airborne.

Carter hightailed it down the road to the scene of the wreckage. “It looked like somebody was in sad shape,” he later told the police, “and that’s all I cared about.” The man was lying flat on his back, legs bent and spread apart. He had a gaping hole in his knee, one of his fingers had been blown off, exposing the bone. There was a gash in his head that bled badly, and some kind of wound in his chest. He was covered with powder burns. It wasn’t clear if he was alive or dead.

Carter wanted to leave him where he was until the ambulance came, but the flames in the car were spreading, and the heat was already overwhelming. With the help of two passersby, he dragged the man across the street and onto the grass in front of the gym. He took one last look at the car before flames engulfed it. He could see the bottom half of a box, a cardboard box, on the floor of the passenger's side. The top had been blown off. There were also some papers crumpled up, and a pile of papers in the back behind the seat. Flames quickly consumed them.

Carter heard faint sounds of breathing coming from the man. People came running out from the Deseret Gym with towels and he applied them to the wounds, which had begun to bleed what seemed like gallons. When he tore the man's clothes off to get at them, he saw he was wearing his Temple garments, the holy underwear that all good Mormons wear every day, everywhere, under their street clothes. So he took out the vial of consecrated oil that he always carried with him and anointed the man with it, saying, "I command you to live until the proper medical help gets here."

9 Ken Farnsworth, who had spent the morning at Kathy Sheets's autopsy, was on his way back to the department when he heard the news over the car radio. There had been a third bombing at 200 North Main Street.

Farnsworth recognized the victim's name: Mark Hofmann.

The investigation was only a day old, but Hofmann's name had already come up as a business associate of Steve Christensen's. In his entire life, Christensen had only done two things that might make someone want to kill him, his friends said. One was taking the helm of Gary Sheets's sinking company. The other was buying the Salamander Letter, a letter written by an early Church leader that undermined some of the major tenets of the Mormon faith. Although Christensen eventually donated the letter to the Church, it received national publicity, embarrassed the Church deeply, and upset many faithful Mormons. Upset them enough, perhaps, to want revenge.

And the man who sold Christensen the letter was Mark Hofmann, a respected dealer in rare books and documents, especially ones relating to Mormon history.

Police had dismissed the letter as a motive in the Christensen killing because it had nothing to do with Gary or Kathy Sheets. But the bombing of Hofmann changed everything. Now it looked like they were facing not some disgruntled investor, but some disgruntled believer.

When Jim Bell heard that the victim of the third bombing was alive, he jumped in his car and headed straight to Latter-day Saints Hospital. Bombings were rare. Survivors of bombings were even rarer. He didn't know how badly Hofmann had been hurt but hoped he could hang on long enough to answer a few questions.

He arrived at LDS Hospital about 3:40 and tracked down a friend of his wife's who worked in the emergency room. "Where's Hofmann?" he demanded, skipping the pleasantries. She led him to a huge room filled with doctors and nurses and one uniformed officer, all in masks and gowns. On the left wall, a battery of X-ray viewers was covered with films. Bell assumed they were Hofmann's. He noticed one in particular: a knee with a round piece of metal imbedded in it, probably the end cap from a pipe bomb.

Through a large window on the other side of the room, he could see Hofmann (it had to be him) lying on a gurney surrounded by doctors and nurses. He asked a nearby nurse, "What kind of condition is he in? Is he in a position for me to talk to him?"

She asked one of the doctors, who said, "It's fine with me." Did he need a gown and mask? She said it wasn't necessary. Then she led him into the X-ray room, where he spoke to Hofmann directly.

"I'm a detective with the police department," he began softly. "Do you feel like talking to me?"

"Sure," said Hofmann, surprisingly lucid. Two nurses were dressing a head wound and some IV lines ran into his arm. The technicians were setting up for the next round of X rays.

"Do you feel okay?"

"I guess so."

"Can you understand me?"

"Yes."

"Can you hear me?" Hofmann seemed to be having a hard time hearing him.

"I'm having some problem in one ear. You'll have to speak louder."

"Do you own a—is your car blue in color?"

"Yes."

"Where were you going when your car exploded?"

"I was going to sell some documents to an attorney here in town. The documents I intended to sell were in my car when it exploded."

"Can you go over your movements from the time you got out of bed today?"

"I got up at 7 A.M., left home, and drove to a Dee's Restaurant at about 60th South and Highland Drive. I got there about eight. I had eggs and hash browns and a glass of orange juice for breakfast."

Bell was dumbfounded by how clearheaded Hofmann seemed. He had had witnesses down at the Hall of Justice who were more befuddled than this man lying here badly wounded in the emergency room. "What did you do after you left the restaurant?"

"I just drove around for a while."

"Where were you driving around?"

"Around."

Maybe not so clearheaded. "Where's around? You know, east, west side of town or what?"

"I don't know. Just around." Bell was a good enough cop to know that Hofmann wasn't just befuddled, he was being evasive. He was coherent enough to remember what he had for breakfast, but not where he had been all morning.

But why would a victim be evasive?

"You must remember some of the places you went," Bell pressed.

"Well, I was up in Emigration Canyon."

"What were you doing up in Emigration Canyon?"

"Just driving around."

"Just driving around?"

"Thinking."

"What were you thinking about?"

"Just things."

At that point, Bell had to leave the room for a few minutes while the technicians took another set of X rays.

When they were through, he came back and started again. "Do you feel okay? Do you want to begin again?"

Hofmann said, "Yes, I'll talk to you."

"Okay. Let's talk about what happened when you got to your car?"

"I went to the car, opened the door, and something fell off the seat onto the floorboard. It was a package and I reached for it and it blew up."

"Give me a description of the package."

"Well, it was just a package, I can't remember anything special about it."

Bell decided to try again with Emigration Canyon. "What were you doing up in Emigration Canyon?"

"Just driving around."

"You said you were driving around thinking. What were you thinking about?"

"Things."

This was getting nowhere, and Bell couldn't understand why. Of course, he'd never dealt with a living bombing victim before. Maybe it was the effect of a concussion or some sort of limited amnesia. There had to be an explanation.

When they wheeled Hofmann into another room for a CT scan, Bell sat outside thinking about what he had said—or hadn't said. A doctor detailed Hofmann's injuries for him. Pointing to the X ray with the end cap, he explained that the knee had been severely damaged, that it had been pinned back together and large clips attached to the outside to hold the leg in place. More surgery would be required, but Hofmann was out of danger.

Jim Bryant, the uniformed officer in the surgical gown, filled Bell in on what had happened before he arrived. Bryant had been the first person other than medical personnel to join Hofmann in the trauma room. He had told the same story about opening the door and a package falling out.

But there was something else.

Hofmann had told Bryant about a brown pickup truck that had been following him earlier that day. He described it in detail: a full-size, tan pickup truck with some damage on the right front bumper. The driver was a white man, about thirty-five or forty years old, and he was wearing a white shirt. The license plate number was tw something, something, with two 3s in it.

"I pulled over at about 200 South West Temple," Hofmann said. "The truck stopped in the traffic lane and waited for me to pull away again. I didn't think the truck had followed me to the area of the Deseret Gym, and I didn't see the truck when I left my car there."

Finally, he asked Bryant for a favor. He wanted the policeman to relay a message to some friends.

"What's the message?" asked Bryant.

"Tell them to get out of town."

10 When television and radio stations began interrupting their programming to flash the astounding news that there had been a third bombing and Mark Hofmann was the victim, Salt Lake City's small community of Mormon dissidents flew into a panic. Like the police, they immediately saw the terrifying logic of it: the Salamander Letter had touched off a spark in some crazed Mormon fanatic, and he had declared open season on the Church's enemies.

That night, Jerald Tanner, one of the most prominent dissidents, was startled from a restless sleep by the faint sound of a car outside his house. Wide awake, he looked at the clock. It wasn't even four yet. Beyond the windows of his small Victorian house on West Temple Street, Salt Lake City was black and quiet—except for the unmistakable sound of footsteps approaching his front door.

He had lived in fear of this moment ever since settling for good in Salt Lake City in 1960, ever since he and his wife, Sandra, began their crusade of information against the Mormon Church, publishing a newsletter and scores of books and pamphlets. They had attacked the Church's policy of denying blacks the priesthood. They had brought many of the Church's historical skeletons out of the closet, like Joseph Smith's 1831 revelation instructing Mormons to marry American Indians (a "dark, and loathsome, and filthy people") because intermarriage would make them "fair and delightsome." They had exposed the Masonic roots of the secret Temple-endowment Ceremony. At one point, one of the Twelve Apostles, the Church's ruling body, had given them an ominous order: "I'm warning you—don't start anything against this Church."

But nothing happened. And after a few years of sleepless nights, the fear went away.

The bombings had brought it all back.

Like everybody else, the Tanners had dismissed the first two bombs as CFS related—just some irate, unbalanced investor. Then came the third bomb, the one in Mark Hofmann's car. It's finally begun, they thought. The Day of Retribution. A Mormon crackpot had finally reached the end of his fuse. The Lord had sent an avenging angel to smite the critics of the Church.

Others wondered if the Church itself was behind the bombings. It was hard, almost impossible, to believe that the Church, given its obsession with public relations, would stoop to murder. But at a time like this, no scenario, no matter how outrageous, seemed truly impossible. After all, the Church Security force was a notorious hotbed of Mormon fanaticism, just the kind of crazies to rid the Church of its enemies—with or without authorization. By now dark rumors were already circulating through the underground that a Church Security truck had been seen tailing Mark Hofmann the day before his bomb went off.

The Tanners' phone hadn't stopped ringing since. People from all over the country: "Are you all right?" "Have you got police protection?" "Is everything okay?" "Do you have a gun?" CBS News wanted to interview them. A friend of George Bush's with CIA connections called to offer "special security" if police protection proved inadequate.

Their employees, the ones who ran the presses and collating machines in the basement, spent the following days in a state of sheer terror. The husband of one wouldn't let her come to work unless he came with her and sat beside her all day. Another checked her car from top to bottom before starting it—and even then, closed her eyes when she turned the key.

Many of their friends in the small but vocal Mormon dissident community had already left town. All feared for their lives, feared that they would be the next to hear footsteps in the night, that theirs would be the next name on the avenging angel's list.

Trembling, Tanner woke his wife.

Sandra Tanner was a fifth-generation Mormon, a direct descendant of Brigham Young, founder of Salt Lake City and builder of the Tabernacle, a larger-than-life figure that all Mormon children are taught to revere. As a young girl raised in a cloistered Mormon community in Los Angeles, she had never doubted her religion. In fact, she grew up thinking that it made her superior. "I knew my church history," she recalls. "The other kids, the Catholics especially, were dupes who were being spoon-fed altered history, but I was in the true Church. I had the inside scoop. Our leaders had nothing to hide."

And so she continued to believe until one day, overcome with curiosity, she began to ask questions. That led inevitably to trouble. In class after class, teachers scolded her for "confusing" the other students. Finally, after much soul searching, she left the Church, married Jerald Tanner, and enlisted in his mission to "give people knowledge so they can find the way."

How odd, she thought as she saw the fear on her husband's face, that the great-great-granddaughter of Brigham Young should be fearing for her life at the hands of his most zealous followers.

The noise was on the porch now. Someone leaving something at the door? Devout Christians, the Tanners thanked God that their children were not in the house that night. With his wife trailing him, Jerald padded down the stairs, his tall, gangly body stumbling in the darkness—without his contacts he could barely see his way to the door. Sandra would have to be his eyes.

In the midst of his terror, he wanted to catch the murderer in the act, actually laying the package at his doorstep.

It was Joseph Smith himself who put the death sentence on the Tanners' heads.

Sometime in 1839, while conversing with Saint Peter—he held frequent dialogues with biblical figures—Smith happened to mention the problems he was having with dissident members of the Church. According to Smith's own telling, Saint Peter said, in effect, "You should have seen the problem we had with Judas Iscariot." When Smith asked Peter how he handled his problem, Peter replied that he had personally "hung Judas for betraying Christ." That was enough for Joseph Smith. From that day forward, the punishment for dissent in his Church would be death.

Smith's successor as Prophet, Brigham Young, a brilliant leader but a huge bully of a man, spelled out the new theory in a series of bloodcurdling sermons. "There are sins that men commit for which they cannot receive forgiveness in this world, or in that which is to come, and if they had their eyes open to see their true condition, they would be perfectly willing to have their blood spilt upon the ground."

When a few brave souls suggested that such a doctrine was perhaps too harsh, Young replied, "I know, when you hear my brethren telling about cutting people off from the earth, that you consider it a strong doctrine, but it is to save them, not to destroy them." (Young, of course, had other reasons for imposing such a hard rule. He was determined not to lose converts at a time when settlers were badly needed to populate Salt Lake City.)

What exactly were the sins that required "cutting off from the earth"? In addition to dissent, they were murder, adultery, theft, taking the Lord's name in vain, miscegenation, breaking covenants, leaving the Church, lying, counterfeiting, and condemning Joseph Smith, his Church, or any of its leaders. Any one of these, according to the doctrine of Blood Atonement, required that a man be killed in order to be saved.

And not just killed. His blood had to be spilled: specifically, “his throat cut from ear to ear, his tongue torn out by its roots, his breast cut open and his heart and vitals torn from his body and given to the birds of the air and the beasts of the field and his body cut asunder in the midst and all his bowels gush out.” (In practice, slitting a throat usually proved sufficient.)

For those who didn’t catch on, Young and his followers provided many instructive demonstrations.

Only days after announcing his intention to leave Springville, Utah, for California in 1857, William Parrish was “interviewed” by three Mormon officials who found his beliefs “unsatisfactory.” Soon afterward, he and his son were shot and their bodies loaded into a wagon. When the corpses finally turned up, Mr. Parrish had been stabbed forty-eight times, and his throat cut “from ear to ear.” No one missed the point. Mrs. Parrish later recounted, “There had been public preaching at Springville, to the effect that no apostates would be allowed to leave; if they did, hogholes would be stopped up with them. . . . My husband was no believer in the doctrine of killing to ‘save,’ as taught by the teachers.”

Failing to believe in Blood Atonement was one of the sins that demanded Blood Atonement.

William Parrish wasn’t alone. During the early years of Salt Lake City, when new construction was everywhere, builders were constantly digging up skeletons, not in coffins, not in cemeteries, but just a few feet deep in what had been open fields. Local sheriffs looked the other way, but the U.S. marshal at the time, Sam Gilson, was convinced that “the leaders of the Church were the guilty party.” He decided to prove it by bringing one case to trial, the murder of a man named Yates, in 1871. Yates had committed the sin of selling ammunition to government soldiers who had been sent by President Ulysses S. Grant to enforce the laws against polygamy and foil Brigham Young’s plans to create a “spiritual and temporal Kingdom” of his own and secede from the United States. To Young, those troops were “the enemy” and so was anyone who supported them. Consequently, according to a contemporary account, Yates’s “brains were knocked out with an ax.”

A man named William Hickman, who did the actual “saving,” confessed that he did so on orders from the Mormon leaders, and the U.S. district attorney had the temerity to indict not only the mayor of Salt Lake and several others, but the Prophet himself, Brigham Young. Before they could arrest him, however, Young, who had already been arrested and released on charges of “lewd and lascivious cohabitation” with sixteen of his wives, fled to the Mormon stronghold of St. George, Utah.

Meanwhile, in Salt Lake City, his followers did their best to persuade the authorities to drop the charges. The appeal was simple and direct. Heavily armed men visited all the local Gentiles (non-Mormons) who had supported the federal authorities “in opposing the Mormon system” and told them that if Young was arrested, they would all be killed.

Persuaded, the Gentiles ran to the U.S. attorney, R. N. Baskin, and implored him to drop the charges against Young. Baskin, a man not without a sense of humor, told their spokesman, “You would make a splendid angel, and as I do not intend to grant the request, you had better prepare to go to Abraham’s bosom.” (Young, the so-called Lion of the Lord, was eventually arrested for murder. But before his case was brought to trial—Baskin was certain the government would have won in court—he was released on a technicality.)

As the Tanners knew all too well, the bloodthirsty, vengeful spirit of Brigham Young was still alive in the vast outback of rural Utah. There were still polygamists out there, thirty thousand of them by some estimates. Although most were peaceful, decent people, a small core of fanatics believed that the current Prophet of the Church, Spencer W. Kimball, was an agent of the Devil because he had succumbed to the federal government on the issue of polygamy. On more than one occasion, they had threatened to blow him up.

By comparison, Blood Atonement was downright mainstream. In fact, it was still a part of the Temple Ceremony, the secret religious service established by Joseph Smith. Just as in Smith’s day, modern worshipers ritually agreed during the ceremony to kill anyone—themselves or others—who revealed its secrets. The P.R.-minded men on Temple Square didn’t like to talk about it, and many of the insurance salesmen and housewives who went through the motions didn’t know what they meant. But a few did. And in a state filled with guns and religious fanatics, it only took one.

One like Ervil LeBaron.

At age twenty-eight, LeBaron, a Mormon polygamist, founded the Church of the First Born of the Fullness of Times. Claiming divine inspiration, he waged a campaign of death, terror, and Blood Atonement unmatched since the days of Brigham Young. It began with the murder of his brother, Joel, in 1972. Six years later, God ordered LeBaron to have one of his wives, Vonda White, "Blood Atone" an apostate named Dean Grover Vest. God spoke to LeBaron, as he did to Joseph Smith, very specifically. Tell White to "fix Vest a hot meal," God said, and then, "while he is at the table enjoying the dinner," get behind him and "shoot him in the back of the head until he is dead."

When another of LeBaron's followers, Lloyd Sullivan, began having problems with his wife Bonnie, God interceded again. He told LeBaron to tell Sullivan: take Bonnie to the "Deep South and deep-six her there." In another revelation, God ordered the death of LeBaron's own daughter, Rebecca. The Lord's exact words: Send her a "one-way ticket."

As many as twenty-nine people may have been "Blood Atoned" under LeBaron's ministry of terror.

More recently, in 1984, two polygamous brothers, Ron and Dan Lafferty, had become infuriated at their sister-in-law, Brenda, for refusing to encourage their brother, Allen, to take on additional wives. To remove the obstruction and advance the cause of polygamy, they broke into Allen's home and killed both Brenda and her fifteen-month-old daughter, slashing their throats from ear to ear.

When Ron Lafferty was arrested, the police found a written revelation in the pocket of his shirt:

Thus sayeth the Lord unto my servants the prophets. It is my will and commandment that ye remove the following individuals in order that my work might go forward, for they have truly become obstacles in my path and I will not allow my work to be stopped. First thy brother's wife Brenda and her baby, then Chloe Low and then Richard Stowe. And it is my will that they be removed in rapid succession that an example be made of them in order that others might see the fate of those who fight against the true saints of God. . . .

Not all the fanatics were as crazy as the LeBarons and Laffertys, but, unfortunately, not all the fanatics were safely out in the countryside. Some were right downtown, working in the Church Office Building.

They may have looked like drab office workers, in their white shirts, old suits, too-wide ties, and too-tight belts, but underneath they were the Lord's foot soldiers—some would have said God's gumshoes. Some were, in fact, former FBI agents and proud of it. They were led by L. Martell Bird, a former Fed who, upon retiring from the bureau in 1981, offered to run the Church's security operation gratis. Bird had been one of J. Edgar Hoover's right-hand men back in the good old days, before the bureau was high-teched and yuppified. It was said, with some awe (and often by Bird himself), that he was one of only seven men in the FBI that Hoover actually trusted—if he trusted anyone. He had been on the surveillance team that bugged Martin Luther King's hotel room and listened in on the moans of white call girls. He had also bugged communist college kids, those peaceniks and fairies who opposed the war in Vietnam. "Bad people have to be watched," Bird was fond of saying.

Bird had been appointed to his position as head of Church Security by Ezra Taft Benson, a man who made even J. Edgar look conciliatory, a man who considered Eisenhower "a socialist," the civil rights movement "a communist conspiracy," and the John Birch Society just a bunch of patriots. With Benson's backing, Bird had helped turn a tiny security operation that used to spend most of its time tracking down kids who stole from the candy machines into a mini-FBI, and the Church offices, especially the offices of the First Presidency, into a veritable fortress. When the Prophet was being moved from his official residence in the Hotel Utah to a new apartment, windows were replaced with bulletproof glass and walls fitted with sheets of steel—enough to stop a bomb.

"When you are at war," Apostle Boyd K. Packer said publicly, "and we are, security is crucial."

When a fire alarm went off on the fifth floor of the Administration Building, one man from Church Security came running out of his office yelling, "We're under attack! We're under attack!" In public, the Prophet was surrounded by more security men than the President of the United States. Offices were constantly being swept for electronic bugs. There were always rumors of phones being tapped and even of listening devices being placed in rooms of the Temple to overhear the plotting of radical fundamentalists.

More ominous were the Church's increasing efforts—like those of the Nixon White House—to “keep track of” its critics. A secret “Intelligence Division” was created within the security office for just that purpose and staffed with the purest of the pure, the same kind of nonsmoking, non-drinking, hypercommitted Mormon shock troops that Howard Hughes had surrounded himself with in his last paroxysms of paranoia.

Only this time, they were working for God.

On November 6, 1975, afraid that his phone was being bugged, Jerald Tanner had picked up the receiver to call an ex-Mormon who knew something about bugging. Between the second and third rings, he heard a woman's voice saying softly, “They're trying to call out.”

A few months later, the Tanners received a letter from a young man in California named Stan Fields, inquiring about their activities. For the next four years, Fields corresponded and visited often. He was a bright, scrubbed young man, a former missionary who claimed to be a refugee fleeing from the Church.

He was, it turned out, a mole spying for the Church. His name was Steve Mayfield, not Stan Fields, and he had worked for both the Church and the FBI. On July 16, 1980, Tanner confronted him in the Church Office Building. He denied spying for the Church but confessed that some of the material he had gotten from the Tanners might have “floated upstairs.”

Some time later, the Tanners also discovered that the FBI had opened a file on them as potential “threats to the national security.” All it would have taken was a phone call from Martell Bird to one of his buddies still at the bureau, or, better yet, from a Church leader to a powerful Mormon politico in Washington—“God has asked me to ask you. . . .”

To sic the FBI on the Tanners was one thing; to blow them up was something else. But there were so many unanswered questions. Why did Church Security men materialize at the scene of the Hofmann bombing almost instantly? What about the report by the state legislator that Church Security had kept Hofmann under surveillance? That didn't make them bombers, but it didn't make them look good either. Did they see it happening and not try to stop it? At least one federal investigator from the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms thought it looked more than just suspicious. He almost ignited a fistfight in the police department when he declared the murders were the work of the “Mormon Mafia”—a group of “hit men” from Church Security sent by their leaders to “off the enemy.” Shades of Brigham Young. More level heads saw the possibility of a rogue operation: something unauthorized, something to protect the “plausible deniability” of higher-ups.

The night of October 16, the night of the third bombing, Jerald Tanner laid his trembling hand on the doorknob while Sandra peered out the window.

It was a man in a black uniform—a limousine driver. He was there to pick them up for their appearance on CBS’s “The Morning Show.” Apparently, someone had forgotten to tell the limousine company that the appearance was canceled.

Which again raised the question of why the appearance—to be taped at the Church-owned CBS affiliate, KSL-TV—had been canceled in the first place.

When Jim Bell heard that Hofmann’s scans would take at least another hour or two, he stationed a uniform at the door and drove down to the bomb site on North Main to join his partner. The whole way, he kept replaying the bizarre conversation with Hofmann. Despite being surrounded by nurses and doctors and IVs and X rays, he just didn’t look or sound like a victim.

In fact, although Jim Bell didn’t know it yet, Mark Hofmann was already the number-one suspect.

Two witnesses at the Judge Building the previous day, Bruce Passey and his father, Hal, had ridden up in the elevator that morning with a man carrying a package addressed to Steve Christensen. They told the police, and the press, that the man was wearing “a Kelly green, letter-type jacket with brown leather sleeves, blue jeans, and tennis shoes.”

Early the next morning, Ed Ashment, a Mormon historian, called Dawn Tracy of the Salt Lake Tribune. “Dawn, it says on the news accounts that a man was seen carrying a package in the Judge Building with a green letter jacket on. Mark Hofmann has a green letter jacket. Mark Hofmann would fit that description.”

The suggestion seemed “totally off the wall” to Tracy. Not Hofmann. But she told her fellow reporter at the Tribune, Mike Carter, about it anyway. “That’s Mark’s trademark. The green letter jacket.”

Carter, a thirty-year-old blond, Brooks Brothers preppie in wire-rim glasses who covered the courthouse beat for the Tribune, relayed the news to Detective Don Bell—no relation to Jim Bell—later that morning. Bell took it nonchalantly. Like the rest of the Salt Lake City police, he was still working on the assumption that the bombings were CFS-related, not documents-related. But four hours later, when the third bomb went off, Bell collared Carter. “It’s Mark Hofmann. We may need you to swear as a witness on a search warrant.”

Carter said he couldn’t do that, ethically. “I can’t burn my sources.”

Not long afterward, Carter appeared at the bombing scene and told Ken Farnsworth, “I hear Hofmann wears a green letter jacket just like the one in the description.”

And he matched the composite.

The same two witnesses, Passey Senior and Junior, had taken their turns with Detective John Johnson, who doubled as the department’s sketch artist. Johnson wasn’t a likely man for the job, with his massive barrel chest, overbuilt arms, drill-sergeant posture, and steel-blue eyes. But with practice, he had grown extremely adept with the little kit of plastic overlays of mouth, eyes, hair, nose, chin that allowed even deep-chested military types to play artist.

Bruce Passey gave a general description first. “The man was about thirty to thirty-five, white, with a medium build, about 175 pounds, brown hair cut pretty short, and I think he had a thin mustache.” Using the overlays, Johnson constructed the face feature by feature, then showed it to Passey’s father, Hal. “It’s a real good likeness,” he said, “except he didn’t have the mustache.” So the mustache remained a question mark.

And except for the mustache, the police thought, the composite matched Hofmann to a tee.

Back at the bombing scene, all activity came to a temporary standstill.

Jerry Taylor had arrived from San Francisco.

What Joe Namath was to football, what Bobby Orr was to hockey, what Joe DiMaggio was to baseball, what Stallone was to Rocky, Jerry Taylor was all these and more to the Salt Lake City cops. Even a young bull like Ken Farnsworth had to pay his respect. This was a cop’s cop. He didn’t look like much—early forties, dark curly hair with a few touches of gray, thin, a bit of a paunch, glasses—not the kind of guy to stop traffic or bring a bar to its feet when he walked in. But appearances could be deceiving.

Jerry Taylor was the two things every cop wants to be: professional— totally, uncompromisingly, shit-kicking professional; and tough—really tough, not TV tough, a hard-drinking, tough-talking, fast-moving, no-bullshit kind of a guy with a chain tattooed on his wrist. He was also the best at what he did, the very best, and he wasn't shy about telling you so. No false modesty about Jerry Taylor. Expertise was expertise and he wasn't the top ATF man in the Western United States for no reason. No one knew bombs like Jerry Taylor knew bombs. Cops in fifty states knew that, and they respected it.

They especially respected the way he spoke his mind, never pulled punches, never minced words, never hedged. That was the luxury of working with bombs. Bombs weren't subtle, they weren't gray, they weren't ambiguous, and neither was Jerry Taylor. He would look you straight in the eye and give you a straight answer, no matter who you were, no matter what your rank. If you tried to argue, he would shoot back, "What are you, some kind of shithead? Don't you understand what I'm telling you?"

When he fingered a criminal, he stayed fingered. When he said a guy was guilty, he stayed guilty. And when he came around to the courtroom to back it up, looked the jury in the eye, and said, "That man did it," they always believed him because he was Jerry Taylor and he goddam knew his business.

Without wasting any time, he and Bob Swehla, the local ATF man, examined the bomb site and checked the car, which was still smoldering. The braking mechanism had been damaged in the fire, and the car had rolled down the hill a few feet since the explosion. Taylor knew precisely where it had been at the time of the explosion from a small impact rut in the asphalt. From the lines of the pellet shots and fragmentation of the bomb, he pinpointed the direction of the explosion. All that in the first minute.

Then he divided the scene into sections with chalk marks on the pavement. They would map the scene and tag the evidence just as Jim Bell had done in the hallway of the Judge Building. ATF men fanned out over the scene tagging and packing items for the lab. Taylor, and Taylor alone, decided which pieces were of potential evidentiary importance. When the immediate vicinity was scoured clean, he sent men throughout the surrounding area, as far as the rooftops of nearby buildings, looking for more. Later, he had the storm drains checked in case the water that had been used to put out the fire had carried any important evidence into the gutter.

It was a joy to watch.

Taylor was still there when Jim Bell arrived from the hospital.

"Look," said Bell, grabbing Taylor away from the others. "I talked to Hofmann," he began. "He said he came back to his car and found a package on the driver's seat. When he opened the door, the package fell on the floor and he reached to catch it. That's when it blew up."

Taylor rubbed his chin and looked long and hard at the burned-out car. Then he turned to Bell. "The designer of these three bombs is different from any other in the United States," he said, seeming to ignore what Bell had told him. "This last bomb wasn't exactly the same size. And the Christensen bomb was the only one with nails. But other than that, all three bombs were the same. All three bombs had the same kinds of pipes, the same kinds of powder, the same kinds of mercury switches, the same kinds of battery packs, the same kinds of igniters, the same kinds of wiring systems, the same kinds of packages. Put all that together, and you have a unique bomb design, even though the elements aren't that unique. It would be an exercise in futility for a defense attorney to try to distinguish them.

"Now tell me again where Hofmann said the bomb was when he got in the car?" Taylor had that hard-eyed look.

"He said it dropped on the floor and went off when he got in the car."

Taylor drew in his breath and smiled. "Then you've got your bomber."

Bell was dumbstruck. "What do you mean?"

Taylor took him to the car and explained. It was clear, he said, that at the time of the explosion the bomb had been at the right edge of the seat, tilted against the console that separated the left seat from the right. "Hofmann is lying when he says it fell on the floor when he got in the car. He was kneeling on the seat fiddling around with the bomb when it went off. The guy just made a mistake. He dropped the bomb, and he knew it. He had a few milliseconds, but just long enough for his brain to say, 'Here it goes.'"

"You mean it was the biggest Oops! ever heard," said Bell. "The biggest Oh, shit! ever recorded?"

"That's about it."

Taylor showed him the indentation near the right side of the seat, which showed where the bomb was at the time of the explosion. It was a tight, cramped little car, with a console between the two seats and a tiny ledge behind them. "The bomb went off there," he said. "Do you see this depression, going this way here and down? That means the bomb was right up on the seat—not on the seat exactly, but right at the edge of the seat, resting against the console. If the bomb was really on the floor when it went off, it would have blown straight down, and there wouldn't be any impression here."

The door had to be ajar, Taylor added, otherwise Hofmann would have been hoisted straight through the roof by the force of the blast. He had looked at countless homicide victims who had been in car explosions with the doors closed. They had shot through the roof but were usually caught halfway, at the waist.

In a flight of virtuosity, Taylor reconstructed for Bell the last few minutes before the explosion. "Hofmann comes back to the car. The bomb is probably in the back. He kneels down on the seat, twists to the back to get the bomb. It's moving forward, then he bobbles it, drops it by mistake, and . . . boom."

Taylor went on to play with a variety of scenarios, from the crazy—that Hofmann brought the bomb fully armed, propped between his leg and the console—to the more likely, that he armed it on the spot. "He rests it on the ledge behind the seat. Then he goes away and comes back, and needs to arm the device. So he has a simple protective mechanism—a couple of wires sticking out of the box, and all he has to do is twist them together. So he arms the device while it's resting on the ledge, then he brings it forward and drops it."

There it was, the Taylor conclusion: absolute, no hedging, no ifs, no maybes. Hofmann did it.

After that, everything the police turned up only confirmed what Jerry Taylor already knew.

Christine Hayes, an attractive woman in her twenties, was on meter-maid duty in the area at the time of the explosion. She saw a man near the McCune Mansion carrying a briefcase. In her rear-view mirror, she watched him head west down the street and walk around behind the blue sports car (which she had noticed because it was such "a cool car"). He bent over the car as if unlocking the door. A moment later she heard the explosion, so close she could feel the heat. When she looked back, the man was lying beside the car. So she turned around, drove back to the scene, and called for help on her radio.

Hayes was absolutely certain no one was standing outside the car at the time of the explosion. So Hofmann was lying when he said the bomb went off just after he opened the door. He had to have been sitting inside the car.

There was one problem: Hayes remembered the man as being blond and six feet tall. Hofmann was short and brunette.

Richard Evans had been staring at the little blue sports car from his apartment window just before the explosion. He confirmed it: there was no one standing outside the car in the moments before the explosion. No more than two seconds elapsed between the time he turned away from the window and the explosion. He turned back and there was a man lying in the street.

A postman and a friend had been walking along the sidewalk no more than twenty feet from the car when it blew. They agreed: no one was standing outside the car at the time. Ditto Maureen Clark, who was standing across the street. Ditto two women in a car on Main Street. Ditto Keith Sorensen, a truck driver who was turning onto West Temple, half a block away, when he heard and felt the explosion: no one outside the car.

Lori Loftin had been looking directly at the car and saw Hofmann inside at the time of the explosion. He was kneeling down on the driver's seat reaching for something, Loftin remembered. He had taken something from behind the front seat, turned slightly, and then boom, he was thrown from the car.

That was exactly the way Jerry Taylor had said it happened.

Later, when the warrant to search the trunk of the car arrived, they found an elbow of pipe, like the pipe used to make the Sheets and Christensen bombs; a black Magic Marker, like the one used to address the bomb packages; and two rubber surgical gloves, like anyone would use to avoid leaving fingerprints. They also found an old, dark, crinkled piece of paper (no one recognized it as papyrus) along with armfuls of other papers, all of them soaking wet from the drenching of the fire hoses. Hofmann clearly dealt in paper of some kind.

By seven that night, they had a warrant to search Hofmann's house, and Bell and Farnsworth joined the huge team that headed out to Holladay. With the warrant in hand, they were inside the house five minutes after arriving. Lucille Hofmann, Mark's mother, had already given them the key.

With men from the police department, sheriff's office, and county attorney's office, it looked like a marauding horde going through the little three-bedroom bungalow on Marie Avenue, but Bell had planned the operation with his usual care. Each officer was assigned a separate room and, when he was done, reported to one of the search officers. Bell assigned one officer to act as evidence custodian and collect the evidence, another to take photographs. Bell made it clear he did not want any foul-ups that would give some cowboy defense attorney a chance to exclude the evidence they found.

He knew it was a no-win situation. If they closed down the house and went through it piece by piece, it would take a week and the family would howl to the press, "The cops have taken over our house." If they took everything back to the police department and went through it there, a clever defense attorney could say the search was too broad, they took too much, so all the evidence was seized unlawfully.

The only thing to do was stick to the warrant, which listed bombs or materials that could be used in making bombs and the letter jacket. Nothing else. That meant no fishing. No papers, no records, no letters. They searched Hofmann's office in the basement and found hundreds of strange documents, but left them where they lay.

What they seized was an empty tape recorder (the parts could have been used to construct a bomb), some gun parts, and, most bizarre, an Uzi machine-gun manual. (What was a documents dealer doing with a machine-gun manual?) They also dismantled the security system. (Some of the parts could have been used to make a bomb.)

About fifteen minutes into the search, they opened the closet near the stairs. Sergeant Glen Bayless called out to the other officers, most of whom were in the basement, "You should come upstairs. We just opened a closet and there might be some items of interest to you in here." There, in the very back corner of the closet, on the floor, turned inside out, was a green letter jacket.

That afternoon, Chief Willoughby had held another press conference, to reassure the public again that no mad bomber was loose in Zion. "I think it's important that we not unnecessarily alarm our citizens. I think we have things well in hand." The chief said that the main focus of the investigation had indeed shifted away from CFS and toward the Salamander Letter, adding that the case was becoming so complex, it was "like something out of 'Miami Vice.'" He added, evasively, that it would be "99 percent accurate" to say that "the person making the bombs" was “under surveillance.” When a reporter asked, “Isn’t it Mark Hofmann?” he coyly refused to answer.

Late that evening, Willoughby and ATF Agent Jerry Miller were speaking to the press again. And this time they were willing to name names. “We’ve found enough evidence that Jerry Miller is going to the U.S. Attorney’s Office to file charges,” Willoughby announced. “Jerry feels in his gut that we have more than enough to charge Mr. Hofmann. We’re not saying the investigation is concluded.” But, he added, with at least as much confidence as the night before, “We know who the players are and other charges will be filed—other than Mr. Hofmann.”

But weren’t the first two bombs supposed to be the work of a professional hit man? Weren’t those bombs, like today’s bomb, too sophisticated for a presumed amateur like Mark Hofmann?

“It’s a proven fact that it was sophisticated,” Willoughby quipped. “So much so that he blew himself up.”

Ken Farnsworth left Hofmann’s house about three that morning, when the search was finally called off. On his way home, he phoned the LDS Hospital and found out that Hofmann had just come out of surgery. He and Joe Everett, another cop, decided to swing by and get a fuller reading on his condition. Jerry Taylor had said he wanted a detailed description of Hofmann’s injuries so he could plot precisely the position of his body at the time of the blast. The longer they waited to get it, Taylor said, the more time the evidence would have to heal.

If Jerry Taylor wanted it, Ken Farnsworth wanted to get it for him, even at three in the morning.

They arrived at a good time. The attending nurse, Deborah Bowdoin, had held off redressing Hofmann’s wounds following surgery in order to let him sleep. He was lying in the brand-new special procedures room—a large space with two surgical lights above and outlets for oxygen, nitrous oxide, and air in case the room had to be used for surgery. It was big enough to hold three or four beds but right now held only one. Hofmann had a “C” collar around his neck and a fixator device on his knee, which was propped on pillows and still bleeding. There was a light dressing on his right upper arm with blood seeping through, and the fingers of his right hand, visible despite the splint, were bright red at the tips. He was attached to a blood pressure/heart rate monitor, a respiration monitor, and an intravenous-pump monitor.

Farnsworth took shorthand mental notes: “Right leg blown to shit, right hand blown to shit.” He had a laceration across his forehead, which he must have banged on something very hard. He had a piece of shrapnel still stuck behind his shoulder blade, according to Bowdoin, and couldn't rotate his arm.

"He could have died," said Bowdoin, sympathetically. "But at this point, it's clear he won't."

In the last two days, Farnsworth had sat through both the Christensen and Sheets autopsies, separated by only an hour and half of sleep. He wasn't feeling sympathetic. As far as he was concerned, this man had just killed two people and obviously intended to kill a third when he blew himself to hell instead.

"He got what he deserved," muttered Joe Everett with a black laugh.

Farnsworth remembered Gary Gilmore, another Utah killer, who tried to commit suicide just before he was supposed to face the firing squad. Doctors had worked frantically to bring him back just so the authorities could get on with the execution. Farnsworth knew this was another capital case, probably another death penalty case, and here they were working a miracle of modern medicine for a guy they would end up executing. It was just weird.

He looked at Bowdoin, an emergency-room nurse as hard as any cop. "You patch him up," he said in a voice laced with sarcasm, "and we'll stand him up and execute him."

PART TWO

Too Good to Be True

14 Eighteen-year-old Mark Hofmann sat in the planetarium-like “Creation Room” of the Mormon Temple in Salt Lake City, surrounded by murals of swirling clouds in pinks and grays, dressed in the full splendor of his Temple clothing: white shirt, white pants, white belt, white tie, white moccasins. He had already been washed and anointed and was now ready for the Temple-endowment Ceremony, the supersecret ritual that faithful Mormons perform at least twice a year beneath the Buck Rogers spires of their Temples, beyond the prying eyes of a skeptical world.

If any of the worshipers objected to the aesthetics or to the sexism (men were anointed “to become hereafter kings and priests unto the Most High God,” women “to become queens and priestesses to your husbands”), none dared speak out. This wasn’t just ceremony, it was rehearsal. Rehearsal for entrance into the Celestial Kingdom. And when that day came, nobody wanted to fluff his lines.

It began with prologue, a retelling of Creation—although not a version most Christians would recognize. Joseph Smith believed there were many gods, generations of gods; that the God of this world was once a man, just as all good Mormons will one day be gods in their own worlds. Smith also believed that the God of this world, the Bible’s God, was really three gods: Elohim, Jehovah, and Michael. This was partly the result of Smith’s idiosyncratic reading of the Hebrew phrase Elohim Jehovah—“Lord God”—to mean two Gods, Elohim and Jehovah, Lord and God. Michael’s origins were less clear.

All of these gods were, of course, married, many times over, although there was a principal God/wife, or “Eternal Mother.” She wasn’t mentioned in the Bible because God was afraid humans would take Her name in vain.

So, in the version of Genesis that Mark Hofmann saw, as acted out in the Temple Ceremony, God, or Elohim, didn’t actually do the creating, he ordered it done.

Jehovah, Michael. See yonder is matter unorganized. Go ye down and organize it into a world like unto the other worlds that we have heretofore organized. (If there were other gods, there had to be other worlds.)

When the drama was over, Mark and the other worshipers gave the secret salute—right arm “to the square” (forearm at shoulder level, parallel to the ground)—and Elohim reminded them of their mission: “You do sacrifice all that you have, including your own lives, if necessary, for the building up of the Kingdom of God on the earth.”

Now it was time for the real ceremony to begin: the first of the secret tokens and signs.

They are most sacred and are guarded by solemn covenants and obligations of secrecy to the effect that under no condition, even at the peril of your life, will you ever divulge them. . . .

A Temple worker demonstrated the First Token of the Aaronic Priesthood by clasping the hand of another worker, placing the joint of his thumb over the first knuckle of the hand. By any other name, it was a secret handshake.

Then came the sign of the First Token. The worker demonstrated by bringing his right arm to the square, palm to the front, fingers closed, and thumb extended.

Finally came the “execution of the penalty” for revealing the First Token or the Sign of the First Token. The worker placed his thumb under his left ear, palm down, and drew his thumb quickly across his throat, from ear to ear.

There was no mistaking that gesture.

I, Mark, do covenant and promise that I will never reveal the First Token of the Aaronic Priesthood, together with its accompanying name, sign and penalty, rather than do so I would suffer my life to be taken.

Then came another morality play, acted out by Temple workers, this one a curious parable in which Lucifer tries to bribe a preacher to sway Adam to his cause. Lest the audience titter, the worker playing Peter instructed them to “avoid all lightmindedness, loud laughter, evil speaking of the Lord’s anointed, the taking of the name of God in vain and every other unholy and impure practice.”

Once again, Mark and the others gave the secret salute—right arm to the square.

Then there was a Second Token of the Aaronic Priesthood, another secret handshake, another sign of the token, another penalty sign, and another oath.

Next came the part of the ceremony devoted to the higher Melchizedek Priesthood with its special garments (white robe; white, turban-like cap with a bow over the right ear; apron; and white moccasins) and more complicated signs and tokens like the Sign of the Nail (cupping the left hand and bringing it forward to form a square while placing the right thumb over the left hip); the Patriarchal Grip, or the Sure Sign of the Nail (interlocking little fingers); and the sign of the Second Token (raising both hands and then lowering them while repeating the incantation "Pay lay ale" three times).

Eventually, Mark was brought before the Veil of the Temple, a gauzy curtain embroidered with symbols and pierced by three holes. The symbols corresponded to the symbols on the Temple garments: the square, symbolic of the covenants he entered into in the Temple; the compass, a reminder that "all truth is circumscribed into one great whole and that desires, appetites, and passions are to be kept within the bounds the Lord has established; the navel mark, placed on the right side of the garment, over the navel, symbolic of the "constant need for nourishment to body and spirit"; and the knee mark, placed over the kneecap and indicating that "every knee shall bow and every tongue confess that Jesus is the Christ."

The holes in the veil were for the final test. Through one, a worshiper gave the secret tokens to Temple workers on the other side. Through another, the workers asked questions, and through the third, the worshiper gave the secret passwords. If all the responses were correct, there would be three taps on the magic mallet, like knocks on a door, and the person would be led around the veil—into the Celestial Kingdom.

When it was Mark's turn, he gave the five points of fellowship: inside of right foot by the side of right foot, knee to knee, breast to breast, hand to back, and mouth to ear.

He said the magic incantation: "Health in the navel, marrow in the bones, strength in the loins and in the sinews, power in the priesthood be upon me and upon my posterity through all generations of time and throughout all eternity."

He gave the secret password: "The Son."

And the Lord said, "That is correct."

Three taps with the mallet.

"What is wanted?" asked the Lord.

"Adam, having conversed with the Lord through the veil, desires now to enter His presence," intoned a Temple worker.

"Let him enter," said the Lord.

And Mark was brought into the Celestial Room, a Victorian hotel lobby filled with heavily padded chairs, for a few moments of introspection.

15 By all accounts, Mark William Hofmann was the ideal Mormon child. A little reticent socially, perhaps, and a little awkward physically, but studious, hardworking, and, above all, exceedingly deferential to his elders.

His was certainly the ideal Mormon family. His devout Mormon father, Bill, a salesman for Pitney-Bowes, had married his equally devout Mormon mother, Lucille, a seventh-generation Mormon housewife, and raised an obedient—if small—Mormon family of two girls and one boy in the ideal Mormon community of Millcreek, a prosperous suburb of Salt Lake City.

Like many Mormon men, William Hofmann ran his life with a combination of naiveté and rigidity—the former at work, the latter at home. Whether cheerleading in high school or peddling the latest get-rich scheme, salesmanship was in his blood. No promise was too extravagant, no sell too hard, no shot too long for Bill Hofmann.

At home, however, there were no deals. Most Mormons believe that they will be rewarded in the next life with worlds of their own, but in the little house on Marie Avenue, Bill Hofmann had decided to get a head start on the afterlife. Within its walls, he was already God. "Everything was black and white with Bill," according to a friend. "He couldn't deal with gray." Especially where religion was involved. When Mark, at thirteen, came home with questions about Darwin's theory of evolution and how it didn't square with Mormon doctrine, Bill Hofmann refused to hear about it.

"Your faith's not strong enough," he insisted. "If you have a testimony, your religion doesn't need proof." When Mark pressed, his father flew into a rage. No one remembers seeing him hit his children exactly, but he had a reputation for a low flashpoint, a tendency to become "a little unhinged" in arguments, especially over religion. "If it wasn't what he wanted to hear, then it just wasn't true," recalls one family friend. "And everybody else around him had to feel that way too or else they were bad—not just wrong, but evil."

Like many Mormon women, Lucille Hofmann obeyed her husband, loved her children, and clung to her religion, rising every morning at five to read the Bible and pray. A slight, red-haired woman with big, intelligent eyes, she accepted the wifely role prescribed by Mormon doctrine, leading tours in Temple Square and serving as Relief Society president for her stake, the Mormon equivalent of a diocese. Everyone knew that Lu was smarter, better read, and more thoughtful than her husband, but that, unfortunately, didn't count. In a Mormon household, it was the husband who held the priesthood. Other wives finessed the doctrine by playing Donna Reed, all wifely deference on the outside, while ruling with a mailed fist on the inside. But Lu Hofmann was too pious for pretenses.

Their second child, Mark, was born on Pearl Harbor Day, December 7, 1954, and grew up, like most Mormon children, in a house filled with dutiful family outings, frequent prayer sessions—led by Bill Hofmann—and endless Church activities. At Sunday school, he sang the usual songs—"I hope they call me on a mission"—with the other children at the ward house (the local church) and joined the usual Explorer Boy Scout troop. Although an avid reader, he languished safely in the middle of the class, or a little below the middle. His weak chin, mincing walk, high-pitched voice, and glasses would have marked him as a nerd if his grades hadn't been so low—Cs and even Ds. Except that somehow everyone, from his friends at school to his family at home, believed his grades were very good.

He wasn't a bad athlete: "untalented but determined," according to one of his few friends. In the end, though, he didn't have much choice but to be a loner. Even his own cousin shunned him in the halls. In high school, he chose a loner's sport, track, and lifted weights.

To others, it looked like a bland but happy and typical Mormon adolescence—typical hobbies for a boy growing up in Utah: hunting (rabbits), camping, waterskiing, coin collecting. Typical summer jobs: roofing houses, bagging groceries (he was promoted to head of the vegetable department). Even his troublemaking was typical: a run-in with a teacher who caught him with his head down during class, a speeding ticket, flashing fake SOS signals to a park ranger on a camping trip to East Canyon Reservoir, harassing cats and dogs with buckshot, shooting off illegal firecrackers.

And some overeager experimenting with his chemistry set. Once, when he was fourteen, he poured some wood alcohol into a heated beaker, covered it, and waited too long. The explosion sounded like a hard-hit baseball shattering a plate-glass window, somewhere between a pop and a ping and the end of the world. Mark tried to take cover but a jagged hunk of glass caught him under the chin, simultaneously tearing a gash in the skin and filling it with scalding wood alcohol. The miscalculation had left a thick, ugly yellow scar on his neck.

But even by Bill Hofmann's standards, a young boy was allowed to be rambunctious every once in a while. Nothing strange in that. At the appropriate time, he would settle down and act responsibly.

When he graduated from high school in 1973, Mark planned to go to college and study to be a doctor. "I want to save lives," he told a friend.

Mark Hofmann did have one secret. A secret so deep and filled with shame that he never told a soul about it.

The trouble began in 1836 when an attractive servant girl named Fannie Alger walked into Joseph Smith's life. Smith, who had moved his new religion from Palmyra, New York, to Kirtland, Ohio, instantly took a shine to the attractive young Fannie, as he had previously to a number of the female members of his flock. There was just one problem: Smith's wife Emma. Not long afterward, Joseph had a revelation from God:

Verily, thus saith the Lord . . . if any man espouse a virgin, and desire to espouse another, and the first give her consent, and if he espouse the second, and they are virgins, and have vowed to no other man, then is he justified; he cannot commit adultery for they are given unto him. . . .

In other words, Joseph Smith could marry Fannie Alger in addition to Emma. For good measure, the Lord added a postscript addressed to Emma. "And let my handmaid, Emma Smith," He said, "receive all those that have been given unto my servant Joseph." Fearing the worst, Joseph sent his brother, Hyrum, to deliver the revelation to the hot-tempered Emma. "I believe I can convince her of its truth," Hyrum said to Joseph before setting out, "and you will hereafter have peace."

Joseph knew better. "You do not know Emma as well as I do," he said to Hyrum.

Joseph was right. When Hyrum read the revelation, the only "piece" Emma Smith wanted was out of Joseph's hide. She gave Hyrum a tongue lashing and when Joseph later handed her the written revelation, promptly threw it in the fireplace. When asked why he would let Emma destroy a revelation from God, Smith replied he "could rewrite it at any time if necessary." Eventually Emma capitulated, and Joseph went on to marry not only Fannie Alger but at least forty-seven other women (hundreds more were "sealed" to him in eternity).

By 1844, the year Joseph Smith was martyred by an angry mob in Carthage, Illinois, polygamy, or "plural marriage" as the Mormons preferred to call it, had become the best-known and certainly most titillating feature of Mormonism. Salt Lake City, where the faithful settled in 1847 under the leadership of Smith's successor, Brigham Young, became the Plato's Retreat of the Wild West. Farmers threw lavish parties at which their wives could inspect the newest nubile prospects and help choose, in a kind of sorority rush, their husband's next bride.

Not surprisingly, the demand for brides soon outstripped the supply of new converts from Europe and the East. The problem was compounded, apparently, by libidinous missionaries who were "skimming off" the inventory. "The brother missionaries have been in the habit of picking out the prettiest women for themselves before they get here, and bringing only the ugly ones for us," complained Heber C. Kimball, an early Church official. Speaking for all the men of Salt Lake City, Kimball ordered the missionaries: "Hereafter you have to bring them all here before taking any of them, and let us all have a fair shake."

Mormon male leaders proved endlessly inventive in justifying their "peculiar institution." They argued that Jesus himself was a polygamist (they could name only Elizabeth, Mary Magdalene, and Martha as wives, but insisted there was "a host of others"). Even God was polygamous. "We have now clearly shown," declared Orson Pratt, an early Church leader, "that God the Father had a plurality of wives . . . by whom He begat our spirits as well as the spirit of Jesus His first born. . . ." In support of his claim, Pratt offered a simple mathematical calculation: "[I]t would have required over one hundred thousand million of years for the same mother to have given birth to this vast family."

So, of course, God simply had to have not one wife, but hundreds.

Some even tried to portray polygamy as a moral boon, attacking the one-wife system as a "source of prostitution and whoredom." Polygamy, they argued, was a bulwark against promiscuity. Polygamy reduced the temptations that beset married men, eliminated the need for mistresses and adultery, and—and this was the best part—it kept men strong and virile. "I have noticed that a man who has but one wife, and is inclined to that doctrine, soon begins to wither and dry up," Kimball told the Deseret News, "while a man who goes into plurality looks fresh, young, and sprightly."

The sprightly men of Salt Lake City bought every word, but to Victorian America it all added up to one thing, legalized prostitution.

For a while, Mormon leaders thumbed their noses at the Gentiles in Washington and their laws against polygamy. "I live above the law," declared Brigham Young, who had accumulated twenty-seven wives, "and so do this people." Polygamy was divinely ordained, he insisted, and "no power on earth can suppress it, unless you crush and destroy the entire people. . . . A man that enters this Church ought to be able to die for its principles if necessary." "Polygamy was revealed by God," the Church announced in the Deseret News in 1865. "To ask them to give up such an item of Belief, is to ask them to relinquish the whole, to acknowledge their priesthood a lie, their ordinances a deception, and all that they have toiled for, lived for, bled for, or hoped for, a miserable failure and a waste of life." Just to make sure there was no doubt about where He stood, the Lord spoke to Wilford Woodruff, fourth president of the Church, at least twice to reiterate that plural marriage was nonnegotiable.

But all that changed in 1887, when the federal government seized all Mormon property, including Temple Square. To the hardworking, materialistic Mormons, dying for principles was one thing, but surrendering their property was something else. Eventually, the Lord came around to the government's view. He appeared to Woodruff and "showed me by vision and revelation exactly what would happen if we did not stop this practice," said Woodruff. In 1890 the Church issued a manifesto banning plural marriages.

But nothing really changed. The manifesto was just a ruse for Washington's sake, a public relations ploy, a sop to Congress on the eve of Utah's application for statehood. In fact, the Mormons had no intention of giving up their wives. Church leaders continued to perform polygamous marriages even as they condemned the practice in public. Joseph F.

Smith, the sixth president of the Church, had eleven children by five wives and performed plural marriages on ships in international waters long after the practice was supposedly banned by God.

To ensure that witnesses could not inform on those who performed these illegal marriages, the vows were often read from behind a curtain. Polygamy became the Church's little secret, something to be hidden from the outside world, from the federal marshals who came snooping around, and from the congressional committees investigating Utah's statehood.

In defense of the deception, Church leaders claimed they were "lying for the Lord."

In the end, however, not even Congress was fooled. Its report concluded: "The leaders of this church, the first presidency and the twelve apostles, connive at the practice of taking plural wives, and have done so ever since the manifesto was issued which purported to put an end to the practice."

Gradually, as the Church was transformed from a radical sect into an ultraconservative social institution, the crackdown on polygamy grew teeth. By 1904, a man could be excommunicated for taking a second wife. References to polygamy were expunged from official Church histories, students at Church-sponsored schools like Brigham Young University who had the effrontery to mention it in their papers had the references crossed out with the remark, "Too controversial." Professors were forbidden to write or speak of it.

Meanwhile, the human cost was devastating. Years of hypocrisy and deception threw generations of Mormon husbands and wives into legal limbo. Children suddenly found themselves illegitimate. To avoid federal agents, they took on false names, wore disguises, and developed an elaborate early-warning system. Children had to be brought into the conspiracy at an early age. According to one account, "Not talking to strangers, being part of a warning system, and being taught outright falsification were all elements in their training during those years." Like their leaders, they learned to lie for the Lord.

Far worse than the hiding, however, was the sense of spiritual abandonment as the Church reversed its position. Now their souls were in jeopardy. They felt betrayed by their leaders. For many families, polygamy became a secret shame.

One of those families was Lucille Hofmann's.

Her parents had been married from behind a curtain. From the time she was old enough to talk, they had told her repeatedly, Don't talk to strangers, don't say anything, and if anyone asks you if your father has two wives, deny it. At all costs, she was to guard the family's dark secret.

Mark Hofmann may have respected his father, according to family friends, but he adored his mother. Her shame was his shame. Anything that hurt her, hurt him. That's why, when she finally confessed the family secret that had tormented her for so long, he was furious at the Church. "Institutionalized deceit," he called it. He ran to the Church genealogical libraries, determined to find out who, in fact, had married his mother's parents. He made a list of all the Church officials who had the authority to perform marriages at the time. Then he began eliminating names: one was on a mission, one was at a conference, another was on a trip. Finally he eliminated every name but one: Joseph W. Summerhays, a prominent businessman and Church leader. The hypocrisy of it all outraged him.

He confronted his father.

"You just need more faith," Bill Hofmann told him. It takes faith to follow the Church's teachings.

Which teachings, Mark demanded, the old ones or the new ones?

"Whatever the current Church believes."

But like many Mormon boys with doubts, Mark was already caught up in the intriguing, Masonic-like initiation rites of the Mormon priesthood, the secret passwords, the secret handshakes, the special garments. On December 2, 1973, in a Temple Ceremony, he was received into the Melchizedek Priesthood. In his blessing, Patriarch Frank Carl Berg (a building contractor who worked out of his home on Preston Street), informed Mark that he was "descended from worthy ancient patriarchs that lived upon the earth anciently, even from Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob." Specifically, Mark's ancestor was Ephraim, "a worthy son of Joseph." "Ephraim was given an important blessing," intoned Elder Berg, "in which he was told that through him and his posterity the righteous would receive their knowledge of truth.

"You will rejoice in the special work you will be called to do. A burning will come into your soul and you will know that you are about your Heavenly Father's business. . . . Yes, you are truly a worthy son that has been given a special assignment to fill in this mortal world. . . ."

The next step was a "mission."

Almost every good Mormon male is "called" by God to perform missionary duty in another state or another country. (God rarely calls young Mormon women.) God's summons is very specific. He not only tells you to go, He tells you where to go.

In 1974, God told Mark Hofmann to go to southwest England.

He made a good missionary, though not a great one. In a report listing the number of hours each missionary spent on the road proselytizing, he ranked forty-ninth out of 208. It wasn't easy work, especially for a diffident loner. Like a pack of young lions tracking a herd, the young missionaries preyed on the old, the sick, and the lame. The Church's research had shown that the most likely converts were blue-collar, lower-class workers unhappy with their low station in life, and those whose "ramparts were broken." "Your rampart is your circle of friends and your sense of a coherent life," explains a former missionary. "When people move, change jobs, get divorced—their ramparts are broken, and that's when they're most susceptible to conversion. Those were the people they told us to go after."

Hofmann spent the next two years making banal entries in his journal, engaging in occasional "Bible bashes"—heated debates with missionaries from other sects, especially the Jehovah's Witnesses—and studying Mormon doctrine. His fellow missionaries considered him quiet, intelligent, and bland—typically Mormon.

And he returned from his mission in 1976 with typical doubts. "I guess the Mormon Church only wins by default," he told a fellow missionary. "I just can't find any other Church that is true, that I can feel is true. At least the Mormon Church is better than any other."

For many young Mormons, the mission is an eye opener. After eighteen years in the Mormon stronghold of Utah, they discover that not only is there a world outside of Mormonism—a world that drinks and smokes and swears and fornicates and stays up late—but that that world is, at best, skeptical of, at worst, hostile toward Mormonism. Many never recover from the shock. A high school friend of Hofmann's, Jeff Salt (who had gone no farther than Florida), was one of many missionaries who in the process of trying to convert the benighted, almost joined their ranks.

When Hofmann entered Utah State in 1976, he chose to room with Jeff Salt. There were endless late-night, soul-searching discussions of religion that first semester. Hofmann admitted that he had first doubted when he picked up a book on Darwin at age thirteen and realized that Darwin's survival-of-the-fittest theory directly contradicted Joseph Smith's eternal progression from the Pre-Existence to the Celestial Kingdom.

Once again, Mark tried to bring his doubts home, to family dinners, to Bill Hofmann.

What about these discrepancies? Mark would demand.

"Nit-picking," Bill Hofmann would say.

Mark would run to his room to get a book or an article to bolster his point.

But Bill Hofmann never looked at them. "He was intimidated by ideas," according to a family friend, "by thoughts, intellectualism. Everything was from the heart, not the head."

"Concentrate on the value of the Church as a whole," he would tell his son, according to the same family friend.

But the books. . . .

"Put your faith in the living Church."

But the history. . . .

"Don't get hung up on history. Look at it as it is now, and as it affects your life now."

But the Prophet said. . . .

"Don't be so concerned about what some Prophet said or didn't say."

But it keeps changing. . . .

"What you need is more faith."

Infuriated, Mark went back to school and wrote out his beliefs in a page-long letter. He was an atheist. He didn't trust the Church or its leaders. Why did they hide things from its members? Like the truth about polygamy. It was dishonest. He planned to send the statement to his mother. She was a victim herself. Surely she would understand.

Bill Hofmann must have tried to tell himself that this was all normal; that Mark was just finding himself. It was typical for missionaries to return with doubts. Mark was just going through a trial. His faith was strong, and it would triumph in the end.

When Lu Hofmann read the letter, if she read it, she put it away and never said a word to her husband. As for any doubts about the Church she may have shared with her son, they would undoubtedly be resolved in time.

Right now, what Mark needed, they agreed, was a good wife.

One Sunday that first year at Utah State, Bill and Lu Hofmann drove up from Salt Lake City to Logan, about eighty miles, to visit their son. Like most of their visits, it was unannounced. If Mark knew in advance they were coming, he might make some special arrangements, so it was better if they just surprised him. Mark understood the real purpose of the no-warning policy. On their last visit, he hadn't had time to take down his Farrah Fawcett-Majors poster. Lucille Hofmann took one look and it was down. She didn't have to say a word. It was replaced by a poster she gave him with a Mormon devotional message.

This Sunday, the Hofmanns made another, similar discovery.

"Mark's not here," Jeff Salt told them.

"Where is he?" In church perhaps?

"Sunday afternoons, he's at Jill's," said Salt.

For a twenty-one-year-old boy who had never dated, never even kissed a girl before, Jill Stone was quite a catch. Friends called it "beginner's luck." How could Mark Hofmann, a detached, often arrogant, somewhat wimpy science major, attract this tall, tanned, dark-haired girl with a shapely body and pretty face? He was usually quiet, she was extremely verbal; he was sarcastic (if seldom funny), she was always serious; he wore T-shirts and jeans, she wore anything tight and black; he was aloof toward girls, she was flirtatious toward boys; he was a cultural cipher, she played the piano, and well. On the surface, about the only things they seemed to have in common were blue eyes and a taste for off-beat people.

Mark didn't just woo her, he laid siege to her. For whatever reason, he wanted to have a wife—and Mark Hofmann had a way of getting what he wanted. He wrote her cute little notes telling her how much he loved her, bought her flowers—"Not just the red-roses-once-a-year routine," she says—and thoughtful presents like a copy of the Book of Mormon bound in white leather and a gold teddy bear on a chain. He told her how much he liked her long dark hair, the way she did her makeup, the way she dressed. She was such a lady. At that, Jill surrendered without a fight.

She was the oldest of three daughters raised by an Idaho rancher.

Inevitably, that meant being raised like an eldest son, so Jill found being treated like a lady a new and exhilarating experience. “Oh, Markie,” she gushed. She told him how selfless and noble he was for giving up a lucrative future in medicine in favor of a life of helping people through medical research. To friends she bragged about her gallant young beau from an excellent Mormon family.

Maybe they didn’t share the same intellectual interests, but at least he could talk—so many boys couldn’t—and talk very intelligently, at that. Maybe he was a little on the nerdy side, but then, with her interest in classical music and her serious outlook on life, she was hardly the frivolous, fun-loving, sorority type herself.

When Jill threw out his dirty jeans and unkempt T-shirts and bought him the kind of preppy clothes that befitted a boyfriend of hers, Mark didn’t complain. His mother had always bought his clothes anyway.

In April, only four months after they started dating, Mark popped the question, and Jill said yes. Yes, but: she wanted a long engagement “so we can get to know each other better.” Mark reluctantly agreed to wait one year. To mark his claim, however, he bought her a huge one-carat diamond ring. Jill was touched by the gift but troubled by the message that accompanied it. “You’re too flirtatious,” he told her. “This ring will let everybody know you’re already taken.”

That was Jill’s first hint that Mark was “dealing from two decks.”

What, for example, did he think about the Church?

On the one hand, he railed against it. “It’s all a joke,” he would say. “The Book of Mormon is a fairy tale.” And then—as if it came to him as an afterthought—“God is dead.” He always wanted to argue with her about it. He showed her books and articles and research papers. He took her to visit well-known anti-Mormon activists. “Don’t you see how strongly I feel?” he protested. “It’s important to me to find things out about the history of the Church so I can prove it’s not true.” He seemed to think these were explosive ideas and waited for Jill to counterattack.

Jill wondered what all the fuss was about. Although she considered herself a good Mormon, she didn’t really believe that Joseph Smith had found gold plates on a hillside in New York State. She wondered if anybody did, except maybe a few old relics at Church headquarters. The real strength of the Mormon Church wasn’t the doctrine, anyway; it was the people, the family and community values. “I am a Christian first; that’s my real priority,” she told him. “All I really care about is living a good life, having a nice family, and being, you know, a useful member of society.”

Why did Mark take every little thing so personally? "Why are you getting so fanatical?" she would ask. "It's just history."

What she truly didn't understand was why he still considered himself a Mormon. Why did he still go with her to church every Sunday? Why did he still pay his tithe? Why did he still present himself to the outside world as a good and faithful Mormon if he had such strong antagonisms? Why was he so obsessed with appearances? Surely it wasn't for her sake. She had been raised in a split family: Protestant father, Mormon mother, and they had gotten along just fine. As long as he let her raise their children as Christians, they could live together happily, Mormon or not.

"If you're really not into the Mormon faith," she told him impatiently, "don't devote your life to tearing it down. Walk away from it."

But for some reason Mark couldn't do that. He couldn't let go.

Once they were engaged, she couldn't do anything right. "Tone down the way you dress," he commanded. "Don't be so visible." One day she came home and found him in her apartment uninvited. When she went to her closet, she noticed some things were missing: a halter top, a sheer blouse—just the kind of flashy clothes Mark always complained about. When she accused him of taking them, he didn't even bother to deny it.

She was too independent. "Let's go get our blood tests," she suggested one day.

"We can put it off," he said.

Procrastinating as usual, she thought. "Let's just go do it and get it over with," she insisted.

She just plain thought too much. When he mentioned that he was considering dropping out of school, she had the gall to have her own opinion on the subject. "I think it's a lousy idea," she said.

She was bossy and overbearing. "Grate the cheese," she told him one night when they were fixing pizza at his apartment.

"Why are you always telling me what to do?" he exploded, his face turning bright red. Suddenly Mark was frothing at the mouth, gesticulating wildly. "I'm sick of you trying to control my life," he screamed. "Sick, sick, sick, SICK!" While Jeff Salt stood and watched, his jaw dangling in disbelief, Mark grabbed Jill's arms and threw her against the wall.

Not about to be manhandled by this crazed choirboy, she grabbed the nearest thing in reach, a dishwasher-safe plate, and batted him over the head, hoping maybe a good lump would bring him to his senses.

But two weeks later he did it again.

She was "too social." She had too many friends. When an old boyfriend came to visit her, Mark and Jeff Salt hid in the bushes and kept an all-night vigil with a pair of binoculars. Mark took down the boyfriend's license plate number and somehow traced it through the Department of Motor Vehicles. The next day, with the boyfriend's name in hand, he accused Jill of sleeping with him. She tried to slough it off—"You're ridiculous," she told him—but Mark was sure he was right. Not long afterward, he walked into the room when she was on the telephone with the same old boyfriend.

"Who was that?" he demanded.

"I don't have to tell you," she said and hung up.

"Then I'll find out for myself." He grabbed the phone and dialed the operator. "My twelve-year-old daughter just made a call that I shouldn't be paying for. If you could give me the number, I can charge her for it. She needs to learn to be responsible for her own expenses." The operator gave him the number.

Jill was furious. Mark was even more furious.

But he never stopped planning the wedding.

He chose the place—the Temple in Salt Lake, where his parents had been married (even though Jill's parents would have to wait outside during the ceremony, since her father wasn't a member of the Church). He chose the time—September 1977, instead of the original date the following June. He even chose the wedding dress—a Victorian extravaganza with a high neck, ruffles at the top and bottom, long lace sleeves, faux pearls, a huge train, and a profusion of slips forming a glorious full poof. It was a sixteen-year-old girl's fantasy—and just like the dress his mother had worn. There would be two wedding receptions, one in Idaho, the other in Salt Lake. More than five hundred people were invited.

But Lucille Hofmann was having second thoughts. Finding a wife for Mark was one of her highest priorities, but it had to be the right wife.

All along, Lu Hofmann had been concerned that Mark's relationship with Jill was too "liberated," that Jill was too "negative," too "willful," not Mormon enough. Once she even took matters into her own hands, telling Jill, "You'll have to be more respectful if you want to make a marriage work." But that wasn't enough. As the wedding date approached, Mark pointedly reported to Jill the negative feedback he was getting from home: "They think you aren't religious enough, or traditional enough, or subservient enough to make a good wife for me."

Or socially prominent enough. Bill and Lu Hofmann thought their brilliant, young pre-med son deserved nothing less than the daughter of a leader of the community—preferably the daughter of a General Authority.

Eight days before the big day, Mark called Jill and canceled the wedding. No explanations, no apologies, no wedding.

Three days later, he called back. “Jill, you question me too much. You question what I do. You disagree with what I feel religiously. And you’re way too visible. You have a huge circle of friends. You’re way too extroverted. You could never be what I have to have in a wife. You could never be more compliant, more . . . more. . . .”

“More like Lucille Hofmann,” she completed the sentence under her breath. It was almost as if he had some plans for the future, she thought, plans that required a wife who wouldn’t ask questions, who wouldn’t have friends traipsing through the house, who would rely on him utterly, who could be trusted to keep some secret. And he was right: that wasn’t her.

Two years later, Mark married Doralee Olds, a freshman at Utah State whom he had met the previous fall in the laundry room of his apartment complex. She couldn’t have been more different from Jill: small and skinny with mouse-brown hair and a wardrobe filled with worn jeans and old T-shirts. When asked about her good points, friends would say, “She’s a very simple girl” or “She’s good at planning things.” “Dorie’s not an aggressive sort of person,” says one friend. “She just wanted to get married and stay home and have kids and make cookies and not have to worry about taking care of herself in the big, bad world.”

In July 1980, Mark and Dorie moved to Sandy, a suburb south of Salt Lake City.

Like the typical young Mormon wife, Dorie bore three babies in quick succession: Michael, Karen, Lisa. Like the typical young Mormon husband, Mark ignored her, put on weight, and played with the babies. (Feeding, diapering, and bathing them he left entirely to her.) Like the typical young Mormon couple, they went to church and to Sunday school every Sunday and were reasonably active in the ward. Dorie became a counselor in the Relief Society Presidency, teaching homemaking skills—cooking, quilting and sewing, home decorating, budgeting, and health. Mark served in the Elders Quorum Presidency.

Neighbors didn’t see much of them, but what they saw they liked. Dorie was “sweet and wholesome” they thought, “a typical girl next door.” Mark “kept to himself” but “loved his kids.” They remembered the time, in 1981, when he came to the aid of a lady down the street whose house needed new shingles but who couldn’t afford a roofer. Mark organized a work crew at the ward house. "Don't you worry about a thing," he told her. "You just let me take care of it." The day they planned to do the work, a storm blew up and it poured rain, but Mark just kept working through the lightning and thunder. He was afraid if they didn't finish, the roof would leak.

"Mark, get down from there and go home!" the woman called to him as he worked in the rain, soaking wet.

"No, no. There's only a little bit more to do."

"Let me pay you," she insisted when he was finished.

"Oh, no," Mark said pleasantly. "Helping your neighbor is what Mormonism is all about."

18 Mark Hofmann's obsession with the past began simply enough, with coin collecting—the perfect activity for a non-athletic, socially inept, and overly controlled twelve-year-old boy. Except Mark didn't do it for the same reason other boys played football or dated girls. He didn't even do it for the same reason other boys collected stamps or baseball cards. Mark did it for one reason and one reason only: money. He would buy rolls of pennies and sit quietly for hours, days, in his room, going through tens of thousands of pennies looking for the defect, the mint mark, or the date that might make a penny worth a nickel or a dollar, or maybe even a hundred dollars.

One day, Mark took a friend, Ralph Feurer, down to his basement workshop.

"This is my electroplate set," he said proudly, pointing to a stainless-steel tank, a rectifier, some wires, and several bottles of solutions.

"What's it do?" asked Feurer, an affable, athletic boy who was always bemused by Mark's mysterious projects.

"You put these clips on and you can build up metal."

"That's great, but what do you use it for?"

Mark, who had been waiting for that question, held up a dime. "You see this mint mark," he explained, pointing at the tiny letter on the head side of the coin. "If that says one thing, this dime's worth about two dollars. But if it has a different mint mark, it would be a much, much rarer coin and would be worth hundreds and hundreds of dollars. With this electroplate set I can change the mint mark. I can take an old one off and build a new one up.”

Not long afterward, Mark sent a rare dime to the American Numismatic Association in Colorado Springs for authentication. They sent back a letter stating the coin’s value and instructing him, “Please send us 3 percent of the value of the coin.” Mark sent them the money, and they returned the coin, along with a certificate verifying its authenticity.

When Feurer heard the story, he asked Mark if the coin was genuine. “Of course it’s genuine,” Mark said with a smile. He had an unpleasant way of smiling without showing his teeth. The corners of his mouth would tighten, as if on a drawstring, and his lips would thin to a line that looked more like an incision than a smile. “If the American Numismatic Association says it’s genuine, why then it’s genuine.”

It wasn’t long before Mark’s remarkable success in coin collecting merged with the other great preoccupation of his life. In 1967, at the age of thirteen, he began collecting Mormon memorabilia. His very first purchase was a $5 note from Joseph Smith’s short-lived bank, the Kirtland Safety Society. It was signed by Smith himself. Mark paid what was, for a thirteen-year-old, the huge sum of $250.

And that was just the beginning. Before long, he was selling and trading little “odds and ends” of Mormonabilia and studying the collection of early Church materials at the Wilford C. Wood Museum in Bountiful. By the time he graduated from high school, Mormon history was no longer just a hobby, it was an obsession.

And what a history it was.

Beginning with the story of Israelites sailing to America in 600 B.C. on a boat designed by God, as related in the Book of Mormon, it was a curious history indeed.

There were those hundreds of revelations from God to Joseph Smith, many of them amounting to little more than “Stop bothering Joseph Smith” or “Give Joseph Smith your money” or “Let Joseph Smith marry your daughter.” Never in the history of religion had a supreme being found it necessary to talk at such length and with such specificity to one of his servants.

There was that awkward passage in the Book of Abraham, “translated” by Joseph Smith, that cast blacks into eternal disfavor for sinning in the Pre-Existence. The Church’s policy of excluding blacks from the priesthood had stood against all attempts at reform during the civil rights movement. But then, in the 1970s, a Stanford University official declared that if the B.Y.U. basketball team ever wanted to play Stanford again, the Mormon Church would have to “reinterpret God’s word and establish doctrines compatible with Stanford’s policies.” After a decent interval, the Prophet did have a new revelation reversing the Church’s position on blacks.

It was only the most recent embarrassment in a history already marred by murder, forgery, fraud, boundless lust, betrayal, and power politics—to say nothing of polygamy. With a history like that, it wasn’t surprising that the Church in which Mark Hofmann grew up, was, to put it mildly, ambivalent about its past. Rather than study history, early Mormon historians preferred to rewrite it—or just forget it.

The process of revision began soon after the Church began. Joseph Smith himself recounted at least three different versions of the all-important First Vision, his initial encounter with God at age fourteen. In one version, for example, God appeared to him with Jesus and some angels, in another version the angels stayed home.

When Smith died, the Church immediately set to work revising his story—more than doubling the length of his History of the Church, for example, putting the additions into the first person and claiming that they were Smith’s own. The Church also deleted some material. In his version, Smith had written that he drank a “glass of beer at Moesser’s.” The line was dropped in later editions. When a memoir by Lucy Mack Smith, the Prophet’s mother, was published in 1853, word went out from the First Presidency that all copies of the book should be “gathered up and destroyed, so that no copies should be left.” Brigham Young later appointed a “committee of revision” to “correct” the book. The commission added 436 words, changed 220, and deleted altogether another 1,379.

Over the years, other revisions were made in Smith’s biography: the fact that he declared Missouri, not Utah, to be Zion, the land promised by God to His people; the fact that he urged moderation, not abstinence, in drinking; and especially the fact that he broke his own rules to confer priesthoods on Elijah Abel, a black man, and, according to some accounts, Emma, his wife.

Brigham Young, too, left a trail of embarrassing historical facts that had to be excised from the record, among them the cover-up of the Mountain Meadows massacre, an Indian raid planned and supervised by Young's men in which 150 men, women, and children were killed; various murders; counterfeiting charges; bizarre plans to create a wilderness kingdom and crown himself king; and dipping his rather large hand into the Church's tithing till. (While sponsoring communitarian values for the faithful, Young himself amassed a vast personal fortune.)

Around the turn of the century, even the revisions had to be revised. In the drive for statehood, Church leaders had decided that the time had come to enter the mainstream, to become respectable, and thus began a period known as the Great Accommodation. That meant no discussion of polygamy or Blood Atonement or communitarianism or anything else that sounded even vaguely cultish. Great chunks of Mormonism's lusty and colorful but decidedly fringe history disappeared overnight.

The Church was forced to deny its common roots with the secret society of Masons, a fraternal organization with elaborate ceremonies and arcane symbology. Smith had "restored" an ancient Christian ceremony that the Masons had bungled. When it was pointed out that Joseph Smith had joined the Masons just two months before devising the Temple Ceremony, the Church claimed it was just coincidence. And the dozens of exact parallels in the two ceremonies (including many word-for-word borrowings)? Just coincidence.

Why did the Mormons flee from Missouri in 1839? The official Church response was that persecution by local non-Mormons forced them out. Which was the truth, but not the whole truth: the fact that Joseph Smith formed a small band of storm troopers called the Danites, who robbed and burned the property of local non-Mormons, was simply dropped from the histories. As were Smith's orders to "murder and plunder the enemies of the Saints." Officially, the Church denied that the Danites existed at all. When confronted with documents proving their existence, the Church argued that Joseph Smith knew nothing about their activities. When confronted with evidence that he did, the Church argued that their activities were justified.

What couldn't be denied or justified was simply not talked about, like the Mountain Meadows massacre. The official Church policy was, according to one historian, to "shrink from it, to discredit any who try to inquire into it, to refuse to discuss it," and to refuse "to accept all the evidence. . . ."

The early Church, like many utopian sects of the nineteenth century, had practiced blatant communism: not just good community values, not just helping people in need, but red-blooded communism: "From each according to his abilities, to each according to his needs." The idea came to Joseph Smith himself in a revelation from God (later called the Law of Consecration and Stewardship): Church members were to hand their property over to the Church (i.e., to Joseph Smith), who would then give them back what they needed, making them "stewards," while keeping the rest in the hands of the Church (i.e., his hands) for the benefit of the poor.

Communalism was taken up more eagerly still by Brigham Young as a solution to taming the hard frontier of 1860s Utah. Even as he himself became a highly successful frontier capitalist, Young created a series of experimental frontier cooperative communities, including, notably, Brigham City, in which, according to one historian, "the entire economic life of this community of 400 families was owned and directed by the cooperative association."

Needless to say, especially during the McCarthy era, a mainstream institution couldn't be seen as embracing communism. So yet another important aspect of the early Church conveniently disappeared from the record.

Where it could, the Church simply rewrote the history books. In 1965, for example, Parley P. Pratt's 1855 Key to the Science of Theology was rewritten to remove the lengthy discussion of polygamy. Missionaries fanned out to libraries across the country offering to exchange old publications for "more up-to-date material." To most librarians, the deal offered by the young missionaries was too good to pass up. The missionaries would hand them the new books, then suggest helpfully, "Now that you have these books which tell the truth about our religion, undoubtedly you would like to discard other books in the library which tell lies about the Mormon Church. Other libraries have been glad to have this pointed out to them."

When a Mormon historian, Fawn Brodie, dared to write a neutral—and widely acclaimed—biography of Joseph Smith, No Man Knows My History, the Church promptly excommunicated her and published a shrill pamphlet in response called No, Ma'am, That's Not History, written by the Church's most beloved historian, Hugh Nibley. The pamphlet made up in sarcasm what it lacked in historical argument or analysis, referring variously to the author, a respected professor at UCLA, as "Mrs. Brodie," "Mrs. B.," and "the lady."

But what about those things the Church couldn't deny, delete, or discredit? What about the documentary record that proved all the embarrassing truths? The Church had a place for those too.

The Vault. It sounded like the title of a Kafka novel. The Vault was the final resting place of all the uncomfortable truths. Its contents, according to legend, would shake the foundations of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints. Any document, letter, record, or journal that was too "hot," that might cast doubt on the Prophet or on Church doctrine, was locked up forever in The Vault. No one knew exactly where it was—except that it was somewhere in the First Presidency building, a great stone, banklike structure near Temple Square, the sanctum sanctorum of Church business. The Vault's walls were said to be sixteen feet thick. It was filled with gold. It was as big as an underground garage. Only the Prophet himself knew the combination.

No one knew exactly what was in it, either, and in the absence of information, speculation ran wild. According to one account, it contained the Urim and Thummim, the seer stones that Joseph Smith had used to "translate" the Book of Mormon. Others thought it must contain the missing 116 pages of the Book of Mormon. Some even suggested that the golden plates themselves had disappeared into The Vault. But why would the Church want to hide such things? What could be so damaging that it had to be kept secret from the faithful?

Church spokesmen, of course, denied everything. At first, they even denied there was such a vault. Then they denied that it contained anything. Then that it contained anything sensitive. Then that they ever bothered to go inside. When asked why no one, not even their own historians, was allowed to review the materials, they argued that the contents were personal, mostly private journals of early Church leaders that contained embarrassing "intimate revelations." They cited in particular, the diary of George Q. Cannon, a former president of the Church. The diary contained repeated references to members of the Church who had confessed to some sin or other, and it was felt that those confessions deserved something like priest-penitent confidentiality.

True or not, few believed it. Some tested the explanation and requested to see the journals of their own ancestors. Hugh Nibley asked to see a relative's diary that he himself had given to the Church only a few years before. His request was denied. A descendant of Frederick G. Williams, an early first counselor to the First Presidency of the Church, asked to see Williams's journal. The Church denied having it. It later turned up in the custody of Joseph Fielding Smith, the Church historian for forty nine years before becoming president in 1970. Dozens of similar requests were turned away with polite circumlocutions or, if one pressed, outright lies. "If you had the discourtesy to ask them a direct question," according to one critic, "they had a right to tell you what they needed to tell you in order to make you go away."

That approach worked fine—as long as nobody dug up any new skeletons.

20 The policy of "lie and deny" kept the lid on Mormon history, but it was a public relations disaster. Anti-Mormon groups had a field day, accusing the Church of stonewalling its own members. What thinking person could believe a church that was afraid of its own past? From the other side, polygamists accused the Church of denying its true heritage at their expense. To the world, the LDS Church was looking more and more like an institution with something to hide.

Finally, the Church caved in. Nothing that might come out could possibly do more harm than all the bad P.R. and speculation about the Church's secrets. In 1972, the Council of the Twelve appointed a new head of the Church Historical Department: Leonard J. Arrington.

The son of an Idaho farmer, Arrington was hardly a radical, but he was unlike anything the Historical Department had ever seen. For years, it had been staffed exclusively by "a bunch of shirttail relatives of the General Authorities and people who had drifted there because they couldn't drift anywhere else," according to one insider. "Basically, they were people who had the combinations to the locks."

In marked contrast, Arrington was a genuine historian—there had never been one in the Historical Department—and a good one. Although a devout Mormon, he had criticized the Church for not being more open about its past, and especially about the contents of The Vault. "It is unfortunate for the cause of Mormon history," he had written, "that the Church Historian's Library, which is in possession of virtually all of the diaries of leading Mormons, has not seen fit to publish these diaries or to permit qualified historians to use them without restriction." He also refused to heap the ritual scorn on Brodie's biography of Joseph Smith, calling it more credible than the official biographies, which he described as "undeviating pictures of sweetness and light."

He even had the gumption to make some demands. His publications would not pass through the process known euphemistically as "Church correlation." They would not be censored by a panel of Church functionaries. "I won't have the publications submitted to people who will take out facts that are facts," he declared. "I will be the correlation committee. I will attest to the factual accuracy of the books." Although he would allow an "advisory member," chosen by the General Authorities, to read his books before publication, the advisor would not be allowed to edit them—something that General Authorities had always done as a matter of divine right.

To everyone's astonishment, especially Arrington's, the Church agreed to his demands, although they did appoint Apostle Boyd Packer, sometimes known as "Darth Packer" for his imperial views on Church authority and dogma, to act as advisor to the department. When asked how he would deal with the special sensitivities of Church leaders like Packer, Arrington—equal parts optimist and diplomat—would say: "There are ways to say things that are more discreet than others, and we will try to be discreet about what we do. But we won't compromise our integrity."

Fired by the conviction that "you could turn over any rock in Mormonism and you could easily find something that would support the traditional story," Arrington laid out an ambitious slate of new projects: a one-volume history of the Church for a mainstream Mormon audience (told in "a way to educate Latter-day Saints while still leaving them feeling good"); another one-volume history for a non-Mormon audience to be written by Arrington himself; and, finally, the pièce de résistance, a massive, definitive, sixteen-volume scholarly history of the Church to be written by various scholars.

It was a thrilling idea—actually throwing the spotlight of history on all aspects of the Mormon experience, and it sent chills of anticipation down the spines of all but the most conservative Mormon scholars. Even before the major projects got under way, magazines like Sunstone appeared to test the new glasnost—journals of Mormon "thought" outside of direct Church control. They featured articles on the Church's early communitarian efforts, the role of women in the history of the Church, discrepancies between the various accounts of the First Vision, and other formerly forbidden topics.

Almost overnight, Mormon history became the rage. Even the most obscure episodes, like Joseph Smith's money-digging activities, became the subjects of research and writing. Every scrap of paper, every historical document, every word ever penned by Church leaders became the subject of intense scrutiny for historical clues—not just by scholars, but by a legion of history-obsessed para-scholars, devout Mormons who followed every new discovery in the magazines. In a feeding frenzy, they devoured every fragment of the past that could be scared up from family chests and attic shoe boxes.

But through it all, The Vault stayed closed. Arrington was allowed access to some Church documents (“Before, you practically had to have a blood relationship to Joseph Smith to see even casual documents,” says one insider), but the legendary treasure trove of early history remained inaccessible—which only added to the fury of the search.

Documents had become the magic link to the past, the long-denied, long-hidden past. Dormant for so long, suddenly the market for Mormonabilia came alive. And Mark Hofmann was right in the middle of it.

21 In 1978, a young man walked into the bookstore run by Jerald and Sandra Tanner, the leading Mormon apostates and publishers of anti-Mormon literature, out of the parlor of their house. There was nothing distinctive about him; he seemed to be a typical young Mormon male, probably back from his mission, suddenly asking himself questions and hoping maybe the Tanners would have some answers. With the explosion of interest in Mormon history, they were seeing more and more of them lately.

They all looked lost and uneasy, but this one seemed unusually nervous. His glance bounced from the pale green walls to the stained ceiling, to the drab bookshelves where the Tanners stacked their homemade books.

“I have a document,” he finally said to Sandra Tanner. He had the high, nasal voice of a boy half his age. “It’s from my grandpa’s collection.” He held out a piece of paper.

It was a photocopy of a handwritten “second anointing,” a ceremony performed in the early years of the Church only for V.I.P.s. Unlike the first anointing, the ceremony performed by all good Mormons in which they prepare for the Celestial Kingdom, the second anointing virtually guaranteed a position of prominence in the hereafter. It was the religious equivalent of an American Express Platinum Card. To maintain strict secrecy, the words of the second anointing ceremony were always memorized. Although a crib sheet still existed, it was never supposed to leave the Temple. At one time, a Church member caught copying or revealing those words could have been put to death.

"My family wouldn't be comfortable with me being here," the young man explained, his eyes darting around the room again. "My grandpa has died, and my family has been sorting through all these papers and they came across this and I realized its significance and I don't want to see it buried and locked away so that no one would ever see it again. I thought someone should be aware of it."

"Why did you come to us?" Sandra asked.

"I know who you are," he said, gaining confidence. "I know about your work. I don't necessarily agree with what you're doing except that you are preserving history and making it available for all scholars."

So this nice Mormon boy was willing to risk his family's wrath, as well as his place in the Celestial Kingdom, by revealing this document to known apostates. And for what? For history? Sandra Tanner was skeptical.

"What's your name?" she asked.

"I can't tell you who I am," the boy said quickly. "I am from a prominent Mormon family, and you'd recognize the name of my grandfather."

"Can you tell me the family name?" After several generations of polygamous marriages and huge families, giving your last name in Salt Lake City was like giving the name of your community—a general identification at best.

But the boy balked again. "My family would be embarrassed that I am associated in any way with the Tanners," he said. "So why don't you just take it?" He seemed anxious to have it over with.

Sandra looked at the paper again. It had "Salt Lake Temple" written across the top. It was probably genuine, she thought, but how could she ever prove it? If she didn't know the name of the family, there was no way to verify that it really was what this man claimed it was, no way to trace it back to the family. Without a provenance, it was useless.

"Thank you," she said, taking the piece of paper with the certainty that she would never use it. "It's very interesting."

The young man smiled a weird smile and walked out.

A year later, Mark Hofmann appeared in the office of Jeff Simmonds, the curator of special collections and archives at Utah State, with a document he wanted to sell. It was a second anointing.

Simmonds knew Hofmann about as well as anybody at Utah State. The two had spent hours together talking about Mormon history, especially the early period from 1839 to 1844, when Joseph Smith moved the Church to Nauvoo, Illinois. Although a sixth-generation Mormon by birth, and closely related to Smith, Simmonds was no Mormon—not even close. He not only liked to drink, he liked to talk about drinking (“I just drank lunch”), he cussed now and then, and he downed blasphemous amounts of coffee.

But he was fascinated with Mormon history. Over the years, he had built what he called, tongue-in-cheek, “the third best collection of Mormon materials on earth.” The only problem was nobody wanted to use it. “I’m less likely to get a student researching Brigham Young,” he used to say, “than one studying the otters in southern Utah.”

Then along came Mark Hofmann. Hofmann not only knew loads about the most esoteric aspects of early history, almost as much as Simmonds himself, he wasn’t a stuffed shirt about it. He didn’t object when Simmonds referred to the Church Office Building as the “Power Tower,” or E. T. Benson, future Prophet of the Church, as “Extra-Terrestrial Benson” for his serene dissociation from the real world. Simmonds realized early that Hofmann wasn’t one of those upright, uptight Mormon Bundesjungen, whose eyes flared with disdain every time someone ordered a Coke. In fact, in one of their few conversations about doctrine, Hofmann had made it clear that he “didn’t buy” the Book of Abraham, a portion of the Pearl of Great Price, which, along with the Book of Mormon and Doctrine and Covenants constituted the three gospels, or “triple combo,” of the Mormon faith. “Joseph Smith just made a mistake with that one,” Hofmann said flippily.

At times, Hofmann was so cool that Simmonds had to look and make sure he still had that “little smile”—the telltale semicircular impression of the low-cut Temple garments under his shirt. Mormons and non-Mormons alike keep a sharp eye out for the little smile that sets the Saints apart. Hofmann always had one.

After a while, teacher and student became like two jocks in a bar, swapping baseball stories about the spread of polygamy, obscure court records, and Kirtland bank notes. Every so often, especially when the conversation turned to Mormon money, even Simmonds's eyes glazed over and he was reminded of a sign in an Idaho Falls antique shop: BROWSING, FREE. $25 AN HOUR IF I HAVE TO LISTEN TO ALL THE THINGS YOUR GRANDMOTHER HAD. But most days it was "Hello, how's the weather, and let's get down to Nauvoo in 1840."

But Nauvoo wasn't the only thing they had in common. There was The Word.

Both Simmonds and Hofmann had devoured Irving Wallace's 1972 thriller about ancient manuscripts, forgeries, and murder. In the fall of 1979, they discussed the CBS mini-series, based on the book and broadcast the previous year, and relived together all the excitement of Wallace's potboiler. How the impoverished Frenchman, Robert Lebrun, was betrayed by the evil priest, Père Paquin. How he plotted his revenge by planting a brilliant forgery that would rock the foundations of Christendom. For two men whose lives were wrapped up in documents, it was a delicious treat to read of Lebrun's meticulous forgeries; of the authentic papyrus leaves that he stole from museums; of the careful planning that went into the text of the forged document, the "lost" Book of James; and of his recipes for making and aging ink.

Especially fascinating was the way Lebrun planted the forgery so that a professor of archaeology would "accidentally" discover it. Hofmann was particularly impressed with how brilliantly he planned every detail. Not even the greatest experts in the world could detect the forgery. They all pronounced it genuine. "Their egos would not let them do otherwise," Lebrun declares just before he is killed.

"When I get ready to retire," Simmonds joked, "I'm going to forge the ultimate Nauvoo diary and sell it to B.Y.U." He and Hofmann had a good laugh over that.

It didn't bother Simmonds that his wife, Jeannie, a shrewd judge of people, took an "instant dislike" to the bookish, bespectacled new student, or that his usually blasé staff "couldn't stand the guy." To Simmonds, Mark was always a model of thoughtfulness, deference, and scholarly dedication. So when he brought in a second anointing "from a relative's attic" in excellent condition, Simmonds snapped it up for what he considered an excellent price: $60.

Hofmann made him promise not to tell anyone where he got it.

On April 17, 1980, less than a year later and two weeks before the medical school entrance examinations, Hofmann again came running into Simmonds's office in the library at Utah State. He seemed agitated and out of breath. Simmonds knew immediately something was up. It was so strange to see any kind of emotion on Mark's placid face.

Carefully, portentously, Hofmann laid an old Bible and a folded piece of paper on Simmonds's desk and then began to tell his breathless but remarkably lucid tale.

A month before, he had bought this 1668 Cambridge edition of the King James Bible from a Salt Lake City man. The man had occasionally sold him Mormon odds and ends in the past, but Hofmann was particularly struck by this Bible when he saw some handwriting inside and a signature in the name of Samuel Smith—the name of Joseph Smith's grandfather. Not wanting to seem too nosy, he had inquired casually, "Where did you get this Bible?"

"In Carthage, Illinois," the man replied, naming the town in which Joseph Smith had died at the hands of an angry mob.

Simmonds's heart was already fluttering. But the best was yet to come.

"I was in my apartment yesterday, about 4:30," Hofmann continued, "when I saw that two of the pages in the Bible were stuck together with this funny black glue."

Simmonds wondered for a split-second why someone as sophisticated as Hofmann hadn't examined the book more carefully when he bought it.

"I don't know why I never saw it when I flipped through the Bible before," Hofmann went on without pausing. "I was trying to separate the pages as carefully as I could when I saw this piece of paper, stuck between the pages because of the glue."

Simmonds was on the edge of his chair. Maybe the folded sheet had been bound in by accident. The old book looked like it had been rebound at some point in its three-hundred-year history.

Hofmann continued: "I managed to pry off the top page and there, on the paper, was the name 'Joseph Smith Jr.' "

Simmonds had already seen the signature on the folded piece of paper in front of him. It set his pulse pounding. He had seen Smith's signature on a host of documents, but this was different, this was a discovery.

Hofmann told how he had carefully separated the document from the Bible with a razor blade but dared not go any further. The piece of paper had been folded in fourths and sealed with glue and he was terrified of damaging it. So he had brought it to his friend and mentor for help.

There, clearly written on the outside was an inscription: "These characters were diligently copied by my own hand. . . ." It was signed "Joseph Smith Jr." Just by coincidence, a copy of Robert N. Hullinger's Mormon Answer to Skepticism was lying nearby on his desk, and Simmonds turned to the inscription by Joseph Smith: the word character was spelled without the h and with an o instead of an e.

After ten seconds of silence in which Simmonds's mind raced in a thousand directions at once, Hofmann leaned over the desk and asked in a solemn sotto voce, "Do you think the signature is authentic?"

Simmonds ran to his vault to fetch the only authentic signature by the Prophet that he had in his collection, one on a Kirtland bank note. The moment he laid the note next to the brown piece of folded paper, his heart nearly stopped. It was authentic.

The two men stood looking at the two signatures for a long time before Hofmann finally asked, "How can we get this thing apart?"

The problem was the adhesive. Simmonds had never seen anything like it, except maybe the tar that his father had used to seal the horse troughs on his family's farm.

The closer he looked, the less it looked like an accident. Maybe the person who had rebound the Bible had glued the paper into the book for safekeeping, and then, over the years, the glue had oozed through, bonding the bottom of the document to the top, sealing it shut for what, a hundred years? a hundred and fifty?

This wasn't a dream, he thought. This wasn't a novel. This was real, and it was happening to him.

"How do you think you could remove the glue?" Hofmann asked, surprisingly calm and directed in the middle of such momentous events.

Simmonds tried dissolving the glue with toluene, a mild solvent. Nothing. He took an X-Acto knife and tried scraping the glue. Nothing. Here I am, confronted with the archival find of the century, he thought, and I can't get it open!

Finally, in exasperation, he turned to Hofmann. "What would you say if I just cut the damn thing?" It was like Simmonds to be so aggressively un-Mormon at a moment like this.

Hofmann looked at him gravely, then nodded an okay.

Simmonds was a little surprised and a little sorry he agreed. Now he would have to cut it. He brushed the wisps of hair from his forehead, swallowed hard and picked up the knife. Fighting to control his trembling hands, he slit the document open along the side where the tarlike glue had sealed it shut. He felt like a surgeon. The old, yellow paper yielded with frightening ease. "If this document is what I think it is," he kept repeating to himself, "this is like wiping up a coffee stain with the Declaration of Independence."

Then he leaned down and peered into the slit.

It was what he thought it was.

Joseph Smith's problems did not end the moment the Angel Moroni directed him to the place on Hill Cumorah where the golden plates were buried. Even after he translated the tablets and began to spread the word of his new religion, converts did not exactly flock to his door. The solution, he decided, was better publicity. He just needed to get the Book of Mormon into more hands. But to do that, he needed money.

That was where Martin Harris fit in. A well-to-do and somewhat gullible farmer who was constantly chasing after new religions, Harris was prepared to sell his farm, worth $10,000, and give the money to Smith to finance the publication of the Book of Mormon. Harris would have done so if it weren't for his wife, who was outraged at the notion. To placate her and to satisfy his own nagging doubts, Harris demanded to see the gold plates. Smith refused to allow that, but he did offer to show Harris a transcript of a small part of the Book of Mormon that Smith claimed to have hand-copied from the gold plates.

Harris may not have been too bright, but he was industrious. He took Smith's transcript east to show it to some experts, one of whom was Professor Charles Anthon at Columbia University. Anthon was not impressed by what he saw. He told Harris that the strange conglomeration of symbols given him by Smith belonged to no known language, and he suspected that the whole story of the gold plates was either a hoax or a fraud. Harris brought that bleak assessment back to Smith, but the Prophet had an answer for everything. The process of engraving the golden plates was so long and tedious, he explained, that the Nephite prophet Mormon (the ancient author of the Book of Mormon) had turned to a "shorthand" Egyptian obviously unknown to Anthon. Smith called it "Reformed Egyptian."

That sounded good to Martin Harris. So good, in fact, that he began saying that Professor Anthon had, indirectly, confirmed that the characters were genuine. When Anthon later learned that Harris was misrepresenting his opinion, he was furious. "The whole story about my having pronounced the Mormonite inscription to be 'reformed Egyptian hieroglyphics' is perfectly false," he wrote. In his opinion, the story of the gold plates was either "a hoax upon the learned" or "a scheme to cheat the farmer of his money." Hoax or not, the transcript did succeed in parting the farmer from his money. Harris put up $5,000 for three thousand copies of the Book of Mormon. Soon thereafter, the so-called Anthon Transcript disappeared.

Now, 150 years later, it was on Jeff Simmonds's desk.

Simmonds rushed to his bookshelf, found his copy of Fawn Brodie's No Man Knows My History, and turned to page 51. He knew just where to find Professor Anthon's description of the transcript that Harris had showed him. Simmonds's eyes jumped electrically from the book to the paper. Every detail matched up perfectly:

all kinds of crooked characters disposed in columns. . . . Greek and Hebrew letters, crosses and flourishes, Roman letters inverted or placed sideways, were arranged in perpendicular columns, and the whole ended in a rude delineation of a circle divided into various compartments, decked with various strange marks. . . .

This was it. This was it—the high point of his career as an archivist.

Simmonds handed the book to Hofmann, who took it as if it was some new and strange object and then read the passage with intense, childlike attention. When he looked up, his eyes were wide with excitement. "Do you think it could be?"

Two days later, Hofmann arrived at the Church Office Building in Salt Lake City wearing the white shirt and tie he would always wear in dealings with Church officials. He walked into a hero's welcome. Dean Jessee, the Church's expert on Joseph Smith's handwriting, had seen the transcript the day before and pronounced the inscription authentic (pending more careful examination). Leonard Arrington, a man of considerable understatement, now took one look at the document and said, "Well, well. This looks very important. We ought to go tell Elder Durham.” He and Hofmann paraded to G. Homer Durham’s office on the second floor of the east wing of the Church Office Building, where they explained the significance of the discovery in terms that grew more glowing at each telling. Hofmann, of course, remained quiet and deferential throughout, smiling awkwardly, as though the publicity made him uneasy, as if he longed for the fuss to be over.

Durham nodded wisely and said in his sententious voice, “Well, well, we ought to have a meeting of the First Presidency and let them know about this. This is very important.”

In fact, few could remember any document quite so important. The meeting was set for 1:30 that afternoon. For an institution that usually moved at a glacial pace, that had only recognized the equality of blacks two years before, this was the equivalent of exultation.

Hofmann’s discovery could not have come at a better time.

Ever since the previous December, when Sonia Johnson was excommunicated for espousing the Equal Rights Amendment, the Church had been under media siege. Johnson appeared on the “Donahue” show, and every day, national papers carried more damaging revelations about the Church’s bitter campaign against the ERA. Mormon women had been bused into neighboring states to lobby legislatures where the amendment was under consideration. Substantial Church funds had not only been spent but had been secretly transferred from California to Florida to help defeat the amendment in that state. Journalists uncovered “irregularities” in the Church’s lobbying practices, especially in Virginia, where Johnson lived. And when the Church sent one of its own, Apostle Gordon B. Hinckley, out to calm the Gentile press, he wasn’t treated with anything like the deference that was due a man appointed by God. On the “Today” show, Tom Brokaw had the temerity to ask him if the Church wasn’t largely responsible for the ERA’s defeat. Hinckley, of course, denied it.

After six months of this relentless bashing, the LDS Church desperately needed some good press.

Mark Hofmann provided it.

At 1:30 in the afternoon, April 18, the governing board of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints met in extraordinary session with Mark W. Hofmann. Two days before, he was an obscure student at Utah State. Now he was sitting with the representatives of God on earth in the boardroom of the First Presidency.

Spencer W. Kimball, the twelfth Prophet, Seer, and Revelator of the Church, stood unsteadily over the document, looking at it through a magnifying glass. Although widely admired and surprisingly progressive, the eighty-five-year-old Kimball was known for wafting in and out of coherence.

Gathered around Kimball at one end of the big corporate-style table were the “younger” men who really ran the Church. Men like N. Eldon Tanner, a former Canadian who, in his better days, had overseen the vast expansion of the Church’s corporate empire but now, as Hofmann later told a friend, looked “kind of comatose.” The octogenarian Marion G. Romney, first cousin to George Romney, former Michigan governor and presidential candidate, sat in the corner humming to himself during most of the meeting. Apostle Boyd K. Packer, one of the most conservative of all the Church’s leaders, was there, as was Gordon B. Hinckley, the former railroad CEO and media savant, still in favor despite the embarrassments of the Sonia Johnson-ERA debacle.

The meeting lasted forty-five minutes. The elderly men asked questions and milled around one another to get just one more look at the little piece of yellow paper laid out on the enormous table. Someone commented, “Isn’t it marvelous that this important document should have been brought to light during our sesquicentennial year?” A Church photographer took pictures. Hofmann hovered over the document to the side, never straying far from it, answering questions with a combination of shyness and formality that delighted the Brethren. Nothing would have been more inappropriate in such august company than an open display of emotion. Hofmann was suitably humble. They were suitably pleased.

Leonard Arrington explained that Hofmann’s find was not only the earliest known example of the Prophet’s handwriting, it was nothing less than the document from which Smith personally transcribed the characters from the gold plates. “In 1828,” Arrington said, “this very piece of paper had lain on a table top alongside the sacred tablets.” The leaders liked the sound of that. That pleased them very much. It was an inspiring image, a wonderful thought, especially in the way it made the gold plates so real. It would be repeated often, by Church officials and by Mark Hofmann.

The Church, of course, couldn’t wait to add this treasure to its collection. They would have preferred it if Hofmann had donated the document, but they soon discovered that Hofmann wasn’t nearly so self-effacing at the bargaining table as he was at the photo opportunity. He wanted $20,000. With rich businessmen, the Brethren could be powerfully persuasive. After all, they had a direct line to God—one bad word from them and the “reserved” sign could be taken off a man’s place in the Celestial Kingdom. That tended to discourage the faithful from hard bargaining with the Church despite its vast wealth. But Hofmann could be excused. He was a young man with a family, just heading out into the world. Besides, $20,000 was a steal.

Still, an exchange of money would not look suitably reverent, so they agreed instead on a trade. Hofmann would give them the transcript and they would give him materials from their archives worth about $20,000—a first-edition Book of Mormon, a $5 gold piece, and some Kirtland Safety Society bank notes. That way Church publications could honestly report that the Church had not paid for the document.

Somewhere in all the excitement, someone suggested that perhaps they ought to authenticate the document before buying it. But that idea got nowhere. They wanted that document, and they wanted it now.

On April 22, only two business days after Hofmann first brought it to them, Church officials signed the agreement. The next day, G. Homer Durham wrote to thank Hofmann for his “gift”:

I am happy to write confirming the execution of the acquisition sheet and instrument of gift which was executed April 22, 1980 by yourself and Leonard J. Arrington.

Once the document was safely in their hands, Church leaders rushed to make it public. The formal announcement came at the Mormon History Association meeting, which was being held that sesquicentennial year, suitably enough, in Palmyra, New York—the very place where, exactly 150 years before, Joseph Smith had penned the Anthon Transcript. It was a public relations coup, orchestrated brilliantly by the Church’s public relations specialist, Gordon B. Hinckley.

On May 3, 1980, the Salt Lake papers ran articles on the discovery, along with the picture taken in the boardroom showing Hofmann leaning protectively over the transcript while Kimball examines it with his magnifying glass. UTAHAN FINDS 1828 WRITING BY PROPHET, trumpeted the Deseret News.

Suddenly Hofmann’s face was everywhere: in Church publications, in newspapers, even on the television—in particular, the Church-owned CBS affiliate KSL. “It appears to be the earliest Mormon document,” he explained one night on the news, looking uncharacteristically rakish in a sporty print shirt. “Also I think it’s exciting to think apparently this piece of paper was copied by Joseph Smith’s own hand—the characters were. Just right from the golden plates that were right there.”

Jeff Simmonds watched the outpouring of attention and stewed. The next time he saw Hofmann, he joked, with just a touch of bitterness, “I should have murdered you and added the manuscript to the special collections.”

Eventually, Don Schmidt, the Church archivist, took the new acquisition to B.Y.U. and had the photo studio run it through the standard ultraviolet and infrared examinations—ultraviolet to check for alterations or additions, infrared to see if the ink was appropriate to the time period. It passed. Dean Jessee, the Church’s handwriting expert, examined it again and gave it a definitive thumbs-up. The inscription was indeed written by Joseph Smith, he announced, and the paper was consistent with the 1828 date.

When Hofmann heard the results of the test, he seemed pleased but not entirely convinced. He suggested that maybe they ought to test the tarlike glue as well. He thought NASA’s Jet Propulsion Laboratory in Pasadena, California, could probably do the job. Church officials admired his conscientiousness. “Isn’t that just like Mark,” one of them said. “Never satisfied.”

Nine months later, on February 12, 1981, Hofmann called Michael Marquardt, postal employee, documents investigator, and arguably the most important terminus in the Mormon underground, the network of liberal Mormons and former Mormons who trade gossip about Church politics and photocopies of damaging Church documents. The two men hadn’t spoken since their first meeting, one week after the sale of the Anthon Transcript.

After six months of silence, Hofmann wanted to talk about “the succession problem”—the question of whether Joseph Smith, Jr., the Church’s founder and Prophet, should have been succeeded by his son, Joseph Smith III, or Brigham Young. He also wondered if Marquardt, a “walking encyclopedia” on Mormon trivia, happened to know what Joseph Smith was doing on January 17, 1844. The conversation seemed strangely “out of the blue” to Marquardt, but he checked on the information and two days later, when Hofmann called again, told him that Smith was at home that day.

The next time Hofmann visited Church leaders, the occasion wasn't nearly so joyous.

A year had passed since the discovery of the Anthon Transcript. Mark had forsaken his plans for medical school, dropped out of college, and set up shop as a full-time documents dealer. He had moved with Dorie, now pregnant, to Sandy, a small suburb south of Salt Lake City. Riding on the celebrity of the transcript, he had quickly established himself in the small community of collectors, doing a brisk business mostly in books and Mormon money. He had even done a few deals with the Church—although nothing like the Anthon. That had been a “once-in-a-lifetime find,” he told friends. Now he was in the documents business for the long haul.

Then lightning struck again.

On February 16, he drove to the Church Office Building and walked directly into Don Schmidt's office. He didn't have to make an appointment. No one stopped him; his face was well known by secretaries and guards. He handed Schmidt the photocopy of a document, and Schmidt read it without expression.

“Have you showed this to anybody else?” he asked when he was finished.

“How much do you want for it?”

Hofmann suggested somewhere in the neighborhood of $5,000—and he would take it, as before, in trade. But he also had something else to offer, something more than just the document, something equally valuable. “I promise I won't breathe a word of its existence to anyone,” he told Schmidt.

To Hofmann's surprise, Schmidt hesitated.

Trying hard not to sound threatening, Hofmann added, “You know there are people who would be willing to pay me a lot more for this document.”

When Joseph Smith died in 1844, a dispute erupted over who should succeed him. On one side was Brigham Young, Smith's chief lieutenant and a powerful, charismatic leader. On the other side was Smith's eldest son, Joseph Smith III, an eleven-year-old boy overly attached to his domineering mother and chief sponsor, Emma Smith. While avowing allegiance to the young Smith, Young wasn't about to serve as regent to a callow pre-teen. Seizing the initiative, he had himself declared Prophet and led most of his people on the arduous trail to Salt Lake City, where he founded an empire. Joseph III, Emma, and a small group of supporters stayed behind in Independence, Missouri, and fared considerably less well.

Young's church became the huge, wealthy LDS Church with more than five million members worldwide and, by some reports, ten thousand times that many dollars in the bank. Smith's church, the Reorganized, or RLDS, Church, remained an obscure sect, with less radical ideas (no polygamy), fewer members (about 200,000), and not enough money to build a proper Temple. But they continued to claim, much to the chagrin of the General Authorities in Salt Lake City, that they were the true Church, that Brigham Young was a false prophet, that Joseph Smith III and his descendants were the true heirs to Joseph Smith's church.

And now Mark Hofmann had found a document that proved they were right.

To Hofmann's surprise, Schmidt said he wasn't interested. The document wasn't important enough, and the price was too high.

But Hofmann was persistent. He came back twice more, the second time on February 23. This time, he said that if Schmidt wasn't interested in the document, he knew someone who would be very interested. "I think the RLDS Church might possibly trade a Book of Commandments for it." This was a rare, early version of Joseph Smith's revelations from God, which was later enlarged and "corrected" by the First Presidency to become the Doctrine and Covenants. It was worth at least $30,000.

"If you think you can get a Book of Commandments for it," Schmidt chuckled, "then you ought to try."

As Hofmann expected, the RLDS Church wanted the blessing and wanted it badly. Madelon Brunson, Schmidt's counterpart at the RLDS Church, was a bit taken aback when Hofmann said he wanted a Book of Commandments though. "Oh, my, that is quite a price," she said over the phone when he called the next day. But within twenty-four hours, Richard Howard, the historian of the RLDS Church, was on the line, agreeing to meet with Hofmann on March 2 at the Church Office Building in Salt Lake City to arrange the deal.

In the meantime, Hofmann decided to give the LDS Church one last try.

This time, he took the letter to Dean Jessee, ostensibly to ask his opinion of the handwriting. But Jessee couldn't help reading the startling contents:

A blessing, given to Joseph Smith, 3rd, by his father, Joseph Smith. . . .

Blessed of the Lord is my son Joseph, who is called the third,—for the Lord knows the integrity of his heart, and loves him, because of his faith, and righteous desires. And, for this cause, has the Lord raised him up; . . . For he shall be my successor to the Presidency of the High Priesthood: a Seer, and a Revelator, and a Prophet, unto the Church; which appointment belongeth to him by blessing, and also by right.

The handwriting was neat and precise, nothing like Smith's hasty script. Jessee agreed with Hofmann that it must have been dictated by Smith to his secretary, Thomas Bullock. As if to remove any doubts, Smith had obligingly signed his name on the back and written the date: January 17, 1844.

Unlike Schmidt, Jessee knew a bombshell when he saw it. He immediately called Earl Olsen, Schmidt's superior, and asked if he knew Schmidt had turned it down. Could Schmidt have bungled such a momentous decision on his own?

Olsen knew nothing about it, but he wasn't going to make the same mistake himself. He took the matter to G. Homer Durham, who saw the letter's "importance" right away and called the Church's man for sensitive matters, Gordon B. Hinckley.

Hinckley was no theologian, but he knew a public relations debacle when he saw it. The Reorganized Church in Missouri could blow this up into a national media circus. SALT LAKE CHURCH BASED ON BOGUS CLAIM. OLD FEUDS REKINDLED BY NEW DISCOVERY. The Mormon bashers back East would have a field day. It would be Sonia Johnson all over again.

The word came down from above: of course the Church was interested in this document, very interested. On February 28, duly chastised, Don Schmidt called just about every dealer and collector of Mormon documents he knew and put out the message: "Mark Hofmann was here and offered us something and wanted us to buy it. We're interested. If he comes to you, grab it." Then he called Hofmann: the Church had changed its mind, he said. It wanted the blessing after all. Was it still available?

Hofmann mentioned his pending negotiations with the RLDS Church. He had written Howard giving him a deadline of March 8 and didn't feel that he could withdraw his offer before that time. Schmidt could only agree that, under the circumstances, it would be unethical for the LDS Church to interfere with Hofmann's negotiations with the RLDS Church. But that same night, Schmidt called back, more anxious than ever: Could Hofmann possibly meet with G. Homer Durham on March 2, before he met with Howard?

On the morning of March 2, Durham made the Church's position very clear: "The Brethren very much want to acquire the document. Could you possibly free yourself from your negotiations with the RLDS Church?"

Hofmann was the very model of deference. "Well, I see one possible way out of my agreement with them," he ventured. "In my last conversation with Howard, he indicated that it would require perhaps several weeks before the blessing document could be authenticated." If the authentication couldn't be completed by the March 8 deadline, the LDS Church could have it. Based on their experience with the Anthon Transcript, of course, they wouldn't need to bother with authentication.

Hofmann repeated how uncomfortable he felt being sandwiched between the two Churches, but Durham waved his concerns aside. All that mattered was that Hofmann free himself from his agreement with the RLDS Church. Durham and his bosses wanted that document.

Hofmann went directly from his meeting with Durham to see Richard Howard, who had just received the letter with the March 8 deadline. "It will be impossible for the RLDS Church to authenticate the blessing document before that date," Howard said. Hofmann didn't say anything. If Howard took his silence to mean that the deadline wasn't binding, Hofmann later explained, that was his problem.

Four days later, on March 6, Howard got a call from Lorie Winder of Sunstone, asking for any possible statement he might be willing to make on the Joseph Smith III blessing. "I have learned that the LDS Church acquired it from Mr. Hofmann this morning," she said.

Howard was dumbstruck. Then furious. As far as he was concerned, the document had been sold out from under him. On March 3, he had told Hofmann that the tests couldn't begin until March 17, and Hofmann had agreed to bring the document to Missouri at that time.

Howard called Hofmann, who confirmed what Winder had told him. Then he called Don Schmidt and asked him for a certified photocopy of the blessing along with permission to publish it. Schmidt balked. "I'll forward your request to my superiors," he said, referring to Olsen and Durham. "But you'll have to put the request in writing first."

Howard not only fired off a letter to Schmidt requesting the photocopy, and letting him know what he thought of this kind of ecclesiastical cooperation, he also publicly accused Hofmann of “duplicitous negotiating” and threatened to bring legal action against him for breach of contract. For a few anxious days, the incident threatened to explode into full-fledged sectarian warfare—just the kind of publicity that Hinckley dreaded most. The last thing the Church needed was a bitter custody battle fought in open court.

But the cat was already out of the bag. Within days of the “secret” March 6 signing, calls started coming in from Time, the New York Times, the Los Angeles Times, and other magazines and newspapers across the country. Clearly it was too late for a cover-up. A lengthy court battle might keep the document out of the hands of the RLDS Church, but nothing would keep it out of the papers.

Under the circumstances, Hinckley must have decided it was better to release the document to the press immediately rather than be killed slowly by leaks and innuendo. Of course, Church officials strived mightily to put the document “in context,” as they liked to say. Jerry Cahill, the Church spokesman, described it to the press as merely “an interesting historical footnote.” Gordon B. Hinckley himself, waxing sentimental, called it “a father’s blessing given upon the head of a son he loved”—the equivalent of a Hallmark greeting card: sweet and touching, but hardly historic.

Less than two weeks after acquiring it, Hinckley decided to turn the document over to the RLDS Church in exchange for the Book of Commandments Hofmann had demanded. Richard Howard was summoned again from Independence, and the two Churches held a joint press conference to announce the exchange. It was yet another public relations coup by the Church’s P.R. genius. What better way to play down the document’s importance and put an end to media coverage than to give it up?

And the Church made almost $10,000 in the bargain.

And most important, Hinckley had learned an important lesson. In the future, he would deal with Mark Hofmann personally.

During the negotiations between the two Churches, Richard Howard asked Don Schmidt to provide a provenance for the document. Schmidt called Hofmann and asked, “Could you provide an affidavit from the person who sold it to you? Would that be possible?”

“No problem,” said Hofmann.

Sometime later, he produced a notarized statement from Allen Bullock of Coalville, Utah, the descendant of Thomas Bullock from whom he had bought the document. But, he told Schmidt, you must never, under any circumstances, make this affidavit public. You can only inform the RLDS Church that it exists. Later, when Schmidt telephoned to get some additional information on Allen Bullock, Hofmann supplied him with a middle name, Lee, and a year of birth, 1918. But, he cautioned again, the name must never be made public. "Allen Bullock also has some important papers concerning Brigham Young's finances that would be very embarrassing to the Church," he warned. Better not to stir those dirty waters.

Mark Hofmann had the golden touch.

If it had anything to do with Mormon history, Hofmann was the man to see. If you were a dealer or a collector and you wanted a particular kind of document, Hofmann was the man to see. If you had a lead on a rare document and you wanted someone to track it down, Hofmann was the man to see. Of course, it wasn't all luck, he would say. He was, after all, "the only person on earth who is actively, and on a full-time basis, pursuing Mormon documents." Other collectors had jobs or businesses to tend to, but Hofmann was out there, twenty-four hours a day, sifting through public records, flying around the country, even canvassing Utah towns door to door, beating the bushes of history.

And what about his close ties to the Church? No one could remember Hofmann actually bragging—that wasn't his style—but somehow everyone knew how tight he was with Church officials, especially Hinckley. They knew about their regular phone calls and meetings. Everyone knew that since the Anthon Transcript deal he had virtually unlimited access to the First Presidency archives. (According to one source, Hofmann had actually seen the fabled seer stones. "They're like brown chocolate eggs with white stripes," he reported.) What better source for leads on missing artifacts than the one who had access to the confidential journals and other secrets of The Vault?

Even with all that, though, Hofmann's knack for finding just the right document for the right collector was truly beyond belief.

Since his arrival in Utah in 1953 with all his earthly possessions stuffed in the back of his car, Al Rust had parlayed a love of coins into a $6 million-a-year business with two stores—one for each of his sons. A sweet-tempered, affable man with a face as elastic and disarming as the Cowardly Lion's, Rust had only three passions in life: the LDS Church, his family, and Mormon money.

Like many collectors, Rust looked forward to Mark Hofmann's unannounced visits. Not just because Hofmann was a good source, although he was; and not just because Hofmann promised to cut him in on some fabulously profitable deals, although he did. (Rust, in fact, had loaned him $10,000 to buy the Joseph Smith III blessing.) Rust saw Hofmann as a kindred spirit, someone who could, like Rust, spend hours talking about obscure issues of Mormon currency—a service that Rust found especially helpful at a time when he was trying to put the finishing touches on his five-year magnum opus, Mormon and Utah Coin and Currency.

Among the few items missing from Rust's book were "valley notes," the earliest printed money used in Utah. Also known as white notes, these two-inch by four-inch handwritten bills had circulated only briefly for a few years starting in 1849, when the dies used to strike gold coins broke. Although descriptions existed in various journals, no examples had ever been found.

In March 1981, Mark Hofmann walked into Rust's Coin Shop in Salt Lake City with eight of them.

Rust thought he had died and gone to heaven. What the Holy Grail was to the Crusaders, what the Ark of the Covenant was to archaeologists, these eight little slips of paper were to a Mormon-currency collector. At the mere sight of them, Rust went breathless. When he regained his composure, he handed them back to Hofmann. "Don't tell me what you want for them," he said. "They're too valuable." A devout Latter-day Saint, he insisted, "They should go to the Church."

Later the same day, Hofmann appeared in Don Schmidt's office and told him he had found four valley notes. Schmidt bought all four for $20,000. It was a steep price, but they were, Hofmann didn't fail to point out, the only four in existence. He then returned to Rust and sold the remaining four for an additional $12,000. Rust considered it a bargain price—after all, there were only eight in existence.

Until several months later, that is, when Hofmann returned to Rust's shop and said he had discovered nine more valley notes. This time, Rust received the news with considerably less enthusiasm. When there were only eight in existence, half of which were locked away in the Church archives, $3,000 apiece was a steal. Now with seventeen in existence . . . But if he didn't buy them, Hofmann would sell them to someone else for less and the price of his notes would go down. The only way to protect the price was to take them off the market. That cost him an additional $27,000. But he was grateful that Hofmann had brought them to him in the first place.

In late 1982, Hofmann showed up with another find of a lifetime: Spanish Fork Cooperative notes.

Brigham Young had established scores of small utopian communities, or cooperatives, all over Utah, some of which issued their own primitive currency. Yet no examples had ever been found. "Wouldn't it be great," Rust had fantasized to Hofmann one day, "if some of those notes actually showed up."

Not long afterward, as if by a miracle, Hofmann returned with copies of notes issued by the cooperative at Spanish Fork, Utah.

Rust could hardly believe it. How exciting it was to be in on the discovery from the very beginning. What an exciting life Mark Hofmann led. What a reasonable price $2,500 was for such rare items.

It didn't seem to diminish the thrill too much that Hofmann returned in early 1983 with yet another set of notes that he was sure Rust would want to include in his book—it was, after all, the only other set in existence; and the price was only $1,500 this time. Later, Hofmann sold still another set of the notes to a collector in Arizona, and still another set to the Church.

Brent Ashworth also had a wish list—although looking around the Philippine mahogany walls of his study, one wouldn't have thought so. Behind the floral-patterned, L-shaped sofa were rows of framed documents: a bill from Paul Revere; letters from Thomas Jefferson, Benjamin Franklin, and George Washington; an original copy of the Thirteenth Amendment to the Constitution, including all the original signatures. The bookcase on one wall was stocked with dozens of first editions, including a 1611 first edition of the King James Bible. It was just the blue-chip collection one would expect from a well-heeled lawyer who, at age thirty-one, had already landed a job he would probably have the rest of his life: vice-president and legal counsel for Nature's Sunshine Products, a company owned by his cousin.

What could a young dealer in Mormon documents like Mark Hofmann possibly have that would interest a man who already had it all?

Salvation.

For Ashworth, Hofmann wasn't just selling documents, he was selling status within the Church—status in this world that could eventually be cashed in for status in the next. An astonishingly honest man, Ashworth would come close to admitting as much in conversation: Mormon documents were his entrée to the Celestial Kingdom. He had almost missed the boat once, at age nineteen, when he skipped the two-year mission expected of all able Mormon males.

Hofmann's documents gave him a second chance. That's why he wasn't interested in anything that wasn't what the Church called "faith promoting." Hofmann could bring him Joseph Smith's teen diary, but if it didn't hew to the Church line, if it didn't support the Church's version of its own history and doctrines, Ashworth wasn't interested. If he wanted history, he could buy another Washington or Lincoln. When it came to his religion, there had to be, in his phrase, a "religious-spiritual payoff."

On March 6, 1982, Hofmann drove to Ashworth's home in Provo, an hour south of Salt Lake City and home to B.Y.U. The house was an odd one for Utah: more solid than most, all cut stone and mahogany boards, but idiosyncratically arranged. Like the Temple and the Tabernacle in Salt Lake City, it was a building designed by a man who believed good materials and hard work were incapable of producing bad results. A mural with a Mormon theme over the staircase announced the family's devoutness, and the long row of photographs in the living room, of Ashworth's beautiful dark-haired wife and six handsome children, proved his adherence to the Mormon ideals of family and fruitfulness.

Hofmann settled on the edge of the L-shaped sofa in front of the Revere and the Washington and very carefully pulled a sheet of paper from his portfolio. Ashworth took it and peered at it closely through his huge, horn-rimmed glasses. As he read, his fleshy cheeks and chin began to tremble. He was always a little nervous, on edge about doing the right thing, but this wasn't nerves. It was sheer elation.

Suddenly, he leaped from his chair and reached for the nearest frame, the letter from Abraham Lincoln making Sherman a general. Would Hofmann take that in exchange? He ran to the three-page letter by George Washington, written a week before Washington's death. What if he threw that in as well? It was the latest Washington letter known to be in private hands. And—he ran across to another wall—the letter from Robert E. Lee to Jefferson Davis saying the Confederate cause was lost. "I have to have this," Ashworth pleaded, hugging the document Hofmann had shown him.

When Joseph Smith began telling people that an angel had led him to the golden plates from which he translated the Book of Mormon, not everyone believed him. It didn't help that when they asked to see these golden plates, Smith explained that he had given the plates back to the angel.

To buttress his claim, he had two groups of men attest to the fact that they “beheld and saw the plates, and the engravings thereon.” The first three—Martin Harris, David Whitmer, and Oliver Cowdery—were reportedly shown the plates by an angel. A second group of eight men—all but one relatives of either Whitmer or Smith himself—were reported only to have seen the plates. But there was very little direct evidence of these events. There was no direct evidence from Harris, for example, that he had done anything more than hold a box that Smith told him contained the plates, not that he had actually seen them, certainly not that he had seen an angel.

It didn’t help much that two of the three key eyewitnesses, Martin Harris and Oliver Cowdery, were later excommunicated from the Mormon Church and that the third, David Whitmer, left of his own accord. Harris, in particular, was no Rock of Gibraltar. When he became a Mormon, he had already tried out four or five other religions. Even the conservative Mormon historian Richard Anderson later admitted that Harris was disposed to a certain amount of “religious instability.” Joseph Smith put it more bluntly, calling Harris “too mean to mention” and telling people that God Himself had called Harris “a wicked man.”

The document Brent Ashworth “had to have” was a one-page letter from Martin Harris, written in 1873, forty-six years after the momentous events in Palmyra, New York.

I now solemnly state that as I was praying unto the Lord that I might behold the ancient record, lo there appeared to view a holy Angel, and before him a table, and upon the table the holy spectacles or Urim and Thummim, and other ancient relics of the Nephites, and lo, the Angel did take up the plates and turn them over so as we could plainly see the engravings thereon, and lo there came a voice from heaven saying ‘I am the Lord,’ and that the plates were translated by God and not by men, and also that we should bear record of it to all the world, and thus the vision was taken from us.

If Mary had recorded her version of the Annunciation, if the Apostles had penned letters home about the Last Supper, if the soldier guarding Christ’s tomb had written a memoir, that’s how important Harris’s letter was. Here for the first time was written, firsthand confirmation by Martin Harris of Joseph Smith's First Vision, the golden plates, and, most important, the divine origin of the Book of Mormon—all from a man who was known to be resentful of his treatment at the hands of Smith and his followers, a man who had every reason to cast doubt on the Mormon religion.

The letter even quoted God.

If anything would ever elevate Ashworth in the Church's grace, if anything would ever make up for the undone mission, this was it. That's why he had to have it.

When Mark Hofmann finally left that night, he had $27,500 worth of Ashworth's documents under his arm.

In July, Hofmann was back with another astonishing discovery: a letter from Joseph Smith's mother, Lucy, to her brother, Solomon Mack, dated January 23, 1829, which described some of the material in the lost 116 pages of the Book of Mormon. (When Martin Harris returned from showing the transcript to Professor Anthon, he served as Joseph Smith's scribe while Smith "translated" the first 116 pages of the Book of Mormon, dictating to Harris from behind a screen. To appease his skeptical wife, Harris implored Smith to let him take the pages home to show her and, when he did, promptly lost them. Some suspected the shrewish Mrs. Harris of destroying them. In any case, they hadn't been seen since. If they ever did turn up, this letter from Smith's mother could be used to validate them.)

It was also the earliest known letter by the Prophet's mother, anticipating by some two years an 1831 letter, also to her brother, containing some surprisingly similar passages, but no mention of the contents of the 116 pages. In fact, it was the first-known document from anyone to anyone relating to the history of the Church.

To those who knew anything about Mormon history, it was a truly historic find. For years skeptics had been saying that Smith waited a suspiciously long time before recording his First Vision. If he really had a vision from the Lord in 1820, why wasn't it described in writing until 1838? Here was a description written as early as 1829 that conformed exactly with the version that the Church had selected—among the several Smith left behind—as the genuine version.

Ashworth later recalled that he "fell out of his chair" when he saw how important the letter was. Once again, he had to have it.

But Hofmann hesitated. "Don't you think maybe the Church ought to have it?" he suggested.

"Oh, no, Mark. This is one I really have to have." At that moment, he didn't seem to care about the Church, the cost, or the Celestial Kingdom. He wanted that letter.

And he went to the wall to get it.

He pulled down his pride and joy, the framed original copy of the Thirteenth Amendment to the Constitution. "Would you take this?" he asked breathlessly. Before Hofmann could answer, he pulled two letters off the wall, the Benjamin Franklin and an Andrew Jackson. Then he went to the bookshelf. How about the Solomon Maximarius, the book Joseph Smith's grandfather wrote in 1811? It was the only copy in private hands.

All the time Ashworth was running around the room, Hofmann was totting up values in his head. He wanted $30,000 for it, and Ashworth was short. No problem, said Ashworth. Hofmann added some items to the list. By the time he was done, the total had climbed to well over $30,000 by Ashworth's estimate, but he didn't care. The letter was priceless.

But Ashworth did have one request. He insisted that Hofmann's role be kept strictly confidential; that Hofmann let him take credit for the discovery.

To his delight and surprise, Hofmann agreed without an argument.

When Ashworth's discovery of the Lucy Mack Smith letter was announced at a press conference in August, the Church was so pleased that the First Presidency invited Ashworth and his wife to a meeting afterward. It was the Mormon equivalent of an audience with the Pope. For a devout Mormon, there was nothing more thrilling this side of death.

The Church leaders muttered their congratulations. "Nice job." "It's very exciting." "We like what you're doing." Gordon Hinckley, since elevated to the First Presidency, shook Ashworth's hand and looked deep into his eyes. "Keep up the good work," he said. "What you're doing is a positive thing for the Church." Ashworth smiled his nervous smile and unstuck his tongue long enough to say, "The real joy to me is getting something that the Church that I believe in can use."

The Prophet, Spencer W. Kimball, now eighty-seven and feeble, entered the room slowly, looked at the Lucy Mack Smith letter—he was, in fact, related to her—and posed for a picture with Ashworth and his wife. (The picture was later sent to all the stakes in the Church to show that President Kimball was still, in Ashworth's word, "viable.") Not that he was all that "viable." Mostly, he wandered around the room, ignoring the letter. At one point, he turned to Ashworth and mumbled, "I love you, I love you."

Later, Ashworth would tell friends that there, in the presence of the Prophet, he had had a "spiritual experience."

Shrewdly, Ashworth held off announcing the Martin Harris letter until October, at the General Conference, a twice-yearly convocation of Mormons from around the world. It was also the conference at which the Church planned to announce, with great fanfare, the new subtitle of the Book of Mormon: Another Testament of Jesus Christ. (There had been an Old Testament, then a New Testament; now there would be Another Testament.) What could be more appropriate for such an occasion than the discovery of Martin Harris's written testimony that the gold plates did, in fact, exist? It was so fortuitous that some devout Mormons attributed it to divine intervention.

With the round of interviews and the spotlight of national media coverage on him, Ashworth felt like a "personal crusader for the Church." At the press conference, he played his part well, telling reporters, "I feel like the letter supported that new title, that this is also a testament of Christ. I felt like the Church would use the letter in the way the writer intended." Letters poured in from Church members all over the United States and around the world, congratulating him on his find. The document was featured in Church publications and both local papers, as well as on local television stations. In the Deseret News, it merited a full-page write-up, accompanied by heartwarming words from G. Homer Durham: "Because it is a signed statement, it represents one of the most significant documents regarding [the] coming forth of the Book of Mormon, Another Testament of Jesus Christ." Another commentator called it a veritable "festival" of faith promotion.

After the hubbub died down, Hofmann tried to persuade Ashworth to donate both the Harris letter and the Lucy Mack Smith letter to the Church—or at least sell them to the Church. "You know, you ought to try to do that before G. Homer Durham dies," he prompted. "I think you could get a complete set of Mormon gold for them." But Ashworth wouldn't hear of it. He loved too much the limelight they brought. Instead, he had thousands of copies printed up—on yellow paper, to make them look old—and gave hundreds of talks to Church groups about how these documents had reaffirmed his faith.

It wasn't any wonder that collectors like Ashworth and Rust put up with unreturned phone calls; erratic, unannounced visits; occasional bounced checks; bizarre behavior; and especially Hofmann's stubborn refusal to reveal his sources. That was, they told themselves, part of the business. And besides, the profits—however you calculated them—were too good to question.

25 Every Wednesday morning, Ashworth would come to Hofmann's house and sit in the cramped living room while Mark reclined in one La-Z-Boy and Dorie in another. They talked mostly about things "in the woodwork"—collector talk. Then they would meet again every Wednesday afternoon at the Crossroads Mall in downtown Salt Lake City. It was such a routine that Mark's three kids had come to think of Ashworth as a kind of uncle.

Only this Wednesday, Mark wasn't home.

Ashworth was willing to wait, but he had to rearrange his schedule. He asked Dorie if he could use the phone.

"The one up here doesn't work," she told him. "You'll have to use the one in the basement."

The phone hung on the wall in the hall next to the door to Mark's workroom. The door was open. Ashworth looked inside and saw a clutter of papers, including a stack of old cover letters lying on the floor. It would be so easy, he thought, just to walk in and see what Mark had in the pipeline. Knowing Mark, there were probably some valuable things lying around. It was tempting. Extremely tempting.

No, he decided. That's Mark's business. He shouldn't butt in.

Mark came home while he was still on the phone. When he saw Ashworth, he became suddenly agitated—more agitated than Ashworth had ever seen him. As soon as he was off the phone, Mark nervously hustled him up the stairs. I guess that area's off-limits, Ashworth thought.

Hofmann was on a roll. Profits from the big deals with the Church, Rust, Ashworth, and others, plus dozens of little deals began to add up. He was doing more and more business out of town as well—jetting off to New York on a moment's notice. In March 1983, he bought his father's old house in Millcreek, the house in which he had grown up, and moved his family back to Salt Lake City. Within a year or so, he bought himself a racy blue Toyota MR2 and installed a cellular phone—a necessity for fast-breaking deals, he told Dorie. Some friends wondered why Hofmann, the ultimate low-profile pragmatist, would buy such a snappy, impractical car. Wouldn't he want something less cramped for his long document-hunting expeditions into rural Utah? And how would it fit his family, now grown to five? But as long as he was successful, nobody fretted too much over such questions.

Nor did they complain that he wasn't seen around the ward house very much. The rumor had spread quickly through the Mormon grapevine that Mark Hofmann was on a first-name basis with several General Authorities and that he was doing the entire Church an invaluable service in hunting down documents. So if he kept to himself, missed church now and then, rarely entertained, and spent inordinate amounts of time in his basement study, nobody was going to make a fuss. Hofmann, the neighbors agreed, had his own way of working. Strange, perhaps, but undeniably successful.

In September 1982, Peggy Fletcher, editor of Sunstone magazine, managed to catch the high-flying documents dealer for an interview, subtitled "How to avoid medical school but still make the bucks."

How do you go about finding documents? Do you have specific items in mind which you actively pursue or do you simply cover whole geographical areas where there might be documents?

When I first got started there were very few sources for the material I was interested in. Then I started getting more aggressive. I have gone door to door in places like Cedar City looking for things rumored to be there. I didn't know any other way of finding them.

Mostly what I do nowadays, though, is just track down leads. In fact,

I now have someone working for me strictly to pursue leads. And I could probably afford to hire even a few more people.

Hofmann met Lyn Jacobs at Deseret Book, a watering hole for dealers, collectors, students and various other eccentrics who shared an obsession with Mormon history. The son of a Church-employed electrical engineer, Jacobs worked in the Church's genealogical library to help pay his way through the University of Utah and support his passion for collecting foreign-language books on Mormonism—a Book of Mormon in Hindi or a Doctrine and Covenants in Czech—an esoteric specialty even by Mark Hofmann's standards.

Jacobs was what people in Salt Lake City called flamboyant. He had been on a mission to Quebec, had visited Los Angeles often, and knew big-city life. With his stylish, skintight European clothing, tight, dark ringlets of hair, calibrated walk, and roller-coaster patter, he seemed to be on a personal mission to bring the flamboyant life-style of the Sodom and Gomorrahs of the coasts to Brigham Young's backward kingdom. Jacobs wasn't the kind to hide his lights. If nothing else, even his detractors admitted, he was a welcome relief from the great, grinning goodness of Mormon culture, a crystal of salt on a vast landscape of mashed potatoes.

It was really this distinctiveness, more than the usual mutual obsession with Mormonabilia, that drew Hofmann to Jacobs. Hofmann, too, seemed to Jacobs somehow outside the mainstream. Unlike Jacobs, he could "pass"—he looked so unassuming, almost dopey, Jacobs thought. He would walk in with that black-hole look on his face and say in the most unassuming voice, "Oh, dear, I found something today . . ." then drop a bombshell on you. Jacobs wasn't nearly so adroit with people—but he was smart. Hofmann used him mostly to handle the minor documents. "He was too busy to take care of every one of his dippy little things," says Jacobs. "He had so much going on every day he would shove something off on me."

And it was okay with Jacobs that Hofmann didn't want his name involved in the deal. That just made Jacobs look better. He took his cut—usually in the form of some little pamphlet he wanted for his collection—and signed the check, if there was one, over to Hofmann.

Once you have found an item, how do you determine if it's authentic?

Actually, to authenticate a Mormon item—at least so far—has been easier than the same process for, say, Lincoln or Washington letters. There have been all kinds of Lincoln forgeries around and even though

I'm in the business, I wouldn't buy a Lincoln letter without getting one of the few persons I respect as experts to authenticate it. To date that hasn't been a real problem with Mormon documents. Now, however, with the publicity that's been given the tremendous amount of money to be realized . . . there may be some temptation to forge.

More than a year after discovering the Anthon Transcript, Hofmann drove back to the site of that first triumph, the special-collections archive at Utah State University, to see Jeff Simmonds. He had yet another startling find to show his old mentor. It was a letter from Joseph Smith himself, addressed to Maria and Sarah Lawrence, two of his plural wives, ages nineteen and seventeen.

Dear Maria & Sarah:—I take opportunity this morning to communicate to you two some of the peepings of my heart; for you know my thoughts for you & for the City & people that I love. God bless & protect you all! Amen. I dare not linger in Nauvoo Our enemies shall not cease their infernal howling until they have drunk my lifes blood. . . . I want for you to tarry in Cincinnati untill you hear from me. Keep all things treasured up in your breasts. burn this letter as you read it. I close in hast. Do no dispare. Pray for me as I bleed my heart for you.

The letter not only added weight to the argument, which made the Church very uncomfortable, that Joseph Smith was an ardent polygamist, it also shed some new light on one of the more colorful incidents in his exceedingly colorful life. After being appointed legal guardian to Maria and Sarah Lawrence upon the death of their father, Smith was discovered in flagrante delicto with the elder daughter, Maria. One of the other guardians, William Law, filed charges against Smith, and an indictment was issued accusing him of "adultery and fornication."

Simmonds examined the document and looked at Hofmann. "I think it's a fake."

Hofmann looked surprised, but not upset. "Do you really think so?"

Not long afterward at a restaurant in Boston, where they were attending a book fair, Hofmann gave Lyn Jacobs and a group of friends a basic lesson on the ins and outs of forgeries—to help in detecting them, he said. On the paper tablecloth, he drew them a George Washington, an Abraham Lincoln, a Walt Whitman, and a Joseph Smith. "He talked about lifts and pressure points and a whole host of things," Jacobs recalls. "He really knew his stuff."

Do you keep any of the documents you find for your own collection?

My basic technique is to turn over material as fast as I can. If you buy things at a good price, there's a tremendous amount of money to be made. I try to sink as much of it as I can back into the search. My strategy isn't necessarily to get top dollar for every item but just to sell it so I have more money to keep looking. The real reward in the whole business is being able to see things that no one else knows about. It gives me a kick to know that this is original stuff, that no one else on earth has pieced this together or knows what this says. So there's the pleasure. It's like being a detective.

Sounds like a fascinating life.

Although I do have fun, it's really not as romantic as it sounds. It seems like you always have people who hate you or are mad at you.

One day, Hofmann handed Lyn Jacobs a small piece of paper with the words Maid of Iowa printed on it. Jacobs recognized it instantly.

It was a ticket from a Mississippi steamboat, the Maid of Iowa, of which Joseph Smith was half owner. Smith gave out tickets like favors: if he liked you, you got a ticket with your name written on it and signed by him. If he didn't like you, you had to figure out a different way to get across the river. Jacobs did some quick estimating in his head. The Joseph Smith signature: $1,000. Nauvoo imprint (rare): another $1,000. The ticket had Brigham Young's name on it (rarer still): another $500. It had been co-signed by Emma Smith (extremely rare): a couple of thousand at least.

Then there was the uniqueness factor: no Maid of Iowa ticket had ever been found.

Not long afterward, Don Schmidt bought it for the Church for $2,500. "Only one?" Schmidt asked abruptly.

"Just the one," Hofmann assured him.

A few days later, when Jacobs congratulated him on the sale, Hofmann gave him a wink. "Guess what? There's another one."

The second one went to Brent Ashworth.

At their next meeting, Hofmann told Jacobs about the sale to Ashworth. "Too bad there aren't more," Jacobs lamented.

"Guess what?" Hofmann said with another wink. "There's a third."

Hofmann took the third one back to Schmidt. "Guess what? I found another ticket," he said in his dippiest, most disarming voice. When Schmidt started to boil, Hofmann explained, "This one doesn't have Emma's signature on it—it's slightly different."

Schmidt wanted that one too.

If a document is of significance to the Church, do you give them the first chance to purchase it?

If I think the Church should have it, I do. My experience is, however, that the Church usually doesn't pay as much as a private collector would for an item. There are exceptions. I know of the collecting interests of the Church historians, things which they are pursuing or are interested in. Those things they will pay top dollar for. But there have been a lot of things which I think are historically significant which I haven't even given the Church a crack at. A lot of historians, I'm sure, aren't happy with me for this, but I'm in this for the money.

Are there any documents other than court records from Joseph's early money-digging days?

There is other material that I know about, but I don't want to say anything about what it is because I am actively seeking it.

27 Of all the many rumors about Joseph Smith, none was more damning than the one about money digging. Not that money digging was rare in the early 1800s. It was, in fact, all the rage. As one Mormon historian put it, "While the Founding Fathers were busy putting the finishing touches on the nation, the rest of the country was busy poking around in their backyards for Captain Kidd's buried treasure."

If Smith had merely gone out in his yard and dug a few holes, he would have been guilty of nothing more than gullibility. But the rumors were far worse than that. The rumors were that Smith, like his father, hired himself out to superstitious farmers and offered to search their fields with a divining rod or a looking glass or a seer stone, feeling for the vibrations of precious metals. That wasn't just unethical—even by the standards of the time—it was illegal. There was even a rumor that Smith was brought to trial for money digging and confessed.

This was serious stuff. If Smith did, in fact, engage in money digging as an ongoing enterprise, running around the farms of Palmyra with a seer stone looking for buried gold, it didn't speak well for his story of finding gold plates buried in the land around Palmyra and "translating" them with the help of a seer stone. It all began to sound less like a divine revelation and more like a publicity stunt. And what did it make of the “testimony” of the other witnesses to the gold plates, many of them members of Smith’s family?

Mormon scholars shuddered at the thought. They agreed that if anyone could ever substantiate any of those dreadful rumors that Smith had actually confessed to money digging in a court of law, it would be catastrophic for the faithful. Said one Mormon scholar: “If any evidence had been in existence that Joseph Smith had used a seer stone for fraud and deception, and especially had he made this confession in a court of law as early as 1826, or four years before the Book of Mormon was printed, and this confession was in a court record, it would have been impossible for him to have organized the restored Church.”

In fact, such a trial record had existed for some time, had even been reprinted in several nineteenth-century journals. But the Church claimed it was an early forgery, that no such trial had ever taken place. Then, on July 28, 1971, Wesley P. Walters, a Methodist minister from Marissa, Illinois, while rummaging around the records in the basement of the county jail in Norwich, New York, found two boxes of county bills from the early 1800s. There, in a bundle of bills from 1826, were the records of the court trial of “Joseph Smith, The Glass Looker” on March 20, 1826.

That left one Mormon scholar arguing desperately that the Joseph Smith in the 1826 trial record couldn’t be the Joseph Smith, and praying that no new evidence turned up to prove him wrong.

Sometime between January 11 and January 14, 1983, Hofmann brought another document to Temple Square. This time, instead of stopping at Schmidt’s office in the Historical Department, he went straight to Elder Durham’s door. Durham took one look at the letter and marched Hofmann directly over to Gordon Hinckley’s office in the First Presidency building and placed the letter on Hinckley’s bare desk. It was addressed to Josiah Stowell and signed “Joseph Smith, Jr.” The date: June 18, 1825. If nothing else, it was the earliest known writing of the Prophet.

As described by one associate, Hinckley was “no Mahatma Gandhi. No waves of spirituality emanated from his person. No one came away from meeting him claiming their faith had been renewed.” He was, first, last, and always, a bureaucrat—cool, precise, difficult when necessary; diplomatic, even charming, when appropriate; extremely effective at cutting through red tape and getting the job done. He was also notoriously shrewd about people.

Hofmann had every reason to expect that Hinckley, who had written a short history of the Church earlier in his career, would recognize the name Josiah Stowell. A wealthy farmer in Bainbridge, New York, Stowell was the customer whose dealings with "Joseph Smith, The Glass Looker" resulted in the complaints documented in the court records from 1826. Now Hofmann had found a letter, in the Prophet's own hand, proving that "Joseph Smith, The Glass Looker" and Joseph Smith, Prophet of God, were the same man.

Hinckley took up the letter, sat back in his ample chair, and read.

Dear Sir.

My Father has shown me your letter informing him and me of your Success in locating the mine as you Suppose but we are of the oppinion that since you cannot ascertain any particulars you Should not dig more until you first discover if any valluables remain you know the treasure must be guarded by some clever spirit and if such is discovered so also is the treasure so do this take a hasel stick one yard long being new Cut and cleave it Just in the middle and lay it asunder on the mine so that both inner parts of the stick may look one right against the other one inch distant and if there is treasure after a while you shall see them draw and Join together again of themselves let me know how it is Since you were here I have almost decided to accept your offer. . . .

"We would be interested in making a purchase," Hinckley said when he finished. He told Hofmann to return the following Monday. At the second meeting, no one else was present. Just Hinckley and Hofmann. Hinckley pulled out a checkbook and wrote a check for $15,000 from a Church account. He handed the check to Hofmann and took the letter. "The Council of Twelve, and the First Presidency, and Elder Durham, and my secretary, Francis Gibbons, will be the only ones to know about this document," he said, according to Hofmann's account. "Have you mentioned it to anyone?"

"No," Hofmann assured him.

"Not even to your wife?"

"No."

"Does anyone else know about it?"

"No one else within the Church." Hinckley knew, and he knew, and the original owner knew. That was it.

"Where did you get it?"

"From an Eastern source." Hofmann assured him that it had been authenticated by an autograph expert in New York.

"Can you get me a copy of the authentication?"

"I can."

And the deal was done.

No press conference, no picture with the Prophet, no headlines, no articles, no interviews this time. For the 1829 letter by Joseph Smith's mother, there had been official proclamations—"The earliest known dated document"—and solemn, long-winded testimonials—"The vindication of Joseph Smith's work." But for this much earlier statement from the Prophet himself, nothing.

When Hofmann came out of the First Presidency building and rendezvoused with Lyn Jacobs across the street in the Crossroads Mall, he was smiling. He told Jacobs that Hinckley's parting words were: "This is one document that will never see the light of day."

Hofmann's Sunstone interview concluded with several questions about his "testimony."

Do you consider yourself an active Latter-day Saint?

Yes. I'm an eighth-generation Mormon, and my mother is a stake Relief Society president right now.

Has your profession affected your beliefs at all?

I guess I am a lot more calloused than I was. But generally I just don't worry about some things. I don't have to figure everything out, have an explanation for everything. I can just say, "Well, that's the way it is."

Do you look for specific documents to substantiate Mormon historical claims?

You can't really do that; you have to take what you can find. I don't think documents really change anyone's mind anyway. For example, the Anthon Transcript. The anti-Mormons used it for their purposes and the Mormons used it for theirs. The same with the Lucy letter. I think most people are a little like me. You have your beliefs and you don't really let things change them too much.

If you found a document that was potentially embarrassing to the Church, would you consider hiding or destroying it?

Oh, no. That gets into a matter of ethics. It's not my role to burn a document just because I don't like what it says—not to mention that it's not a very profitable thing to do in the business world. The closest I've come was the Joseph Smith III blessing which shook up a few people in the Church. It surprised me a bit that the Church didn't buy it up quick and stash it away somewhere, but I guess the Historical Department is trying to be more objective and get away from that sort of thing.

Dawn Tracy believed that too—until Thursday, May 19, 1983.

That was the day Tracy, then a reporter for the Provo Daily Herald, heard a rumor from a B.Y.U. professor that liberal Mormon writers and intellectuals were being called in by their bishops. Like most newspaper writers in Utah, Tracy, a Mormon herself—but one who had questions about the way her Church was being run—had always had to contend with its vast power. Not that the Church owned the Daily Herald. It didn't need to. The paper served a readership in Utah County, the county with the highest percentage of active Mormons in the state. The mayor of Salt Lake City once called it the most conservative county in the most conservative state in the nation. If anything, the readership was more conservative and more devoutly Mormon than the readership of the Church-owned Deseret News up in Salt Lake. So the Daily Herald tended to steer clear of the Church. Sure, there were occasional little articles about a new bishop or a Church-related barbecue, but where was the real news, Tracy wondered.

This was one rumor she wasn't going to let get away. She grabbed her copies of Sunstone and Dialogue, the two liberal reviews, made a list of the authors, and started dialing. "Hi, I'm Dawn Tracy from the Daily Herald. Have you been quizzed by your bishop on your testimony?" she asked, using the Mormon shorthand. Every good Mormon is supposed to have a testimony, a heartfelt belief that the Book of Mormon is "true," that Joseph did translate it from golden plates, and that the LDS Church is the only true Church. If your faith wanes, you lose your testimony. From an early age, children are warned that "losing your testimony" is a fate worse than death. Twice a year, bishops call in ward members to review, along with the record of their tithing, the status of their testimonies. Without a testimony, you can't get a Temple recommend, and without a Temple recommend, you can't get into the Celestial Kingdom.

Tracy called twenty-five or thirty writers, from California to Virginia, and all of their stories sounded strikingly similar. Clearly the local officials were acting on orders from higher up. Tracy stayed at her word processor until past midnight making more calls and writing the story for the next day's edition, but no amount of arguing could convince her editors to run with it. Then, an hour before the Sunday edition went to press, they decided that the story was too big to sit on and gave her the go-ahead.

Latter-day Saint stake presidents and bishops are warning Mormon writers who publish intellectual material to write faith-promoting stories or their church membership will be in jeopardy.

The writers say the stake presidents and bishops are acting under orders from high-ranking general authorities, a charge LDS officials neither confirm nor deny.

That was only the beginning of the story. Before long, it was on the UPI wire and a reporter from the New York Times was burning up the phone line to Provo. Pieces began to fall into place as the first article scared up more stories from a stunned community. Tracy was no longer dealing with a few isolated incidents. This was much bigger than that. The first word that came to mind was "crackdown."

It had begun in February when university officials banned the liberal newspaper Seventh East Press for "offend[ing] our sponsor, which is the LDS Church." After the newspaper folded, many of its writers were called in for "personal interviews" by their bishops and told they were "on the road to apostasy." One was forced to resign from a job with the Church. The editor of another paper, BYU Today, was dismissed. Then came the warnings to writers and historians off-campus who had written for liberal magazines and newspapers. Along the way, at least three professors at B.Y.U. were swept into the net, called in by Church officials and questioned on their writings.

Devout Mormons didn't know whom to be angrier at: the writers and professors for complaining, or Dawn Tracy for reporting their complaints. Richard Cracroft, dean of the College of Humanities at B.Y.U., lectured the malcontents: "If this is what the Brethren [the Prophet and his Apostles] want, then good Latter-day Saints must say it is appropriate. This may be difficult for scholars, but obedience is an important concept of the Mormon Church.” Dr. Keith Perkins, chairman of the Church History and Doctrine Department, couldn’t understand why all scholars didn’t share his view: “I want to write what the Lord wants written. I don’t want to offend the Lord.”

But in Provo and Salt Lake City and Logan, all along the Wasatch Range, a second word was being whispered more and more frequently as the chilling details piled up. Tracy heard it for the first time over the phone from J. D. Williams, a highly respected Mormon professor at the University of Utah: “It’s an inquisition.”

Dawn Tracy didn’t know it at the time, but the inquisition had begun long before.

Almost from the day in 1972 when Leonard Arrington took over as Church Historian and ushered in the so-called Camelot of Mormon history, the Brethren didn’t like it.

Ezra Taft Benson, the former Secretary of Agriculture in the Eisenhower Administration and the Prophet-in-waiting, railed against “humanistic philosophy” and “contextual history.” Ever since seeing the phrase “communal living” used to describe early Mormons, he had suspected the Historical Department was a hotbed of communists anyway. (Benson had once proclaimed, much to the embarrassment of his colleagues, that a good Mormon, “if he is to follow the Gospel, cannot also be a liberal Democrat.” His son, Reed, had once served as public relations director for the John Birch Society.)

The fact that Benson would soon replace the ailing Spencer Kimball as Prophet did not augur well for the historians.

Elder Boyd Packer was every bit as distrustful as Benson, but less discriminating. He didn’t like intellectuals of any stripe. In fact, he didn’t even like ideas if they weren’t his own. “Are you here to lobby or to listen?” he would demand of people who dared disagree with him. “Because if you’re here to lobby, you can leave. If you’re here to listen, you may have an audience.”

There were some among the Church leadership who didn’t care that much about the religious implications of the historical digging. To them the mission of the Church was to lay down a moral regimen for people, lead the political effort against pornography and other social ills (the ERA, for example), and promote a comfortable group identity that could be glamorized on the pages of the Reader’s Digest and in television ads. They were businessmen at heart. Any talk of religion—from the historians or the anti-historians—made them uncomfortable, and they wished that people wouldn't bother themselves with such questions.

But there was one thing that everybody cared about: the bottom line. More than politics or theology, it was the bottom line that finally turned pragmatists like Hinckley, who had been reading almost everything that came out of the Historical Department, against Arrington's Camelot.

The Mormon Church runs the most active and successful missionary program of any denomination in the world. In 1981, a Church press release boasted, "In an era of increasing disinterest [sic] in organized religion, someone joins the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints every two minutes and thirty seconds." One insider calls the missionary effort "the driving force of the contemporary Church."

And it didn't take a genius to know that what the historians were uncovering about money digging and polygamy didn't exactly lend itself to the all-important missionary effort. In fact, the reports were coming back from the field. These newspaper articles about Mormonism's colorful, cultish past were killing them in Polynesia.

In 1976 Hinckley appointed his old missionary buddy, G. Homer Durham, to rein in Arrington and his band of historians. Hinckley was smart enough P.R.-wise to know that mass executions in the Historical Department would only bring down the wrath of the national media. He had a better plan.

Durham was just the man for the job. When he wasn't in the field congratulating wealthy stakes for being wealthy and therefore blessed, he was in the First Presidency building, clawing his way up through the dense, sanctimonious jungle of the Church hierarchy. By general agreement, there had not been a more ambitious, more arrogant, more disagreeable, or more conniving General Authority since the wild days of Parley P. Pratt, an early Apostle who decided to take on a "plural" wife who was already married, adding bigamy to polygamy, and so enraging his new bride's first husband that he hunted Pratt down and sent him prematurely to the Celestial Kingdom.

Although considered flexible and kindly during his terms as Commissioner of Education in Arizona and president of Arizona State University, Durham had been transformed by the fierce competitiveness of the Church's inner circle into a Mormon Machiavelli. The closest he ever ventured to humility was a "holy gaze" with which he liked to receive visitors, especially groups of schoolchildren. When asked to give a brief speech at a devotional, he would invariably spend thirty minutes talking about himself and his accomplishments. Staff members down to secretaries and mail clerks, considered him “slimy,” “mean,” and “sneaky.” Even the benign Arrington referred to him as “Pharaoh.”

Durham wasted none of his charm on the Historical Department. He demoted Arrington from Church Historian to head of the Church’s Historical Department. He cut the department’s budget and staff. New publishing projects were held up indefinitely waiting for approval “from higher up” that never came. Writers were summarily cut off from Church-controlled historical records. A spy on the librarian’s staff underlined “controversial passages” and sent copies to the General Authorities.

Slowly, out of the public eye, Camelot was dismantled. Durham ordered that all publications be submitted to the Church Correlation Committee. Deseret Book (whose president, Lowell Durham, was G. Homer’s nephew) withdrew the contract to publish the sixteen-volume history of the Church. Arrington’s book for non-Mormons was allowed to proceed (it was under contract to a non-Mormon New York publisher). But the corresponding history for Mormons was subjected to heavy editorial pressure and then, despite its surprising commercial success, eased out of print.

On July 2, 1980, the Salt Lake Tribune announced the coup de grace: “The history research division of the Mormon church’s historical department will move to Brigham Young University. . . .” To demonstrate its commitment to history, the Church had decided to create a new Joseph Fielding Smith Institute for Church History based, appropriately enough, at the Church university. And who more appropriate to head this new institute than Dr. Leonard J. Arrington, distinguished church historian—now lower case. The crucial news was buried further down in the press release: “The department’s library and archives and arts and sites division will remain at the church’s Salt Lake City headquarters, said church President Spencer W. Kimball. . . .” In other words, if you can’t take the documents away from the historians, take the historians away from the documents. At B.Y.U., they would still be within the fold—Church employees—but out of harm’s way.

It was a brilliant stroke, another public relations coup: a knockout punch delivered in a good-news press release. And the author, of course, was Gordon Hinckley.

For those historians who might have missed the subtle message of Hinckley’s maneuver, Elder Boyd Packer spelled out the Church’s new attitude in a speech on August 22, 1981.

I have come to believe that it is the tendency for many members of the Church who spend a great deal of time in academic research to begin to judge the Church, its doctrine, organization, and leadership, present and past, by the principles of their own profession. . . . In my mind it ought to be the other way around. . . .

There is a temptation for the writer or the teacher of Church history to want to tell everything, whether it is worthy or faith promoting or no.

Some things that are true are not very useful. . . . Be careful that you build faith rather than destroy it. . . .

For the truly thickskulled who still didn't get the message, Packer brandished the big gun.

A destroyer of faith—particularly one within the Church, and more particularly one who is employed specifically to build faith—places himself in great spiritual jeopardy. He is serving the wrong master and unless he repents, he will not be among the faithful in the eternities. . . . In the Church we are not neutral. We are one-sided. There is a war going on, and we are engaged in it. . . . [T]here is a limit to the patience of the Lord with respect to those who are under covenant to bless and protect His Church and kingdom upon the earth but do not do it.

In 1982, Arrington was dismissed from his position in the Church Historical Department. His replacement: G. Homer Durham.

With their own house in order, the General Authorities set out to bring the rest of the flock to heel.

Brent Metcalfe couldn't imagine what the meeting was for. Sure, once or twice, he had slipped off to the men's room without permission. But did they have to make a federal case out of it? How typical of the FBI types in Church Security. A simple reprimand wasn't enough. They had to call a meeting in the personnel rep's office.

But the meeting wasn't about trips to the men's room. As soon as Metcalfe sat down, his boss, Ron Francis, began reading from a piece of paper: You are ordered not to associate any further with groups that exhibit “anti-Church attitudes.” Something like that.

When Francis was done, Metcalfe asked to see the paper.

“You can’t,” said Francis.

Metcalfe, a soft-spoken, dark-haired, eager-looking young man, wasn’t sure he understood what was happening. He had written some articles six months before for the Seventh East Press and had recently been asked to contribute to Sunstone. But not even Francis could consider either one of those publications subversive—could he?

Francis continued: “You are to sever yourself from involvement with people, groups, or publications that teach doctrines, privately or publicly, which are contrary to those of the Prophet.” Even at fifty, Francis was six feet of military clichés and proud of it. He always said, in a way that was simultaneously menacing and incoherent, there was nothing he wouldn’t do for his job. “Furthermore, you are not to write, publish, speak publicly, debate, etc. on controversial Church-related topics, and you are prohibited from serving on boards, committees, staffs, etc. of any controversial organizations.”

Metcalfe was tempted to invoke the name of his father, who was, after all, the managing director of the Temple Department, the man who supervised Temples all around the world. But it was clear these men already knew who his father was—and didn’t care. Which meant that this meeting had been authorized very, very high up.

“Your employment will be subject to termination if you don’t cease these activities immediately.”

“My employment means a great deal to me,” Metcalfe said, thinking immediately of his wife, Jill, and their two-year-old daughter, Michala. “I am willing to do what you want.” He agreed to the terms that were set and was placed on thirty days’ probation.

The next day, he told his editors at Sunstone that he would no longer be available as a writer. Two days later, he resigned from the Seventh East Press and asked the editor to remove his name from the masthead. Then he went to the personnel rep’s office to report what he had done.

Metcalfe heard nothing more until March 10, the last day of his probation. On that day, he was summoned to a meeting with Francis and the head of Church Security, Martell Bird. The presence of the martinet Bird omened ill. The two men had butted heads a year before when Bird instructed Metcalfe to cease writing rebuttals to anti-Mormon groups in New Zealand, Metcalfe’s native country and the site of his mission. Apparently, higher-ups thought his “defenses” of the Church were doing more damage than the critics' attacks. "You are not to give firesides or speak publicly responding to anti-Mormons," Bird had commanded. At the time, Metcalfe had insisted that he was just a seeker after truth whose only wish was to "pursue historical research with a great deal of honesty and to let history lead me rather than me to lead history." Well, Martell Bird wasn't buying any of that doubletalk.

Ron Francis acted as spokesman for the group: "Brother Bird and I are all very pleased with your total compliance with the rules and guidelines given to you. And with the openness and honesty expressed during our previous meeting on February 11. With the completion of this probation, all is forgotten. This probationary period will in no way stay in your record or affect your pay increases or job promotions."

That night, for the first time in a month, Metcalfe slept soundly.

But three weeks later, he was summoned to the office of Russ Homer, the managing director of Personnel.

"The Brethren have told us to call you in," Homer began. "They have reason to believe that you have violated your probation. They feel an inquisition is necessary."

Metcalfe went a little breathless at the sound of the word. He considered himself a historian. How could they use that word so lightly? Did Homer realize what he was saying?

In fact, Homer was oblivious to anything other than the task at hand. "They've asked us to determine," he continued, "if your historical research and scriptural studies are such as to warrant your termination."

Inquisition was the right word.

Once the questioning began, it was fast and furious. "What do you research?" "How?" "Why?" "Have people assisted you?" "Who?"

There were questions about his friends and associates. "Who are they?" "What are their names?"

The questions were not based on any concrete information, but instead fired randomly in the hopes of finding something, anything, to show that he had violated his probation.

"How often do you go to the Historical Department?"

"My visits to the Historical Library are sporadic."

"How much time do you spend there?"

"Sometimes I will spend as much as four to five hours a week studying there."

"Have you had any further involvement with Sunstone?"

"No. But I did drop by to see if their new magazine had been published."

"You shouldn't even be reading these magazines. You want to avoid the very appearance of evil."

Metcalf began to wonder what country he was in, let alone what Church he belonged to. His back stiffened. "If you're telling me what I can and cannot read," he said, "then something is very wrong, and you'll have my resignation tomorrow."

Utter silence. He realized he had expected them to say, "Oh, no, no, that's not what we're telling you." They didn't.

Homer, apparently frustrated by the fruitlessness of the enterprise, began reading from a list of prepared questions.

"Do you have a Temple recommend?"

"Yes."

Metcalf could see immediately where this was headed. In order to have a Temple recommend, you must pledge that you have "sustained the General Authorities"—meaning that you haven't questioned the Church leaders in any troublesome way. If they couldn't get him for something substantive, they would get him for perjury.

"Now, what books have you been reading in the Historical Department during the last week?"

Metcalf listed each book he had read.

"Were any old books used in your studies?"

This was the crux. In Homer's calculus, old books apparently meant unedited books, "uncorrelated" books, dangerous books. When somebody used old books they were rummaging too far back into the true history of the Church. Terror of the past was palpable in Homer's voice.

"Your research is what is known as 'delving into the mysteries,'" Homer said.

"I didn't realize that researching Church history was considered that way."

"It is. The Brethren feel it is harmful to the Church."

With that, the inquisition came to an abrupt end.

Until April 8, when Metcalf was again summoned to the Personnel office.

"You are being terminated from Church employment," Ron Francis informed him.

It wasn't really a surprise. A shock, but not a surprise.

"What are the grounds for the termination?" Metcalf asked, struggling to remain composed.

There was no answer.

"What are the grounds for the termination?"

Again, no answer.

He asked one last time. "What are the grounds for the termination?"

Finally someone spoke up. "You are being terminated because you didn't conform to the spirit of the things discussed in our previous meetings."

That was a lie, Metcalfe was certain, and he was suddenly indignant. "I fulfilled every requirement you asked of me."

"You conformed to the letter of the things that were previously discussed, but not the spirit."

"Give me specific examples of my neglect in conforming to the spirit."

Long pause. Much discomfort and many sidelong looks. Finally, weakly: "Your support for the General Authorities is questionable."

On May 16, 1983, Brent wrote President Gordon Hinckley a seven-page letter, describing his ordeal in detail and asking for his help. It concluded:

I cannot emphasize too emphatically that in all the detailed researching and studying that I have done, nothing can approach the detrimental effect on the spiritual well being of my family and I resulting from the events described herein. . . . As of this date, May 16, 1983, I remain unemployed.

May 16 was his birthday.

Hinckley never responded. But within a month, Metcalfe was offered a job by Steve Christensen at CFS. Hinckley, it was said, didn't like loose ends.

30 To Lyn Jacobs, who had moved to Cambridge, Massachusetts, in the fall of 1984 to begin a divinity degree at Harvard, Mark Hofmann's soprano on the other end of the line sounded like a voice from another world. It reminded him again how far the Harvard Divinity School was from the LDS Church, how far Harvard Square was from Temple Square. One thing was the same, though. His first-semester study of early Christian history had reconfirmed for him that much of what Christians now believe, like much of what Mormons now believe, was imposed on their religion long after its founder died.

The voice sounded excited—very unusual for the cool, unflappable Hofmann. Something was up.

When Jacobs left that fall, Hofmann asked him to be on the lookout for stampless covers—letters that were mailed prior to 1850, before postage stamps were introduced, and therefore bore only the imprint of the post office where they were mailed, the date, and the cost of mailing, which varied depending on the number of pages and how far the letter was going. Hofmann was particularly interested in any stampless covers coming out of Palmyra, New York. “You know, not everybody back East knows who Joseph Smith is,” he said with his usual edge of sarcasm. “Something important might have gone unnoticed.”

In his first hectic months of school, Jacobs wasn’t able to do any looking, but he did give Hofmann a few names of dealers who might help him find something.

That was the last Jacobs had heard from him until this day. Just by the sound of his voice, it was clear that he had contacted those dealers and had found something—something big.

Hofmann described an “incredible” find, a letter dated 1830, written by Martin Harris, the same farmer and Smith intimate who had taken the Anthon Transcript to New York for verification. Hofmann didn’t have to go any further. Harris’s name was enough to make it a spectacular discovery even if it was only a laundry list. But this was much more than that. This was nothing less than Harris’s version of the finding of the gold plates.

“Get a load of this,” Hofmann clucked as he began to read:

... Joseph often sees Spirits here with great kettles of coin money it was Spirits who brought up rock because Joseph made no attempt on their money I latter dream I converse with spirits which let me count their money when I awake I have in my hand a dollar coin which I take for a sign. . . .

Jacobs’s first thought, as he listened to the long document, was, “I can’t believe it, Mark’s done it again.” His second thought was, “I’ll never see a dime.” He should have asked for some kind of agreement when he provided Hofmann with the names of those dealers, he thought. Now it was too late.

He tuned out on the rest of the letter.

Michael Marquardt, however, was all ears when Hofmann called him in late November. He scribbled notes frantically as Hofmann read tantalizing excerpts:

To W. W. Phelps, postmarked Palmyra, October 23rd, 1830. in the fall of the year 1827 I hear Joseph found a gold bible I take Joseph aside & he says it is true I found it 4 years ago with my stone but only just got it because of the enchantment the old spirit come to me 3 times in the same dream & says dig up the gold but when I take it up the next morning the spirit transfigured himself from a white salamander in the bottom of the hole & struck me 3 times. . . . Joseph found some giant silver spectacles with the plates he puts them in a old hat & in the darkness reads the words & in this way it is all translated & written down. . . .

Something had to be wrong, Marquardt thought. This couldn't be the story of the golden plates. This story didn't sound Mormon at all. It didn't even sound Christian. There was no vision of God, no mention of Christ. Where was the kindly Angel Moroni who, as all Mormon children learn, showed Joseph where to dig? This story sounded more like a Grimms' fairy tale than a Sunday-school lesson: kettles of money guarded by spirits, seer stones, enchanted spells, magic "spectacles," ghostly visitations. And instead of a benevolent angel, a cantankerous and tricky "old spirit" who transforms himself into a white salamander!

This was just the link that was needed to connect Joseph Smith's early involvement in money digging and folk magic, proved by the Glass Looker trial records, with the folk magic at the core of the Book of Mormon. No longer able to deny Smith's connection to money digging and magic, the Church had tried to palm it off as "youthful indiscretion," unrelated to his later religious activities. This new letter showing that Smith had never abandoned his interest in the occult blew a gaping hole in that explanation.

Marquardt couldn't dial the Tanners' number fast enough.

"You won't believe this one," he exulted in his bizarre, singsong voice. "A letter has been found, a letter from Martin Harris, and it says the money-digging thing and it refers to this old spirit."

"Doesn't it mention an angel?" Jerald Tanner asked, remembering Fawn Brodie's theory that Joseph Smith's "angel story" evolved from his illegal money-digging activities.

"Not a word," reported Marquardt.

"When was it dated?"

"Eighteen-thirty."

"Boy, that's kind of late," said Tanner. Although fascinated by Smith's early involvement with folk magic (he had written a book on the subject), Tanner was by nature a suspicious man, whether he liked what he heard or not. "It seems like the story would have evolved more by then. Are you sure it doesn't mention an angel at all?"

"No. Nothing about an angel. Just this old spirit who transforms himself into a white salamander."

There was a pause on the other end as Jerald assessed the startling news. "That's amazing," he finally said—a rave from the undemonstrative Jerald Tanner. "Quite a sensational find."

At ten in the morning, December 11, Marquardt arrived at Hofmann's house, questions swarming in his mind. Was the letter in Harris's handwriting? Were there examples against which to compare it? What did the rest of the letter say? Where did Mark get it? From the Phelps family? Where was it postmarked? Did it have the correct postage?

The meeting lasted for five hours. Hofmann didn't have the document itself, only a typescript and a photocopy. The original was still in the seller's hands. The price was $18,000. With a check already made out, Hofmann was ready to jump on the next plane to Boston. But before he did, he wanted Marquardt's advice on "getting the letter out," i.e., making it public.

"Who should I leak it to?" Hofmann wondered aloud. "The New York Times? L.A. Times? Newsweek? Time?" The list of names sent him into a reverie.

"It's up to you," said Marquardt, his mind on whether the typescript was accurate.

"You know the Church isn't going to like this," Hofmann said at one point. "How do you think we could soften the blow?" It was an awkward question for Marquardt. He was used to bird-dogging the Church and rushing into print whatever he could get his hands on. Why was Hofmann talking to him, one of the Church's archenemies, about "softening the blow"?

Marquardt suggested accentuating the positive. "Say something about the fact that Harris was a witness to the Book of Mormon," he suggested lamely. "Emphasize the faith-promoting aspects of it."

"What faith-promoting aspects?" Hofmann looked surprised.

"It confirms the Anthon Transcript."

Hofmann smiled his strange smile.

When Marquardt asked where he had found the document, Hofmann talked elusively about "a dealer back East." Surely Marquardt understood, he couldn't reveal the name. But at one point in the conversation, something very curious happened. After flourishing the envelope that the copy had supposedly come in, he turned it face down on his desk within easy reach of Marquardt and abruptly left the room. Marquardt looked at it for a long time, turning it over in his mind, then decided he "couldn't afford to be caught looking at it."

If he had looked at it, he would have seen Lyn Jacobs's address.

Despite all his protests, Marquardt realized, Hofmann hoped that he would see the letter in tomorrow's New York Times. He hadn't been giving Hofmann advice on how he should leak it, Hofmann had been giving him tips on how he should leak it. After all, hadn't Marquardt leaked the inscription on the Joseph Smith III blessing, the letter from Joseph Smith making his son heir to the Church? Soon after Hofmann showed it to him, it appeared in a pamphlet published by the Tanners. "Boy, the Church was sure upset that that got out," Hofmann said to him afterward, with everything but a wink and a nod.

What Marquardt didn't realize was that Hofmann wanted to make sure that when the letter did leak, the name attached to it was Lyn Jacobs, not Mark Hofmann.

That night Hofmann called Jacobs in Cambridge. "I just wanted to reassure you," he said. "You had a part in finding the letter, you should have a share in the profits." Jacobs was surprised and thrilled.

Two days later, Hofmann called Marquardt in a tiff. "Someone has leaked," he said in the voice of a playground bully. Even worse, the leak had gotten back to the seller and, for a while, it looked like the deal was off. But, fortunately, Hofmann had calmed him down and saved the sale.

When Lyn Jacobs arrived home for Christmas vacation on December 16, he saw for the first time the document that, according to Hofmann, he, Jacobs, had discovered. To appreciative eyes, it was an exquisitely fragile fragment of history: a single folded sheet of foolscap, worn and creased and penned in faded brown ink. Hinckley's going to want this, Jacobs thought, the adding machine starting up again. If there was ever a document that the Church would want off the streets and safely locked away in The Vault, this was it. Jacobs felt a twinge of sadness. It really was too bad: holographic documents weren't his passion, but he had to admit, it was a beautiful piece of work. Hofmann, too, seemed proud of it in a strange way—which was one reason his request came as such a surprise.

"I want you to do the selling."

Jacobs was shocked. He wanted to know why.

"I don't want the publicity," Hofmann said. "There have been some threats on my family."

Together they decided what to ask for it. Jacobs took the high road, Mark the low. They never came any closer than "anywhere between $25,000 and $60,000." Jacobs thought Mark was surprisingly casual about price—the only thing he seemed to care about was that his name be kept out of the sale.

In early January, Jacobs took the letter into Donald Schmidt in the Church archives. When Schmidt heard the asking price, he said exactly what Jacobs knew he would: "You know I'm not able to make decisions in that price range."

Jacobs liked this act. With this bombshell under his arm, people paid attention to him. They treated him differently. He wasn't just a local eccentric whom people tolerated. He got respect. "That's okay," he told Schmidt with a toss of his shiny ringlets. He would take it up with Hinckley.

It was a memorable encounter. The hushed, paneled rooms of the First Presidency had not often, if ever, been a backdrop for such high-camp theater. From the moment Jacobs bounced into Hinckley's softly lighted, minimally decorated office in baggy Italian pants and purple-and-black shirt—he liked to wear dark colors with his dark hair—Hinckley moved about like a man caught in a freezer.

There were a few words of introduction and then an awkward pause. "Are you a member of the Church?" Hinckley asked, trying, apparently, to establish Jacobs's pliancy. "I understand that you were a missionary in the Canadian mission."

Hinckley had obviously done his homework. But it wouldn't work: the first few times Jacobs had sold items to the Church archives, Schmidt had tried to make him feel that, as a member of the Church, he should simply "give the stuff up." It hadn't worked then, and it wouldn't work now.

"Do you know Mark Hofmann?" Hinckley asked.

"Yes, I do."

Another awkward pause, then Hinckley, his hands clasped in front of him, knuckles white, said quietly, "The letter, the letter." But when Jacobs finally handed it to him, he read it without the slightest sign of emotion. He could have been reading an insurance policy.

When he finished, he slid the letter onto his slick, empty desktop and clasped his hands together.

"Well, what should we do about it?" he finally asked, without a trace of emotion in his voice. Another day, another problem. Running a church was much like running a railroad.

If that was supposed to be a philosophical question, Jacobs wasn't going to pay any attention to it. He had only one thing on his mind, and he answered the question he wanted to hear.

"What I'd like is one of the coins that Brigham Young minted." Without Hofmann there to control him, Jacobs's greed was getting the better of him. Those coins—$40 and $20 Mormon gold pieces—were worth somewhere between $25,000 and $100,000. The warm-up with Schmidt had made him feel invincible.

For the first time, Hinckley showed an emotion: a shadow of disgust passed over his benign, bureaucratic face. He didn't look astonished at the high price, just perturbed that anyone would demand it. Obviously, he, too, knew how much those gold pieces were worth. "That's a little high," he said very slowly, very much in control.

Jacobs burst into justifications. "Look, if I sell the coin, I'll have to pay almost 50 percent, you know, capital-gains tax. So you have to understand that the real profit on this is only half." Hinckley didn't look as if he appreciated the lesson in tax accounting. "Besides," added Jacobs, "you've got two sets."

"No way," Hinckley said firmly. "We have that as an investment."

"Okay," Jacobs relented, too quickly. "Good-bye to that one. Okay, I want a Book of Commandments."

Hinckley looked at Jacobs suspiciously. There was only one question on Hinckley's mind, it seemed, and it had little to do with price: Could this man be trusted to keep quiet about the contents of the document and about the Church's involvement?

At the first opportunity, Hinckley broke in. Jacobs read the look on his face as "I don't want this document unless you make it a donation." The meeting was not going well. "Well," Hinckley began portentously. "I don't really think we can do any business here. I'm not sure the Church would be interested in acquiring the letter at this time."

Trying to stay in control of the negotiations, while pumping new life into them, Jacobs said, "The other person we might offer the letter to is Brent Ashworth, since he's bought so many documents before." Jacobs didn't really believe that. He knew that Ashworth collected faith-promoting documents. This wasn't even close.

"Well, that might be a good idea," Hinckley said, to Jacobs's surprise.

"Brent might not be averse to donating it to us." That wasn't any more likely than Ashworth's buying it in the first place.

Then Hinckley stood up: "This meeting is over."

Jacobs was stunned. Didn't Hinckley realize how explosive this letter was? Could he be so dense? Was he willing to dismiss the only chance the Church would have to bury this bombshell?

In fact, Hinckley wasn't dense, nor was he dismissing anything, especially not this bombshell.

Lyn Jacobs didn't know what had gone wrong.

"Well, Mark, I mean, you know, what can I say? No gold coin, no Book of Commandments. What are we going to do now?"

Hofmann sat on the other side of the booth, paying more attention to his hamburger than to Jacobs's excuses. "You asked for too much," he said absently, thinking that Jacobs had been the wrong man for the job all along. "It'll be a neat experiment," he had told himself at the time. The idea of putting Jacobs together with Hinckley had appealed to his sense of humor. Now he realized it was a mistake. How could Hinckley trust someone like Jacobs to keep the deal a secret? He was hardly the picture of a faithful, do-as-you're-told Mormon.

But Hofmann had other problems. He was still brooding over his meeting with Brent Ashworth earlier that day.

"It's selling for $50,000," he had told Ashworth. "The Church wants to buy it."

Ashworth read the long typescript of the letter from Martin Harris. In all the years the two men had been dealing, Hofmann had always shown him originals.

"Lyn has the original," Hofmann anticipated. "But we want to offer it to you first."

Ashworth shook his head. "Well, that's great, because I don't want it. It's obviously a non-faith-promoting document, and I am buying faith-promoting documents."

Hofmann tried a different tack. "It's a very major document," he said, leading to Ashworth's taste for publicity. "Time magazine says they may be interested in doing a story on it."

"Well, I hope not," Ashworth said, laughing. "I mean the Church doesn't need that kind of publicity."

"Besides," he added. "I think it's a fake."

Hofmann looked intrigued. "You think so?"

Ashworth had recently reread Mormonism Unveiled, a famous early attack on the Church, and there were just too many similarities between the "old toad jumping out of the box" in E. D. Howe's 1834 account and this silly white salamander. "It's probably a very early forgery," Ashworth said, "but I think it's a forgery."

Hofmann jumped in. "Dean Jessee's seen this already. Lyn's shown it to Dean, and Dean has authenticated it. He spent a lot of time on it. There may be some similarities, but this has been authenticated. It's gonna be in Time."

"Personally, I think it's a fake," Ashworth repeated, more softly this time. "But you know, I could be wrong."

"The Church wants to buy it," Hofmann pressed.

"Well, they really ought to have it. Because they ought to be the ones to own that letter. That's something that no collector should be stuck with having to explain or mess with."

Not a very encouraging response.

The next morning, Hofmann decided to try again. If the real problem was Jacobs's sales pitch, then maybe the Church would buy it from him. He called Don Schmidt and told him he could obtain complete control over the document and then he, Hofmann, would sell it to the Church. They could trust him, as they had in the past.

Schmidt wanted to know the price for this service.

"I think I can get it for ten or fifteen," Mark said.

Schmidt had to check with his superiors.

In the meantime, Hofmann tried to develop another buyer, maybe get an auction going. He remembered that Brent Metcalfe, whom he had gotten to know better since he left Church Security, was doing historical research for a rich businessman who was eager to buy Mormon documents—especially controversial documents. So eager, in fact, that he had supplied Metcalfe, and Metcalfe had supplied Hofmann, with a list of the topics he was interested in.

It was quite a shopping list: the coming forth of the Book of Mormon, Joseph Smith's involvement with money digging, the early practice of polygamy, the Adam-God theory, and the priesthood in the Temple. In short, every area of special Church sensitivity.

At the time, it seemed a little strange that an established Mormon businessman (a bishop in the Church, according to Metcalfe) would want to collect such verboden materials, especially at a time when the Church was cracking down. But now Hofmann was too desperate to afford the luxury of a lot of questions. He called Metcalfe.

"You're not going to believe this document Lyn and I found. It's made to order, so to speak," Hofmann told him. "It has to do with early Mormonism."

"Does it have to do with the origins of Mormonism?" Metcalfe asked.

"Yes."

"Does it have to do with the coming forth of the Book of Mormon?"

"Yes."

"Does it have to do with the money digging?" Metcalfe was getting more excited with each question.

"I'll just bring it down and show it to you."

Hofmann drove over to Metcalfe's office in the CFS building and showed him the document.

Metcalfe sat and read it. All he could say was, "Oh, my gosh." And when he was done, "I can't believe this."

Metcalfe ran down the hall and returned in a few minutes with a handsome, stout, surprisingly young man.

"Mark Hofmann," he said, barely able to contain his excitement, "this is Steve Christensen."

Gordon Hinckley had to consider Steve Christensen just about as perfect as a Mormon could get—in this world, at least. Handsome, in a kind of overstuffed way that bespoke a manly appetite and an absence of vanity, well dressed, well groomed, well spoken, and, best of all, impeccably deferential to his elders. Thanks to his meteoric rise at CFS, he could now safely be considered "successful" despite being only thirty. He had a wife, Terri, who wasn't just stunningly beautiful, but smart and sensible too, and three handsome young sons, Joshua, Justin, and Jared.

Among the elders of the Church like Hinckley, Christensen was already something of a legend. A former Boy Scout and president of his senior class, Steve had left a conspicuous trail of good works and warm feelings in his rapid rise up the Church ladder. There was the time on his mission to Australia when the local teenage kids were vandalizing the ward house. Young Christensen solved the problem not by going to the local police, but by organizing Church-sponsored soccer matches—with punch and cookies after the game. There was the time in Centerville, the suburb where he lived, when a fire consumed a nursery and Christensen mobilized the community to help rebuild. There was the time of the great flood, when he led the sandbagging effort, saving dozens of homes and businesses.

The legend was helped enormously, of course, by the fact that Steve's father was "Mr. Mac," the owner of a chain of clothing stores in the Salt Lake City area and a fixture on television advertisements in which he hawked his wares with the fervor of a TV evangelist. Men like Hinckley had grown up with Mr. Mac. They had bought their suits from him—when he would let them pay. Their pictures hung on the walls of his stores like pictures of sports stars in a bar or of movie stars at Sardi's.

As soon as Steve learned to drive, his father had sent him out with truckloads of suits to the homes of important General Authorities. They could shop at home, pick the ones they liked. When the bill came, it was always dramatically reduced—if it came at all. What was good for the Church was good for business, Mac Christensen believed. In fact, in his mind, the two were practically indistinguishable. It was said of him, admiringly, "Going to work and going to church are pretty much the same thing for Mac."

It was on those home-shopping visits that Church leaders first met Steve Christensen. He was the serious, diffident young man driving the Mr. Mac truck, his tie pulled up tight around his neck, his hair recently cut (every two weeks) and neatly combed, speaking in hushed tones, shaking their hands solidly. He impressed them even then.

Steve Christensen had a knack for doing that—impressing older men. In Australia, his mission president was so taken by his knowledge of Church history and doctrine that he took the young man under his wing and appointed him district leader. In college, Steve made a deep impression on a history professor when he went out and bought a multivolume history of the Popes instead of merely "taking a look at it," as the professor had suggested. At CFS, he won his way into Gary Sheets's heart with a slick, bound report listing the "ways he could make Sheets's life easier."

(The list included chauffeur service for Sheets's peewee baseball team.) Sheets rewarded him by making him president of the company at age thirty-one.

Christensen worked the same magic with the father figures on Temple Square. While still in his early twenties, he was appointed to the General Church-Writing Committee and, at twenty-four, chosen to head the highly important Church Doctrinal-Resource Committee, a group of much older academics and theologians who prepared doctrinal briefing papers for the General Authorities. Three years later, even God responded to Christensen's charms, "calling" him to serve as the bishop of his ward in Centerville. At twenty-seven, he was the youngest bishop in the Church outside of college wards.

With Hinckley's backing, Christensen was sure to reach regional representative within a few years, and the Quorum of the Seventy soon after that. Gary Sheets had said it: "Steve Christensen was born to be a General Authority." But everyone knew that was only the beginning. Once in the Seventy, advancement would be largely a matter of seniority, and it wasn't stretching a point to guess that with his head start, Christensen might someday be a likely candidate for the First Presidency, or, dare anyone speculate, the capo di tutti capi, Prophet, Seer, and Revelator.

Gordon Hinckley knew that if anyone could succeed at a delicate task involving sensitive documents, it was Steve Christensen.

But there were, in fact, two Steve Christensens, and men like Gordon Hinckley saw only one of them. As the oldest of eight children of a tyrannical, ungiving father, Christensen had learned everything there was to know about deference and accommodation, about the appearance of obedience and the reality of resistance. Underneath the Boy Scout uniform, there was, by Mormon standards at least, a closet rebel.

Gordon Hinckley would have been astonished at the way Bishop Christensen, Apostle-in-training, ran his ward. The Church maintained that ward jobs were assigned by God. Not Steve Christensen. "Look," he told a Sunday-school class soon after being called, "you might as well know, speaking at least about myself and about 90 percent of the bishops, we're not inspired when we call you to a Church job. So if you covet another job, don't covet it, just come ask for it." The Church maintained that people with serious psychological problems should seek counsel from their bishop. Apostle Bruce R. McConkie had gone so far as to describe psychiatry as "the Church of the Devil." But when members of Christensen's ward came to him with serious problems, he ignored McConkie's warnings and sent them to a psychiatrist. He even offered to help pay the bills.

The Church ordered that young people who engaged in premarital sex should be denied their Temple recommends. Christensen told members to "just keep quiet about it." When one young man came to him just before heading out on a mission and said he was planning to make a confession to the stake president, Christensen advised against it. "If you confess to him, he'll make you stay behind for six months. Only God can really forgive you, so work it out with Him."

The Church exalted businessmen. Christensen excoriated them. "Why should a businessman who bilks people out of their money but who is righteous in his own mind go to the Temple instead of someone who is conscientious enough to be aware of his own sins?" he asked once. "The honest one is going to come in and confess all of his sins. He's the one who really ought to be able to go to the Temple. He's the one who's truly worthy."

Christensen knew he was straying from the path. "It's only a matter of time," he told close friends, "before they fire me as bishop." But so far his luck had held. His superiors were so taken with his charms and with his bottom line (tithing went up substantially after he became bishop), that every time he offered to quit, they pleaded with him to stay. "If you ever want to release me from my job as bishop," he told his stake president, "I'm ready and willing to be released any day. Just say the word." But the answer was always, "Oh, no, no, no. You're doing great." It was another of the many tactics he had learned in Mac Christensen's shadow.

And that wasn't the worst of it. If Hinckley would have found Steve's anti-authoritarian methods disappointing, he would have found his ideas appalling. Christensen's vast readings in Mormon history had convinced him that the golden plates were not ancient, if in fact they existed at all, and that the Book of Mormon, while it may have been divinely inspired, certainly wasn't what Joseph Smith claimed it was. He also knew that the modern Mormon Church bore only the most superficial resemblance to the Church that Smith founded. With social Mormons and friends among the anti-Mormon underground, he shared these heretical views. But to the men in power, to Gordon Hinckley and the other father figures in his life, he never breathed a word of doubt or dissent.

In his rare, immodest moments, Christensen considered himself representative of modern, thinking Mormons. He believed in the culture, if not in the doctrine—at least as the current leaders of the Church conceived it. But he didn't know if he could separate the two, and was afraid to try. "I won't do anything that might get me excommunicated," he told a friend. "I would rather lie publicly and recant my personal beliefs than allow myself to be excommunicated and hurt my family."

Christensen took the document Hofmann handed him to his office and read it quietly. Like Hinckley, he said nothing. He just looked up, his face a blank, and asked, "How much do you want for it?"

"Twenty thousand." Hofmann realized immediately that he had answered too quickly. "That's what Lyn wants for it," he corrected himself.

"How about $25,000?" Steve said. "That way Lyn can get $20,000 and you can get $5,000 for your efforts."

"I'll have to check with Lyn."

Later the same day, Hofmann met with Don Schmidt in the Church Office Building.

Schmidt had good news. He had spoken with Durham and Hinckley. They had agreed to buy the letter for $15,000 if Hofmann could guarantee confidentiality. Had he shown the letter to anyone? No, said Hofmann. Can Jacobs be trusted? On the phone that morning, Hofmann had reassured Schmidt that Jacobs could be "sworn to secrecy." The fact that he was asking again only verified what Hofmann had suspected all along: Hinckley didn't trust the flamboyant Harvard student even as far as tomorrow. This time, with Christensen's offer on the table, Hofmann hesitated.

There is another way, he said.

"If the Church would prefer," he began in a speculative tone, as if the idea were just coming to him, "we could see that it was sold to a faithful member of the Church. If Hinckley doesn't want . . ."—better not to be too specific. "If the Church is afraid of the publicity. . . ." He knew that Hinckley would never trust Jacobs to keep quiet, no matter how many oaths he swore. "We could arrange to have it sold to a faithful member who would . . ." Would what? Keep quiet? He thought it best to take a tactful approach, ". . . who would handle it the way the Church thought appropriate." Schmidt was arguably naive but certainly not stupid. He understood. "That way Church officials wouldn't be officially making decisions."

Once again, Hofmann was offering them what they most wanted: plausible deniability.

Schmidt said he would check with his superiors.

* * *

The next day, he called with the news Hofmann was expecting. "My superiors think it would be more appropriate to have that happen to it—so far as a faithful member making the purchase."

Now the only question was, How badly did Christensen want it?

Hofmann returned to the CFS building the next day with some startling news. "I was wrong," he told Christensen. "Lyn wants $100,000."

Steve Christensen had walked out of negotiations over less. But he wanted this document.

"You know the Church is interested in buying this," Hofmann said ominously. He had done his homework. Someone had told him, probably Metcalfe, that Christensen sided with the new historians who wanted to investigate the Church's past, even the dark corners of Joseph Smith's money digging. If the Church bought the letter, Hofmann intimated, no one would ever see it again.

Christensen knew better. He had been on the phone already with Spencer Kimball's secretary, Arthur Haycock, and G. Homer Durham. Durham had warned him that this was a "sensitive document" and had to be treated accordingly. Christensen had reassured him that his intentions were entirely "faithful," that he had no intention of embarrassing the Church. His mission was to get that letter and keep it out of "enemy hands."

Christensen shared none of this with Metcalfe or Hofmann.

After a day or two of negotiations, Hofmann informed Metcalfe that Jacobs would take $40,000. Christensen agreed to pay that amount—almost precisely the value of the Book of Commandments Jacobs had originally asked for from Hinckley. The night before the contract was to be signed, Hofmann called Jacobs and broke the news. "I've made all the arrangements," he said. This was the first Jacobs had heard of it. "A contract is drawn up, and Christensen will be paying $40,000, with $10,000 payments every six months." Jacobs was startled but pleased. His share, $5,000, would pay for his first-term tuition at Harvard Divinity School.

On January 6, 1984, Metcalfe met Hofmann and Jacobs in the reception area of the CFS building and escorted them to Christensen's office to sign the contract. Hofmann hung back and let Jacobs take center stage. It was, after all, Jacobs's discovery.

On January 9, Christensen wrote G. Homer Durham to inform him that the document was safely in his hands and to reassure him that if and when the document was made public, it would only be after a thorough analysis by “faithful historians” and accompanied by a “careful commentary.” In the long run, he added, “it is my intention and desire to donate the document to the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints.”

When Peggy Fletcher, the editor of Sunstone magazine, heard that a letter linking Joseph Smith to money digging and folk magic was being suppressed by the Church, she went straight to the top.

“President Hinckley, I really, really think this letter should be released to the public. You could call a press conference and say, ‘We have this letter, we don’t know what the implications of it are. It’s just of interest, and we’re not ashamed of it.’ It’s so much better if we do that as a Church. A lot of people are talking about this. I have been called by people from all over, including Time magazine, who are going to do a story on it. Why don’t we just do it ourselves? That way we won’t look like we’re hiding it or are ashamed of it.”

Hinckley paused for a moment. “We don’t own the document,” he finally said. “And so we can’t call a press conference. Christensen has it.”

“I know that,” Fletcher pressed. “But you know Steve, and I know Steve. If you called him and said, ‘Let’s have a press conference, a joint press conference,’ you know he would do it.”

Hinckley took another long pause, the very model of patience. “It’s out of my hands,” he said. “It’s not my problem.”

Now that they had the document, the two Steve Christensens couldn’t agree on what to do with it.

One hired a team of researchers to study the “historical context” of the letter with the objective of writing “the ultimate book on early Mormonism, especially on the magic connection.” The panel reflected all of Christensen’s guarded hopes for more openness in Mormon scholarship. The group included, on the one hand, Dean Jessee, the Church’s favorite handwriting expert, and on the other, Ron Walker, a senior research historian at the Joseph Fielding Smith Institute, who was reported to be deeply troubled by the Church’s hostility toward independent scholarship. After much pleading, Christensen even included Brent Metcalfe, whose borderline apostasy was well known—especially to the Church.

On January 24, Christensen charged his team of truth seekers: “I believe that the work that you Brethren do will be of significance to Mormon scholarship in the years to come, that this can and will become a standard cited reference, and that the Church will be blessed as a result of the honest, accurate historical foundation which the three of you men will provide to the study of early Mormon origins.”

Meanwhile, the other Christensen was busy ensuring that the document stayed out of the public eye for as long as possible. Only days after the purchase in January, he sent it East for an extensive (and extended) examination by Kenneth Rendell, of Newton, Massachusetts, one of the world’s foremost document dealers. Rendell rarely agreed to authenticate a document he wasn’t selling, but he made an exception out of deference to his respected colleague, Mark Hofmann.

Where one Christensen had quickly invited Walker and Jessee to join the research team, the other delayed formalizing the offer until May, almost five months later, offering each man $6,000 and 25 percent of the profits from the sale of the book that would come out of their efforts. That gave them a stake in not leaking anything to the press in advance of publication.

If there was a weak link in the chain of silence, Christensen knew, it was Mark Hofmann.

As if sensing his client’s doubts, soon after the deal was signed, Hofmann came by with another offer. He had a document that he thought Christensen would be interested in. It was a typescript of a legal agreement between a group of men, including Joseph Smith and Josiah Stowell, dated November 1, 1825, on how to divide the profits—“Supposd to be a valueble mine of either Gold or Silver & also to cont[ain] Coind money & bars or ingot of Gold or Silver”—that resulted from Smith’s money-digging efforts “at a certain Place in Pennsylvania.”

It was enough to give doctrinaire Mormons heart failure. This was the agreement for the business deal that went sour and ended up in a New York courtroom in 1826. This was the much-dreaded confession. At best, this document proved yet again, and beyond a doubt, what the anti-Mormons had been saying all along, that Joseph Smith was, for a period at least, a money digger and penny-ante con man. At worst, it was evidence of imagination and ambition running out of control, suggesting all too vividly a young Joseph Smith, failing to dig up any real “Gold or Silver,” simply digging some gold plates out of the same rich soil of his imagination.

Hofmann was prepared not only to give Christensen all “legal rights of ownership” in the transcript, but also to offer him a right of first refusal on the actual document at a fixed price of $15,000 if Hofmann was able to pry it away from its current owners, “a couple of elderly sisters.” And all Hofmann wanted in return was the next $10,000 installment of the Salamander money, which, under the terms of the contract, wasn’t due until July 20. It was a gracious, generous act, Christensen thought, one that clearly showed Hofmann’s good intentions.

Just to be sure, however, Christensen checked with his lawyer, Alan Smith, at the Salt Lake City office of the prestigious New York firm LeBoeuf, Lamb, Leiby & MacRae. Just what were Hofmann’s—and now Christensen’s—legal rights of ownership in the documents? Could he sue Hofmann for revealing the contents of either document? Three weeks later, Smith wrote to say that the legal questions involved were “difficult” but that he was still working on them “methodically, albeit gradually.” All Smith had to do was check with Jerald and Sandra Tanner. For obvious reasons, they had researched the question thoroughly and discovered that there was no legal way to control the contents of the documents or their reproduction. At least one other person knew about the results of the Tanners’ research: Mark Hofmann.

Christensen was fighting a losing battle.

In early February, before she asked Gordon Hinckley about the Salamander Letter, Peggy Fletcher called Christensen. “Steve, I’m trying to reach Mark Hofmann,” she said. “I heard from someone that there’s this letter and that Mark Hofmann has sold it to someone.”

“Yeah, me,” Christensen confessed.

“Why don’t you tell me about it? We want to do a story on it.”

“I can’t release anything about it now, but I’ll give you first rights to the story. Maybe we can do the research and do a session at the symposium in August.” (In April and August each year Sunstone sponsored a conference in which Mormon and non-Mormon scholars of Mormon history and doctrine would give lectures on recent research.)

Fletcher knew better than to press. She had worked with Christensen during his stint on the Doctrinal-Resource Committee and knew his philosophy on sensitive documents well. “This is how I’m handling it,” he would say whenever something controversial came up. “It’s okay to keep ideas quiet in the short run, with the intention of revealing them at a time, and in a way that is most palatable to believers.”

Christensen had hoped at least to get through the summer before word leaked out. Here it was only weeks after the deal, and he was already making excuses. The Church had been right: this was a hot potato. He knew the research wouldn't be done by August, but he would cross that bridge when he came to it. This would at least keep things quiet until then.

Within days, Richard Ostling, the religion editor at Time magazine, called to say he had heard rumors of a sensitive letter and he planned to do an article on it. The so-called rumors were stunningly specific. He knew the letter in question was dated October 23, 1830, was written by Martin Harris to W. W. Phelps, and dealt with the revelation of the golden plates. Ostling had also heard about the Church's curious policy of buying controversial documents and squirreling them away. (Unknown to Christensen, Ostling's anonymous tipster had also helpfully directed him to Lyn Jacobs, who, when Ostling interviewed him the following week, claimed that his decision to withdraw from negotiations with the Church was based entirely on the failure to agree on an acceptable price.)

Christensen tried to contain the damage. "I don't want to publish the letter until I can also publish some explanations."

That might work with Peggy Fletcher, but Ostling wasn't buying it, so Christensen tried another tack. "Besides, I promised Peggy Fletcher that I would give it to her first, either for use in the Sunstone Review, or, preferably at the next conference." Trying to buy time, Christensen lied, "... which isn't until early April." The next conference was in April, but he hadn't promised anything to Fletcher until August—at the earliest. A little white lie for the Lord.

He closed with a plea: "Can't you sit the story out for a while?"

Ostling called Peggy Fletcher. He didn't want to scoop her but he couldn't sit on the story forever. Theirs was a competitive business. When was the earliest she could publish the letter? The March issue of the Review, which went to press on March 9. Fine. Ostling agreed to hold off on his account until March 12.

Ostling wrote Christensen back and explained the deal: "This will serve Sunstone's interests, give me a journalistic reward for sitting on an important story for a month, and give you time to complete a thorough historical article to accompany release of the text."

A month! Gordon Hinckley's Steve Christensen couldn't believe what he was hearing. Here he was conducting a full-scale rethinking of the founding years and early doctrine of the Mormon religion, and Time magazine expects it to be done in a month! That may be a long time by the yellow journalism standards of Time Inc., he thought, but it was a split second in the eyes of the Church that would ultimately judge the work.

Ostling was unmoved. "I think it would be unrealistic," he added ominously, "to suppose this will keep until the next Sunstone deadline, in early April. . . . I might be forced to go ahead with a story any time this appears in another publication before your official release date. I can tell you from much experience as a journalist that we would be very lucky if it remains bottled up that long."

They weren't lucky. In early March, Jerald and Sandra Tanner blew the story open in their monthly newsletter, the Salt Lake City Messenger. They called the Harris letter, of which they had seen excerpts, "one of the greatest evidences against the divine origin of the Book of Mormon."

Christensen was furious. He couldn't believe that the text of the document had already leaked—to the Tanners, no less. Clearly, he had fumbled the ball for the Church. On May 7, feeling cornered, he issued a terse public statement.

It is true that I am the owner of a letter written by Martin Harris to William W. Phelps, dated October 23, 1830. While it is hoped that the letter is authentic, professional tests have not yet been performed on the document. Before I will release transcripts or photographs of the document to the public, I wish to first determine the document's historicity as much as possible. I have therefore sought the help and advice of competent historians to assist me in determining the reliability of the contents of the letter.

Until the above-referenced research and tests have further progressed, I do not feel at liberty to share the full contents of the letter. It is unfortunate that publicity of the document has preceded its historical authentication. This has lead [sic] to some cases of misstatement as well as numerous phrases being taken out of context.

To demonstrate to Church leaders just how angry he really was, Christensen also threatened legal action against the Tanners for violating his copyright to the Harris letter, and offered to testify in the lawsuit of another researcher who was suing the Tanners for publishing without permission sensitive material the researcher had obtained from the Church. Perhaps in courtroom questioning, he could find out who had leaked the excerpts from the letter.

In the end, neither Christensen nor the Tanners ever testified on the matter. If they had, Christensen would have been shocked to discover that the Tanners' source was none other than Mark Hofmann. The March article had been based on the notes Michael Marquardt had made at his five-hour meeting with Hofmann the previous December, before Christensen bought the letter.

Christensen didn't have any better luck tracing the source of the leak to Ostling at Time—one of the publications that Hofmann had mentioned to Marquardt in December. At one point, Lyn Jacobs helpfully suggested that perhaps Leonard Arrington, whose son and daughter-in-law both worked for Time Inc., was the source, but Christensen could never establish the link.

With the cat now well out of the bag, Peggy Fletcher approached Christensen again.

"I was the first journalist to hear about this," she said. "You asked me not to print anything about it, and I didn't. How about letting me print a story about the letter, then say you are doing all this research."

"I can't," he said. "I'm under a lot of pressure."

"From whom?" Fletcher had heard the rumors that the Church was pressuring Steve to keep the whole thing quiet, and that now, with the Tanners' revelation, the heat was on.

He wouldn't say.

She tried again. "Why not at least get the basic information out to the audience?"

He was adamant. Too much was out already. The debacle with the Tanners was exactly what he knew would happen if the text preceded the explanation. As one Church leader had put it, "Meat before milk always produces indigestion." "No," he said. "I want to do it my way. When we release the information, I want to release it in a context that people can understand."

Meanwhile, Jerald Tanner had decided that it was a moot point. The Salamander Letter, he said, was probably a fake.

There were just too many parallels between Harris's account and E. D. Howe's Mormonism Unveiled, which was published four years later. He also thought it strange that Harris, a religious man, didn't mention God or angels or devils even once. "This just isn't the Martin Harris I know," said Jerald. Sandra disagreed, and in the June issue of the Messenger, they wrote a divided editorial, Jerald calling it a fake, Sandra calling it genuine.

Now it was Hofmann's turn to be furious.

He approached Sandra Tanner, who had been passing out copies of Jerald's list of parallels between the Harris letter and the Howe book, at the Sunstone symposium in August.

"I just don't understand how there can be any question about this," he complained, his high voice uncharacteristically filled with emotion. "It's so obvious that it's all been verified and proved. Christensen did all these tests and has all this confirmation."

"Well, we need some specifics on this, Mark," said Sandra, her schoolteacher manner seeming even more solid and businesslike next to Hofmann's schoolboy petulance. "Who did you get it from?"

"It would be so easy to find out," he insisted. "There are only three dealers in New York that I could have gotten this kind of thing from. It's easy to verify all this stuff."

He is a beautiful salesman, Sandra thought. He seemed so convinced. "Christensen has had this thing all tested," he repeated.

Sandra went back to what was for her the key: "But who did you get it from?"

Hofmann straightened up, as though regrouping. "I can't divulge where I got it," he said, suddenly very straight, very professional, very officious. "Steve Christensen has the letter, he bought it, and I don't have a right to tell. When I sell a document to anybody, I always give them the right to control what they want to do with the document and what they want to divulge. I turn over to them a statement saying just where I got it and the background of the document and everything. It's their document and their background, and it's up to them to do what they want with it. Christensen has all that information, and you'll have to get it from Christensen. That's just the way I do business."

He paused and looked at her. His lower lip crept forward. "I can't understand why you, of all people, would be the ones to question me," he said slowly. He looked, Sandra remembers, "crushed and practically in tears."

Around the same time, a number of Mormon scholars, some of them connected to the underground, received in the mail typed copies of Joseph Smith's 1825 letter to Josiah Stowell, the letter that Hofmann had sold directly to Gordon Hinckley in January 1983, the letter that would "never see the light of day." The letters were not signed and bore only a New York City postmark. With its references to money digging, clever spirits, and detailed instructions on how to use a hazel stick to locate buried treasure, the Stowell letter seemed to confirm all the wild rumors about the Salamander Letter. Surely this would satisfy the skeptics.

But it didn't. On August 22, 1984, the Tanners published The Money-Digging Letters, in which they once again questioned the authenticity of the Salamander Letter.

To Christensen's great relief, Richard Ostling's article never did appear in Time. His editors twice pulled the story due to "lack of documentation." But it was only a temporary victory.

On the heels of the Tanners' publication, the full story hit in the August 25 issue of the Los Angeles Times—another of the papers Hoffmann had mentioned to Marquardt:

A letter purportedly written in 1830 by Mormonism's first convert is now threatening to alter the idealized portrait of church founder Joseph Smith. . . .

The First Presidency's Gordon Hinckley said the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints had earlier indicated that no comment would be made until the letter's analysis was completed.

But insiders here say there are indications that the letter may be valid.

Even if it is not, a respected non-Mormon authority on Mormon origins said the white salamander letter is consistent with other evidence that Joseph Smith had his occult side.

The article in the September 22 Arizona Republic (a paper with a large, affluent Mormon readership) was even worse:

White salamanders, ancient spirits, peep stones and divining rods are the stuff of magic and 19th-century American frontier folklore.

According to two recently discovered letters dating from the beginnings of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, they were also the stuff of prophet Joseph Smith's early life and the origins of Mormonism. . . .

Christensen tried to respond to the deluge of speculation. "What happened was not that unnatural or uncommon given what was going on in Joseph Smith's day," the release concluded. "To anyone who has studied the Joseph Smith period there are not a lot of surprises in the letter." Official Church spokesmen toed the same line, trying, as they had with the Joseph Smith III blessing, to pass off the document as an historical curiosity. "It certainly sounds consistent with the times," said spokesman Jerry Cahill, "and possibly is an interesting sidelight to what is known."

When asked if Church leaders were upset by the most recent round of bad press for Smith and his Church, Christensen said, "I frankly don't think the Brethren have had the time or the interest to even worry much about the letter."

In fact, they could think about little else.

Hinckley had to be furious. The drubbing in the press had continued right through September and up to the time of the General Conference in October, a time when thousands of well-groomed Mormons from all over the world make the pilgrimage to the vast, egg-shaped Tabernacle, famous for its organ and choir; a time when the General Authorities make one of their rare public appearances, like the Politburo at Lenin's Tomb; a time to reassure the flock that all is well with the true Church.

But all wasn't well. And in between the usual benign, noncontroversial testimonials and rededications to the good life, Hinckley issued a stern warning concerning the dangers inherent in too much digging into the past. On Sunday morning, October 7, Hinckley noted in his conference speech that "for more than a century and a half, enemies, critics, and some would-be scholars have worn out their lives trying to disprove the validity of [Joseph Smith's] vision. Of course they cannot understand it. The things of God are understood by the spirit of God."

Hinckley's generalities were fleshed out by Elder Bruce R. McConkie, a senior Apostle, in his conference speech later that afternoon:

On every issue it behooves us to determine what the Lord would have us do and what counsel he has given through the appointed officers of his kingdom on earth.

No true Latter-day Saint will ever take a stand that is in opposition to what the Lord has revealed to those who direct the affairs of his earthly kingdom.

No Latter-day Saint who is true and faithful in all things will ever pursue a course, or espouse a cause, or publish an article or book that weakens or destroys the faith.

At least one person in the audience took McConkie's words to heart: Christensen's boss, Gary Sheets. Always generous with his money, Sheets had been bankrolling the research project on the Salamander Letter, not so much out of historical curiosity as out of fondness for Steve. But when he began to hear the water-cooler gossip about Brent Metcalfe “losing his testimony” as a result of his work on the project, he decided it was time to act. Souls were at stake. As a bishop, he had no choice but to fire Metcalfe and terminate the project. And it had to be done quickly, before still others were “deprived of their testimonies.” He told Christensen about McConkie’s talk and, according to Christensen’s later account, hinted about other, more direct pressures from elsewhere in the Church hierarchy. The project had to be shut down, and that included the book that Christensen planned. “It just isn’t politically wise,” Sheets stressed.

Christensen capitulated. Two days later, he terminated the project and called Metcalfe into his office. He blamed the debacle entirely on Sheets and offered generous severance terms of full pay for three months and $1,000 a month for six months after that. Christensen wanted no disgruntled leakers or, as Hinckley might have said, no loose ends.

Soon afterward, Peggy Fletcher asked Christensen why he had fired Metcalfe.

“The materials are too sensitive,” he said. “Gary was being leaned on as a bishop—he was told to back off, since the subject matter is so controversial.”

When the dust cleared, Christensen sat down to write a damage report. On October 16, he hand-delivered it to Hinckley’s office. Starred and underlined at the top of the three-page letter were the words Personal & Confidential.

First, he reassured Hinckley, the Church’s P.R. genius, of his discretion: “During this whole period I have been extremely unfriendly to the media.” Then he reported the cataclysmic events of the previous week. “Last Thursday I had the unpleasant experience of terminating the working relationship with Brent Metcalfe. The main reason is that Gary Sheets and myself became uncomfortable with many of Brent’s personal opinions relating to Church History and Doctrine. More important, we did not want to financially underwrite a book relating to the early origins of the Church and the coming forth of the Book of Mormon if the work had the potential of doing more harm than good. . . .”

Christensen gave Hinckley credit for bringing him to his senses. “I was extremely impressed with your Conference talk,” he wrote. “I believe that the Church has more pressing work to accomplish than to be consumed by questions and contradictions from the past. While it is better that we lead forth in historical inquiry rather than leaving the task to our enemies, those so engaged must have sufficient faith that the day will come when all is revealed and then the pieces will all fit together.”

Finally, Christensen asked Hinckley what he should do with the Salamander Letter.

“I am still not eager to thrust the document in the hands of the media. Personally, I would like to stay as low profile as is possible. . . . If the Church would like it, it is yours for the asking—just tell me when.”

The next day, October 17, at a United Way luncheon, Christensen was surprised to find himself seated next to Hinckley. Through most of the meal they apparently talked little. Then suddenly, with hardly a word of introduction, Hinckley turned to him and said in a low voice, “We would like to see the letter come to the Church.”

34 The market for Mormon documents was getting too hot. In 1984, with all the controversy surrounding the Salamander Letter, Hofmann decided it was time to step out and let things cool down for a while. Of course, he left open the possibility that something truly spectacular might lure him back.

In the meantime, he turned his skills and uncanny good fortune to the larger and even more lucrative Gentile documents market. He began trading the autographs of well-known historical and literary figures. He had particular success in uncovering obscure but valuable signatures like that of Button Gwinnett, a man who signed the Declaration of Independence but very little else, making his signature an expensive must for collectors assembling a complete set of signers. He discovered previously unknown, inscribed first editions of books like Jack London's Call of the Wild and Mark Twain's Tom Sawyer.

In was a fabulously rich market, with thousands of collectors, including such “deep pockets” as the Library of Congress and Malcolm Forbes. Now, instead of digging through attic trunks in Coalville, Utah, Hofmann jetted off to manuscript auctions at Sotheby's in New York. He bought tens of thousands of dollars' worth of rare books from prestigious dealers like Schiller-Wapner Galleries in New York and Mark Hime in Los Angeles.

He met the leading lights in the documents business, men like Charles Hamilton, the country's foremost handwriting expert and the author of Great Forgers and Famous Fakes, a book for which Hofmann expressed keen admiration. Hamilton was the man who had finally unmasked the famous Hitler diaries after experts all over the world declared them genuine. A venerable septuagenarian with a full head of white hair and a persona of Dickensian complexity who had filched his first autograph from a trash can at age nine, Hamilton looked forward to Hofmann's unannounced visits. The two would sit and talk for hours about history, literature, science, or music. Hofmann showed particular interest in Hamilton's recent book on Shakespeare's handwriting. (To Hamilton's surprise, Hofmann already knew there were only six known signatures of the Bard's.)

How encouraging, Hamilton thought, to find such an "unassuming, modest scholar, eager to add to the store of knowledge that the heritage of our country requires for its sustenance." In a business filled with hype and borderline claims, it was so refreshing to find someone who took a soft, low-key, and impeccably honest approach to his documents. When Hofmann brought something in, he always seemed uncertain about its value. "What do you think?" he would ask, or "Could it be genuine?"

One day, Hofmann handed him a letter signed "Joseph Smith."

Hamilton took one look and handed it back. "It is the wrong man," he said in his theatrical Irish tenor. "There were enough Joseph Smiths in upstate New York to create a regiment out of them. The name doesn't mean a damn thing. You've got the wrong man."

Later, Hofmann asked him to take another look.

Out of affection, Hamilton obliged. But his answer was the same. "Mark, this just isn't Joseph Smith's handwriting," he concluded. "It's too upright. The letters are too clear. It's not smudged enough. It does not have that precipitous movement toward the margin that Smith's handwriting had." Then Hamilton looked at the date. "Are you aware that Smith was nineteen at the time that this document was written?"

"Yes," said Hofmann tentatively, as if he expected more.

When Hamilton began to read the document—something he didn't always find necessary—he noticed the double consonants characteristic of Joseph Smith and a reference to a 'spirit.' "

"Jesus Christ, Mark, this could be a very early Smith and a different handwriting. The handwriting looks labored, as though the writer had taken hours and hours to write. Which would make sense, for someone who hadn't done much writing."

"Do you really think it could be?"

Hamilton eventually authenticated the letter.

* * *

Hofmann was always asking questions—"picking my brains," Hamilton called it. What should he be on the lookout for? "Mr. Hamilton, sir, you know I have such good luck at finding things," he would say. Hamilton told him one time, "I never knew a guy who had such good luck as you have, except one—a guy named Carl Williams, and Williams was, unbeknownst to me, stealing from the Philadelphia city hall."

Hofmann laughed hysterically at that.

With new contacts, new leads, new deals, new clients, Hofmann needed a new number two—someone to take the place of Jacobs, who was both too busy with his school and too wrapped up in his Mormon pamphlets to be of more than occasional use. The botched deal with Hinckley had clearly shown the limits of his usefulness.

Hofmann found his man in Shannon Flynn, a fat, friendly, seemingly harmless young man who laughed easily—too easily some thought. The two first met in 1982 when Lyn Jacobs introduced them. Jacobs had introduced Flynn to the joys of collecting Mormonabilia, and Flynn had asked for an audience with the "King of Mormon memorabilia," Mark Hofmann.

To Hofmann, Flynn was the perfect lieutenant: not too smart, not too curious, but very eager. To Flynn, Hofmann was a savior. He had been working as a salesman at a photography studio owned by relatives for longer than he cared to calculate. He would have followed anyone, anywhere, to get away from the calm and the boredom and the predictability of it all. Because underneath the considerable girth and the amiable grin lurked a different person altogether.

Flynn's apartment was filled with stacks of Soldier of Fortune, piles of camouflage clothing, an arsenal of guns and pistols, and enough smokeless powder to blow up a small town. Even walking around the pacific streets of Salt Lake City, Flynn carried his favorite weapon: a Philippine butterfly knife, a mean, double-bladed switchblade that posed more danger to the untrained owner than to an armed assailant. But Flynn had mastered the deadly flick of the wrist that turned him into a lethal fighting machine. He may have looked like the Pillsbury Doughboy, but underneath, Shannon Flynn was Rambo.

Like any good soldier of fortune, Flynn had to prove his loyalty.

In late September 1984, he called Wilford Cardon, a man of considerable wealth—oil, construction, convenience stores, etc.—and impeccable Mormon credentials. Cardon had been Flynn's mission president in Brazil in 1978, and the two had taken to each other like father and son.

In his eagerness, Flynn spilled the whole deal over the phone: his friend Mark Hofmann had found an extremely rare and valuable letter signed by Betsy Ross. According to Hofmann, he could sell it for at least twice the purchase price. All he needed was an investor. Cardon was noncommittal but pleased to hear from Flynn. He invited him and his new friend to come to Mesa, Arizona, and pitch the deal in person.

Flynn and Hofmann made plane reservations, and on October 6, left for Arizona. Flynn was off and running. This was just the life he had been dreaming of. Big deals, quick trips, jetting off on a moment's notice to exotic destinations to sign big-money, flick-of-the-pen deals with movers and shakers. He told friends he felt like James Bond.

At the meeting with Cardon, Hofmann described the 1807 letter signed by Betsy Ross.

"What makes this letter so valuable?" asked Cardon, who knew, he admitted, a lot about investments but nothing about documents.

"It's the only signed letter that's ever been found," said Hofmann.

"Where did you get it?"

Hofmann refused to give the source.

Flynn quickly piped up, "That's common in the documents business. A dealer never reveals his sources."

As an astute businessman, Cardon could understand that.

This was the deal: Hofmann could buy the letter for $18,000. Each of them—Hofmann, Flynn, and Cardon—would put up a third of the money. Each would receive a third of the profits from the sale.

"What about finding a buyer?" Cardon wanted to know.

"No problem," said Hofmann.

There was one more thing. Flynn wanted to ask a favor of his old mission president. Since he didn't have $6,000, and couldn't put his hands on it anytime soon, could Cardon loan him the money?

What's $12,000 between a father and a son? thought Cardon. He'd lost that much, and more, on any number of investments. If he could help Shannon get into a lucrative and fulfilling business, it was well worth the risk. If he made money from the investment, so much the better. On October 30, he sent Hofmann a check for $12,000.

On his next visit to New York, Hofmann dropped in on Charles Hamilton.

"What should I be looking for?" he asked, as he always did.

This time, Hamilton had a specific suggestion. "A signature of a mountain man who led the Mormons to Salt Lake City, Jim Bridger, is so damn rare that I never saw one in my life," he said. "However, Bridger was illiterate, so you're looking for an X mark."

"I'm going to really make an attempt," Hofmann said in his most determined, Andy Hardy voice.

Several months went by before Cardon heard anything more about his investment. He never did see the Betsy Ross letter, although Flynn sent him a photograph of it in December. Around the same time, Hofmann finally called, his voice quivering with excitement.

"Someone has offered to buy the Betsy Ross letter in exchange for sixteen promissory notes to a company called Livingston & Kincaid Co."

"Is that good news?" Cardon wondered.

Hofmann, apparently, thought it was great news. These weren't just any notes. "They're signed by Jim Bridger," he announced, then felt obliged to explain, "Of course, they're signed with an X, Bridger being illiterate. But that X is so rare that they're worth much more than the Betsy Ross letter."

On his next trip to New York, Hofmann returned to Charles Hamilton's gallery on 57th Street.

"Mr. Hamilton, I have located a very large collection of receipts, and all of it's worthless—except for three Jim Bridgers in it."

Hamilton's ears pricked up.

"I have to buy the whole collection to get them," Hofmann continued. "But I don't want them to know why I'm buying this collection of receipts. What do you think I could get for them?"

"Five thousand each," Hamilton answered without hesitation. Then he looked at his newest and brightest student: "For that information, I trust you're going to offer one of them to me."

"Of course," Hofmann offered cheerily.

Not long afterward, Hofmann sold one of the notes to Brent Ashworth for $5,000. "How many are there?" Ashworth asked.

"This is the only one," Hofmann said.

A week later, he arrived at their regular Wednesday meeting at the Crossroads Mall with some bad news: there were, in fact, four Bridger notes. Ashworth bit his tongue and agreed to pay a second $5,000 for a second note. Not long afterward, he bumped into Hofmann coming out of Cosmic Aeroplane, a bookstore in Salt Lake that occasionally dealt in rare books and documents. Then Ashworth went inside.

"What was Mark doing here?" he asked the proprietor, Steve Barnett.

"What's Mark always doing?" said Barnett, a pleasant if mousy man, well suited to his business. "Selling something."

Ashworth was almost afraid to ask. "What was it this time?"

"Jim Bridger notes."

Ashworth looked at the two notes Barnett had bought. They weren't like the ones he had bought, but they weren't like the ones he hadn't bought either. That meant there were six. At least. Infuriated, Ashworth stopped payment on a check for the last $1,250 installment for the notes.

When Hamilton heard about the sale to Ashworth, he called Hofmann. "Look, why don't you let me sell one of those notes? Why don't you let me sell one at auction? I could get $7,500 for it."

35 Mark Hofmann was the talk of the town. Rumors ricocheted around the market about the dizzying profits to be made in document deals—Hofmann's deals. Collectors scrambled over one another to get a piece of the action. So what if he was a little evasive about his sources, hard to get ahold of when he owed you money, a nut about secrecy? What were a few personal idiosyncrasies when you were looking at double your money in six months, or four months, or less.

Hofmann brought Al Rust the Salamander contract signed by Steve Christensen. It called for four $10,000 payments. "But, hey," Hofmann said, "I need $5,000 right now. I'll give you this contract, which is for $10,000, and you'll be paid within ninety days, $10,000 for $5,000."

Rust was understandably suspicious. "Why would you want to do that, Mark?" he asked. "You can go to a bank and borrow $5,000. In ninety days you're gonna have to pay back maybe $600 interest at the most."

"I need the money right now," Hofmann insisted.

Rust wasn't going to put up a fight. Something about gift horses. "Fine, give me the contract."

The deal was done, and ninety days later Hofmann came up with the money: 100 percent return in three months. But Hofmann had a better idea. "How about turning around and putting the profit back in?" he suggested. With returns like that, who could refuse? The deals were just too good to be true.

Deals like the one Hofmann offered his old Utah State schoolmate, Thomas Wilding.

Since working his way through college selling insurance, Wilding had developed a successful financial advisory service. As Hofmann's insurance agent, he saw just how lucrative the documents business was—Hofmann had increased his coverage to a quarter of a million. He saw the glowing newspaper accounts. He heard the dizzying rumors. It was high time, he decided, for his clients to get a piece of the action.

The deal involved eighteen rare books that were coming into the U.S. from Germany through Schiller-Wapner in New York, one of the country's most prestigious galleries dealing in rare books and documents. Hofmann said he could purchase them for only $22,500 and sell them immediately for at least $40,000. "I already have buyers for some of the books," he assured Wilding, mentioning Yale University, "but I need some funding in order to obtain the collection." The bottom line was terrific—as good as Wilding had heard: 50 percent to 100 percent return over a few months. In addition, there was Hofmann's unbeatable track record. Wilding had known him for years, knew his wife, knew his parents, even knew his wife's parents. And if that wasn't enough, there was the additional security of Hofmann's "reputation with the LDS Church." If ever there was a sure thing. . . .

Of course, Wilding still wanted 200 percent collateral.

On March 15, Hofmann gave him the collateral, in books, and he gave Hofmann checks totaling $22,500.

Only a month later, Hofmann called with good news: he had sold the books already and Wilding's group would get the full 100 percent return that Hofmann had predicted. Almost a hundred percent in one month! Hofmann said he could take his profit or, if he preferred, reinvest it, or a part of it, in another, equally lucrative deal. Wilding decided to play it safe and let Hofmann have only half the profits, $8,750, to play with. The rest, $31,250, he wanted in cash.

The same month, Hofmann offered another can't-miss deal to Ralph Bailey, a Salt Lake City orthodontist.

"I need $40,000," he said one day showing up unexpectedly in Bailey's office. "I have a hot deal in New York and need to get some money in a hurry. If you loan me the forty, in six months I'll pay you back fifty."

But that wasn't all.

Again Hofmann was willing to offer double collateral—$80,000 worth for a $40,000 loan. All in rare books.

"I want to see your bills of sale and invoices," Bailey insisted.

"No problem," chimed Hofmann.

The next day, he brought in the books. Bailey checked them off against the list: a Peter Rabbit, a first edition of Tom Sawyer inscribed by Twain to his close friend, Joe Twitchell, and, the star of the lot, a Call of the Wild by Jack London containing what book dealers called a "dream inscription": from the author to one of his closest friends in words that cut to the core of the author's vision, "To Buck and his human friend Austin Lewis, who often said his dog is the best friend he knows of. In appreciation, Jack London." Bailey cared more about the invoice than the inscription. When the inventory was finished, he wrote out a promissory note and carried the books to his vault. He couldn't wait to see what Hofmann would do with his $40,000.

The deals just kept getting bigger and better.

In May, Hofmann went back to Wilford Cardon in Arizona with the biggest and best deal yet. He had been offered a rare Charles Dickens manuscript, the original holograph of one of five Christmas stories written by Dickens and called "The Haunted Man." Surely Cardon had heard of Scrooge and the Ghost of Christmas Past and Tiny Tim. Well, this wasn't quite that famous, but it was the last such manuscript in private hands and, as such, quite a treasure—a $300,000 treasure to be precise. Its credentials couldn't have been better: formerly owned by the Carl H. Pforzheimer Foundation in New York and offered for sale by Justin Schiller of the Schiller-Wapner Galleries (for a 10 percent commission).

The deal was just like the one before: Cardon would put up one-third of the purchase price and reap one-third of the rewards. The only difference was, this time his share wasn't $6,000; it was $110,000. But the rewards would be commensurately spectacular, Hofmann assured him. There were already several collectors and institutions begging for a chance to bid on it.

After Hofmann's success with the Betsy Ross letter and the Jim Bridger notes, Cardon decided this, too, must be a winner. Mark had certainly proved he could pick them. It was reassuring to know that his former missionary, Shannon Flynn, had tied his star to someone as astute and ambitious as Mark Hofmann. On June 5, Cardon wired $110,000 to Schiller-Wapner in New York.

On May 9, 1985, Hofmann approached Thomas Wilding with the same deal. Same pitch: "Christmas Carol," Scrooge, Tiny Tim, last manuscript in private hands, eager collectors, Pforzheimer Foundation, Schiller-Wapner, $300,000 (plus $30,000 commission).

Like Cardon, Wilding wasn't a man to argue with success. But this was a lot of money, and he had some questions. He asked Hofmann if he could call the gallery in New York to verify some of the information.

"No problem."

With Mark listening in, Wilding called Schiller. He may not have been a documents dealer but he was a sharp businessman, and he knew what questions to ask. Why does the Pforzheimer Foundation want to sell it? Is the manuscript genuine? Is it in your possession? Is it really worth $300,000? What's its history? (Later, Wilding called around and asked about Schiller-Wapner. They checked out too.)

This was the deal: Wilding would put up $160,000. Mark would put up the remaining $170,000. They would share the profits proportionately.

"Are there any other investors involved?" Wilding asked at one point.

"None," Hofmann avowed.

Wilding insisted on collateral, of course, so Hofmann added to the store of books from the previous deal, providing the necessary invoices (most of them from Schiller-Wapner). In addition, Wilding insisted on a personal guarantee from Hofmann to cover the $160,000. The money came from several investors and was either wired directly into Hofmann's account or came in the form of cashier's checks.

Hofmann did caution Wilding that a big-ticket item like this wouldn't sell overnight. "This will take some time," he said. "It's a major manuscript, and it has to be marketed properly." For Wilding, memories of 100 percent return in one month would make the waiting a lot easier.

In New York, Schiller and Wapner waited for the money as long as they could. Cardon had wired $110,000. But all they had received from Hofmann was a check for $20,000. The money from Wilding must not have come through, they figured. In order not to lose the deal, they put up the remaining $170,000 themselves and purchased "The Haunted Man." Hofmann had promised to reimburse them.

"I need $50,000, right away." Hofmann seemed unusually anxious, Ralph Bailey thought, almost out of breath.

When he saw him come into his office that day in May 1985, Bailey was sure it meant good news, which to Bailey was a check. Great news was cash. It had been only a month since the $40,000 loan, but Bailey couldn't help thinking, maybe it hadn't taken as long as Mark thought for the deal to go through. At the mere prospect of 50 percent interest in one month, his heart leaped in anticipation. Now, Hofmann was before him again, begging for fifty thousand more.

"I need it right away," he said, "because there are these ten Joseph Smith letters I want to buy that are being sold by a family back in New York. If I am there on time, I can buy them, and I can at least double my money."

He was offering the same irresistible terms as before: 50 percent interest and double collateral. There were only two differences: this time it was Lyn Jacobs's book collection that went into the vault, and Bailey insisted on having a lawyer draw up the agreement.

When Jacobs came by not long afterward to retrieve one of the books, a first-edition Descartes, so he could sell it, Bailey demanded $10,000 to make up the difference. Hofmann gave him a check.

It bounced.

Ralph Bailey was not a man to play games with, especially when money was involved. He called Hofmann's bank, Rocky Mountain State, and was told the account contained sufficient funds to cover the check. Determined to get his money immediately, Bailey jumped in his car and drove directly to the bank on 33rd South. When he got there, however, the bank officer refused to make the check good. The funds, apparently, had been withdrawn in the interim. Fuming, Bailey tried both of Hofmann's numbers but got only an answering machine. For lack of a live target, he tore into the machine: "Mark, you either get this check good in the next little while or I am going to turn it over to the police."

Within five minutes, Hofmann was on the line. "I have made arrangements. They will take care of the check. Just take it back out there. I apologize.” It was typical Mark, Bailey thought. Completely cool. Never angry. Always submissive and always apologetic.

And, most important, the check was good. The deal was back on track. He couldn’t wait to see what Hofmann would do with his $90,000.

Was Mark Hofmann losing his touch?

By the spring of 1985, people were beginning to wonder openly. Always hard to reach, Hofmann was now virtually incommunicado. Despite having phones in both his car and his van, his numbers were perpetually out-of-service or disconnected. He seemed to change numbers as often as other businessmen changed shirts. His personal checks were considered worthless, and the fabled payoffs were taking longer and longer.

For some strange reason, he wasn’t finding Gentile documents as profitable as Mormon documents. Perhaps the margins were slimmer. Or the competition rougher. Or astounding discoveries harder to come by. Old friends and customers in Utah began to wonder if maybe his overhead had gotten out of control—all those trips to New York, all those books at premium prices from Manhattan dealers. Wade Lillywhite of Deseret Book had seen Hofmann at the April book fair in New York, looking “on top of the world,” buying books and documents as if he were Malcolm Forbes.

In the early days, he was strictly a K mart man. In New York, he would stay at the Empire Hotel on Broadway (sharing a room whenever possible). Now he was laying down $15,000 cash for Motor Trend’s “sports car of the year” and sending Shannon Flynn, at $1,000 dollars a day, to New York just to pick up some legal papers that could have been Federal Expressed.

It was a sad but familiar story: good Mormon boy hits the bright lights, big city and can’t handle it.

Some even began to suspect that all the glamour and high life might have shaken Mark’s testimony. They had heard about his breaking the “word of wisdom” and experimenting with alcohol, starting with martinis—shaken, not stirred, because that’s how James Bond liked them. They had seen him ordering drinks in restaurants on trips to New York and loading up on mini-bottles during the flight home. The Lillywhites had come late to one of Mark’s hot-tub parties—a game of Mormon trivia followed by a jump in the tub—and saw empty wine bottles in the trash can!

At the 1985 New Year’s Eve party given at the ward house, friends were surprised to see the reclusive Mark Hofmann sitting in a chair with five party horns in his mouth, bouncing up and down and blowing in time to the music.

The good Mormons who knew Mark shook their heads. They recognized the pattern: as the testimony goes, so goes the bottom line.

The only thing that would save him, both financially and spiritually, everyone agreed, was another big score, another brilliant bolt of Mormon luck. But what were the chances of that?

37 On March 15, 1985, Hofmann called Justin Schiller in New York City. But you just left here, said Schiller, the high-strung owner of the Schiller-Wapner Galleries. Yes, said Hofmann, but in the interim something possibly very important has happened. Schiller, a shrewd, experienced dealer, had learned a certain respect for the disingenuous choirboy from Utah, and he listened with interest to Hofmann's strange tale.

The day before he left, on March 13, he had been browsing in the second-floor broadside, or print, department of the Argosy Book Store on East 59th Street. As was his custom, he selected a few trifles from the chaos of old maps and etchings ripped out of old books: two old illustrations at $5 apiece, portrait etchings of George and Martha Washington ($12.50), and a broadside headed simply "Oath of a Freeman" ($25).

Fortunately, when he took them to the cash register, he thought to ask for an itemized receipt. Total, with tax: $51.42.

Later, on the plane back to Salt Lake City, he was flipping through the catalog for an upcoming auction of "Printed and Manuscript Americana" at Sotheby's and happened to notice, under the caption for Lot 32 (a copy of John Child's New England's Jonas Cast Up in London, dated 1647, estimated price $1,500 to $2,000), a small footnote:

The book also provides the earliest reprint of "The Freeman's Oath," the first issue of Stephen Daye's Cambridge Press, of which no copy of the original survives.

Hey, I've got something similar to that, Hofmann thought. Could it be?

By now Schiller was so giddy he could hardly keep the receiver pressed to his ear. "God, Mark," he yelled, "if you've got something like this, send it to me!"

To Schiller's astonishment, Hofmann was nonchalant. "Well, when I get around to it."

If what he was hearing was true, Schiller had every reason to be giddy. The "Freeman's Oath" mentioned in the Sotheby's footnote was, in fact, the Holy Grail of printed Americana. It was nothing less than the first document printed in America—the first document printed in English in the Western Hemisphere. Dated 1639, it was also considered the earliest record of popular notions of freedom and democracy that would ultimately find expression 150 years later in the Declaration of Independence and Constitution. Of course, there probably were earlier printed broadsides—the form was all the rage in the early colonies—but no records of them existed. This was the only one that experts knew, to a certainty, had been printed. It predated by a year the famous Bay Psalm Book, also printed by Stephen Daye's Cambridge Press, of which only ten copies were known to exist.

Hofmann had done it again. This was, without doubt, the American antiquarian's dream. When Wade Lillywhite found out about it, he was beside himself. He had been in the Argosy Book Store not one hour before Hofmann, sifting through the same bins. "How can it be? Why him, of all people? He's made lots of terrific discoveries. Why does he have to discover it? Why not me?" It seemed all the stranger because Hofmann was a manuscript person, not a print person. "How could he look at that and know what it was?" Lillywhite wondered. "I wouldn't have known what it was."

(A police investigator later commented on the extraordinary coincidence: "It was as if you had never heard of the Holy Grail. Then one Sunday you go to a garage sale and you find a little silver chalice or pewter cup and you say, 'Hey, far out!' So you pick it up. You also pick up an old Sotheby's catalog. Then on the way home, you're reading through the catalog and you find a notice to the effect that the Holy Grail was lost in whatever A.D. And basically it looks precisely like the item you just picked up. You say, 'Goddam! I just bought that this morning at the garage sale!' ")

Two weeks after reporting his discovery to Schiller, Hofmann flew back to New York with the document. It should have been a triumphant return, but he could barely keep his eyes open. He had been up all the previous night, working in his basement office, and left for the airport at four that morning. Dorie knew better than to ask why, on the eve of such an important trip, he felt the need to spend all night in the room downstairs that she was never allowed to enter.

From the airport, he went directly to the Argosy Book Store and sought out the woman who had been at the cash register two weeks before. He showed her a photocopy of the "Oath of a Freeman" and the receipt.

"Oh, yes. I recognize that," she said.

Hofmann looked a little surprised. "You know this is a very valuable item. The first item ever printed in America was the 'Oath of a Freeman,' and this might be the first one."

She looked at him with friendly, vacant eyes. "That's nice. You know, other people have found some pretty valuable things here too."

At the Schiller-Wapner Galleries, the reaction was very different. They had invited Michael Zinman, a self-described "big punter" in early Americana to the meeting and to inspect the document. Zinman, the CEO of Earthworm, a manufacturer of earthmoving and construction machinery, had bought the New England's Jonas at the Sotheby's auction, and afterward Schiller had called him. "I have the Holy Grail," he intoned, "the 'Oath of a Freeman.' The fruit of a ten-year-long search." Zinman could hardly believe his ears. He drove to New York that very evening.

Over dinner, the group talked about just how valuable the discovery would be if it turned out to be genuine. Hofmann suggested maybe it was worth $20,000 to $50,000. Zinman said that was crazy. A forgery would be worth more than that just as a curiosity. Zinman had toyed with the idea of buying a copy of the Bay Psalm Book and "couldn't touch it" for $1.2 million. "That 'Oath' may only be a single page, but it's unique," he said. "It could be worth $1 million. Who knows?"

After comparing it with the copy of the Bay Psalm Book at the New York Public Library, Schiller sent the "Oath" off to the most likely buyer, the Library of Congress, on April 8. The price tag: $1.5 million. Schiller explained to Hofmann that the response would take time. "They'll want to run some tests first."

Hofmann couldn't wait for tests. He needed money, and he needed it now. So he went back to what he knew best, Mormon documents.

Fortunately, he hadn't lost his touch.

"It's twenty times more valuable than anything purchased before," he told Al Rust, uncharacteristically breathless with excitement. "It's the most extensive and significant collection ever found."

Hofmann had good reason to be excited. He had found the fabled McLellin Collection.

The very name was enough to strike terror in the hearts of devout Mormons. William E. McLellin was an early Apostle and close associate of Joseph Smith's who left the Church in 1836 to become one of its bitterest critics. It had long been rumored that McLellin, who kept the minutes at early meetings of the Twelve, had taken with him a pirate's chest full of papers, letters, and journals, all of it incriminating, with which to destroy the Church. Over the years, tantalizing clues had turned up. But neither the Collection itself, nor any part of it, had ever surfaced. Until now.

"It includes at least fifteen or twenty letters that are very valuable and very collectible items," Hofmann continued. "There will be great demand for the material. It's much more important than the Lucy Mack Smith letter or the Joseph Smith III blessing." Rust had put up $10,000 toward each of those. But an entire collection of documents was much more valuable than a single letter from the Prophet's mother or even the Prophet himself. "To give you an idea, it's probably ten times as important as the Lucy Mack Smith letter." With numbers like that, Hofmann must have thought, who wouldn't be dazzled?

But Rust had only one question.

"Is it anti-Mormon?" He had heard of William McLellin, infamous apostate, reviler of Joseph Smith. "If it's anti, then I'm not interested."

"Oh, no," Hofmann reassured him, "not a bit. This is gonna have a lot of early writings of Joseph Smith and a lot of the early history of the Church. It's a significant collection, a big collection. There's also a facsimile from the Book of Abraham. Two or three boxes of material. What I want to do is bring it back to Salt Lake, then we'll sort it out, and then we can dispose of it piece by piece."

Rust had another question.

"How much money are we talking about?"

"The whole Collection should cost about $180,000."

Rust didn't believe he had heard right. The most he had ever put into one of Mark's deals was $40,000. "Boy, that is a lot of money." Then he remembered Hofmann's reputation. If he could turn little money into big money, what could he do with big money? He began to calculate how long it would take him to get a second mortgage on his house. "How do you think it would work out?"

"I believe the Collection is worth $300,000 to $500,000." The split would be fifty-fifty.

"How long would it take before we'd recover our money?" Rust was hooked.

"We can get our money out in thirty days," Hofmann said. He was all business now, like a Thoroughbred on the backstretch. "Or we can dispose of it slow and get a considerably bigger profit. A lot of people will be interested in the material." He paused for effect. "Especially people in the Church."

"Where is the Collection now?"

"In New York."

"I would want my son, Gaylen, to go with you when you pick it up." The deal was already complete. Rust was talking details now.

Hofmann looked at Gaylen Rust, a sandy-haired, round-faced, energetic young man, too extroverted for the claustrophobic profession of coin dealing—his real passion was horse racing—who had been following the discussion.

"Okay," said Hofmann.

"I want you to take a cashier's check and go together, take briefcases, and put the most valuable things in briefcases and then hand-carry them back and ship the excess back to my store. We'll inventory all of it here, and then we'll dispose of it. Instead of you just having it all to your own person."

"No problem."

For the first time in all their dealings, Rust also wanted some kind of security. It wasn't that he didn't trust Mark. It was just such a large amount of money. Besides, Hofmann already owed him $100,000 on several earlier transactions, including the Joseph Smith III blessing and the Lucy Mack Smith letter. "To go in on this big a deal, given what you owe me, I want some collateral, too, for coverage."

"No problem," said Hofmann. "I've got all kinds of collateral. I can put two or three hundred thousand in there for collateral."

"I'd feel comfortable if you'd put in a hundred and fifty anyway, since that's about what you owe me." Unlike Wilding and Bailey, Rust wouldn't demand double collateral. All he wanted was protection for the new investment.

Hofmann was a picture of cooperativeness. "Let's do it now."

Together, the two men walked across the street to Zion's First National Bank and rented a joint safe-deposit box. Later, Hofmann brought in some documents to serve as collateral. It was an impressive list: an Abraham Lincoln document, a letter signed by Daniel Boone, another one by Henry Wadsworth Longfellow.

But it didn't add up to $150,000.

Rust tried to be diplomatic. "If you want to bring in any other collateral," he said kindly, "I'd appreciate it. Because there is such a large amount outstanding, I feel a little uncomfortable."

"No problem," said Hofmann.

Soon afterward, he bounded into the coin shop with a stack of books. "Hey, let's go over now and put them in our safe-deposit box." He made it sound like fun. Rust offered to put them under both names so that if a buyer wanted one, Mark could get at it without Rust's signature. "Just let me know where it went and how much you got for it. Then bring me the money." He took Hofmann's word on the value of each item. "I wouldn't know if a book was worth a dollar or a thousand," he muttered to himself as Hofmann held up a book and said, "Twenty-five thousand." When they were done stashing the hoard, Hofmann turned to him and said with a satisfied smile, "There's about $125,000 worth of books in there." Rust accepted the number on faith. When Hofmann tried to hand him an itemized list, he waved it away. "Just leave it in the box. I can tell if you get in by the signature on the card."

"I won't be getting in there," Mark reassured him.

Hofmann came back to the shop on Wednesday, April 23. He seemed unusually agitated.

"Where's your dad?" he asked Gaylen Rust, who was manning the counter in front of the glass cases, which displayed coins from all over the world.

"It's his day off," said Gaylen. Strange, he thought. Mark knew that his father was never in the office on Wednesdays.

Hofmann was pacing a hole in the floor. "We need to go to New York immediately," he said. "We've got to get the McLellin Collection now!" Gaylen had heard that Hofmann would take off on a cross-country trip at a moment's notice.

"Okay."

"Have you got the check?" Hofmann asked impatiently. There was no question what he meant: the $185,000 check that Rust was putting up for the Collection. Since their last conversation, the second mortgage had come through.

"I'll have to go get it," Gaylen said, calling first the bank, which agreed to have the check ready in thirty minutes, and then his wife, who agreed to pack his bags for him.

When Gaylen returned from the bank with the check, he gave it to Hofmann while he drove home to pick up his bag. "Hang on to this," he said as he ran out the door, forgetting in his haste his father's instructions: "Keep your hands on this check until the last possible moment."

On the plane, Hofmann mentioned to Gaylen a "major document" that he was selling to the government. He wouldn't give details. He just wanted Gaylen to know that he had some other business to transact in New York. Also, Dorie would be joining them the next day.

That night, Hofmann met with Lyn Jacobs, who had come down from Boston.

The next morning, Gaylen listened as Hofmann placed a call from the hotel room they were sharing at the Sheraton Centre on Seventh Avenue. It was about their appointment to pick up the McLellin Collection. As soon as he hung up, he began rushing around the room. "I've got to go right over and meet these people. They told me they don't want anyone else with me while I finalize the details of the transaction. So just stay here and sit tight. I'll call you when we finish, and you can come meet us at the bank when they hand over the boxes."

Gaylen sat in the room all morning, nervously watching television, reading his racehorse magazines, and waiting for the phone to ring. Several times, he called the front desk. "Are you sure no one has tried to get through to me?" No one had.

Finally, Hofmann called. "The deal's been postponed till tomorrow. These people had another commitment. They had to leave before everything got settled, so we'll consummate it tomorrow morning."

That afternoon, they took care of separate business. Gaylen met with the comedian Dom DeLuise to sell him some coins he had requested.

The next morning, Gaylen, who had taken a separate room in anticipation of Dorie's arrival, went to Hofmann's room to plan the day's strategy. On the door was a note in Hofmann's scrawled handwriting: the sellers had called early. They needed to meet him right away. No time to wake Gaylen. Mark would call as soon as he could.

Gaylen spent another tense morning waiting for the phone to ring. It never did. Hours later, Hofmann knocked at the door.

"It's already done," he said.

"Everything?"

"Everything." He wanted to go to the book fair this afternoon, so he wrapped up everything at one time. "Anyway, the whole thing went very smoothly."

"Where is the Collection?" Now it was Gaylen's turn to be agitated as he pondered what his father would think of this comedy of errors.

"I went directly to the post office and sent all three boxes by registered mail." Hofmann showed him three receipts from the post office. They were made out to Hofmann's home in Salt Lake City, not to Al Rust's coin shop.

"Why didn't you send it to Dad?" Agitation was turning to anger.

"At the time, I just felt it was better to send the stuff to myself." Gaylen didn't look convinced. "Don't worry. Each package is insured for $75,000, so we're covered. If anything happens, we'll get our money back."

Other questions raced through Gaylen's mind. How could Hofmann have made the deal, checked the materials, boxed them up, taken them to the post office, and shipped them in the six hours he had been gone? Where were the important documents they were supposed to hand-carry back? It was too late to ask, he decided. "I guess that's all right," he finally said, although he knew it wasn't.

He began to feel a little better about Hofmann later that day at the book fair. It seemed as if everybody knew him and respected him. People brought him documents and rare books to look at, not junk, of which there was an abundance, but the rare, unusual pieces. Gaylen asked him why. "There's always going to be a buyer for the important collection or the major find," Hofmann said. "It's the unimportant stuff that's hard to unload." He was in his element, Gaylen thought, sharp, impressive, on his game. He must have known what he was doing that morning.

Al Rust didn't think so. When Gaylen called him after the fair and told him the story, he could barely restrain his uncharacteristic rage. "I don't like it at all. There was no legitimate reason to vary from our accepted plan.” He tried not to blame his son. He himself had had trouble handling Mark Hofmann.

When they returned to Salt Lake City the following Saturday, Hofmann told Gaylen, “I’ll be into your dad’s store on Monday morning with the boxes.”

Monday came, but Hofmann didn’t.

They managed to reach him by phone. “The boxes haven’t arrived yet,” he told them.

Tuesday and Wednesday came and went.

Thursday. Rust couldn’t stand it any longer. When he couldn’t raise Hofmann on the phone, he drove to his house in Millcreek. Dorie spoke to him through the screen door. “Mark’s not here. I don’t know where he’s gone.” Rust couldn’t help himself. He yelled at her. When she started to cry, he castigated himself and apologized.

That evening, Mark called. “I sold the McLellin Collection,” he announced triumphantly.

Rust’s fury disappeared. A gain of more than 50 percent in one week! Who bought it? he wanted to know.

Hofmann’s voice dropped to a whisper. “The Church.”

Hofmann went straight to Gordon Hinckley’s office with his latest and most ambitious proposition: If the Church paid him $185,000, he would give them the McLellin Collection. In the gravest tones, he described the materials it contained—a treasure trove of early Church history, all of it, in Hofmann’s tactful phrase, “impactful.” Diaries, journals, Joseph Smith letters—a Pandora’s box of new and unknown firsthand materials that would make the Salamander Letter sound like a Sunday-school testimonial.

Hofmann had every reason to believe Hinckley would bite. It had not been a good year for the Church’s public relations wizard. The bad news started in February, when the first reports on the authenticity of the Salamander Letter began to come in. Kenneth Rendell, the Massachusetts documents dealer, wrote that the ink had passed the ultraviolet tests with flying colors, that the machine-ruled paper was the same as that being manufactured at a paper mill near Palmyra in 1835, and that the tear in the seal, the fold in the paper, and the postmark all passed muster.

Rendell was more circumspect about the handwriting, but only because there were no samples of Martin Harris's handwriting to use for comparison. The signature looked genuine. There were no signs of tracing. "It is my conclusion," wrote Rendell, "based upon all of this evidence, as well as the ink and paper tests undertaken independently of me, that there is no indication that this letter is a forgery."

Independent analysis of the ink and paper by two more experts confirmed Rendell's assessment. The ink was of the iron gallotannic type commonly used at the time. Their conclusion: "There is no evidence to suggest that the examined document was prepared at other than during the stated time period."

Steve Christensen wrote Hinckley with the "bad" news on February 26. He also gently tested to see if Hinckley would be willing to release him from the promise to give the document to the Church. The financial debacle at CFS had taken its toll on his personal finances. After his argument with Gary Sheets, he had left the company to set up his own consulting firm with his friend Randy Rigby. It would be months before any income started coming in, and even when it did, he would still owe literally millions to CFS creditors, since he was one of the officers who had personally guaranteed CFS projects. The sale of the document, Christensen wrote Hinckley, "would be most welcome in assisting me with the reduction of some extremely heavy short-term debt." But if Hinckley still wanted the document, Christensen was willing to donate it and "trust in the Lord to assist me in my financial affairs."

Hinckley still wanted it.

Three days after Christensen's plea arrived, Hinckley called and told him that, whatever his personal problems, "that letter belongs to the Church."

Christensen dutifully donated the document, and on April 18, the Church officially acknowledged the gift in a letter signed by Hinckley, Marion Romney, and the Prophet himself, Spencer Kimball. According to the letter, the document had "been placed in the archives of the First Presidency."

On April 28, more than a year after the first leaks, the Church officially released the Salamander Letter to the public. The ten-day delay was needed to word a statement as carefully (some would say deceptively) as possible:

A letter purportedly written by Martin Harris to W. W. Phelps was recently presented to the Church by Steven F. Christensen, its owner. The document is dated Palmyra, October 23, 1830, and has been the subject of much discussion and research. . . .

The original has been placed in the archives of the First Presidency as another appreciated addition to documents and artifacts dating back to the early history of the Church.

President Gordon B. Hinckley, Second Counselor in the First Presidency, who accepted the letter, stated: "No one, of course, can be certain that Martin Harris wrote the document. However, at this point we accept the judgment of the examiner that there is no indication that it is a forgery. This does not preclude the possibility that it may have been forged at a time when the Church had many enemies. It is, however, an interesting document of the times. Actually the letter has nothing to do with the authenticity of the Church. The real test of the faith which both Martin Harris and W. W. Phelps had in Joseph Smith and his work is found in their lives, in the sacrifices they made for their membership in the Church, and in the testimonies which they bore to the end of their lives. . . ."

(Actually, Harris bore a testimony at the end of his life, not to the end of his life, having left the Church for much of his adulthood and earned Joseph Smith's condemnation as a "wicked man." But these were mere quibbles.)

If Hinckley thought that was the end of it, he was catastrophically mistaken. He had succeeded in killing the book that Christensen and his team were planning, but neither the newspapers nor liberal Mormon intellectuals would let the matter rest. Far worse was yet to come.

On April 29, Dawn Tracy, who had moved to the Salt Lake Tribune, reported that a "letter reportedly written by Mormon Church founder Joseph Smith describing money-digging pursuits and treasure guarded by a clever spirit seems to have disappeared from view. . . ." It was clearly a reference to the Josiah Stowell letter, written by Joseph Smith in 1825, that Mark Hofmann had sold to Hinckley back in January 1983. Hinckley couldn't have been surprised by speculation about the document's existence. A purported transcript of the letter had been circulating in the underground for at least a year. But he must have been surprised, alarmed in fact, by something else in Tracy's article: "Research historian Brent Metcalfe said he knows from 'very reliable, first-hand sources' the letter exists, and the Mormon Church has possession of it."

With its references to treasures guarded by clever spirits and hazel sticks, Joseph Smith's letter to Josiah Stowell confirmed all the worst money-digging and folk magic implications of the Martin Harris Salamander Letter—in short, everything the Church had been trying to play down. At first, Church spokesman Jerry Cahill vehemently denied the accusation: “The Church doesn’t have the letter,” he told Tracy. “It’s not in the Church archives or the First Presidency’s vault.” When someone suggested that Cahill was playing semantic games—“If the exact question isn’t asked, someone can wink and say the Church doesn’t have it”—Cahill reiterated, “No, the Church does not have possession of the letter.”

But Hinckley was trapped. With the rumors flying, photocopies circulating, and the Los Angeles Times set to publish an extensive article (with a copy of the letter), he had no choice but to go public. On May 9, 1985, the Church released a statement by the First Presidency: “We have acquired a letter presumably written by Joseph Smith. . . .” The next day, the Deseret News announced the discovery of “the earliest known surviving document written by Joseph Smith Jr. . . . The letter, believed by church leaders to be authentic, was written June 18, 1825, five years before the church was organized.”

Jerry Cahill took the fall. In a letter to the editor of the Tribune, he acknowledged that his earlier denials had been “in error.” The real hero of the story? Gordon B. Hinckley. It was Hinckley, according to Cahill’s mea culpa, who insisted on getting the correct story before the public. “When my published statement came to his attention, President Gordon B. Hinckley of the First Presidency of the church informed me of my error.” Both the Church news release and Cahill’s letter carefully avoided mentioning that the Stowell document had been sitting in the First Presidency vault for two years.

Throughout the P.R. ordeal, Hinckley had to wonder who had gotten him into this fine mess. Who was Brent Metcalfe’s “very reliable, first-hand source” who had brought the hounds of the press to his door yet again? Who else knew that the Church possessed the Stowell letter besides himself, his secretary, Francis Gibbons, G. Homer Durham—and Mark Hofmann?

Coincidentally, the day the letter was announced in the papers was the day Hofmann came to see him.

Whether he was fuming over the leak or fed up with documents dealing altogether, Hinckley didn’t say. He apparently wasn’t about to give Hofmann the pleasure of betraying such temporal emotions. What he did say was, in effect, “go fish.” He wanted nothing to do with the documents or with Mark Hofmann. Once burned . . .

Hofmann was stunned. Nothing he said about the sensitivity of the documents seemed to make any difference. It would take something more than one little embarrassment in the press to shake Hinckley's confidence in the true Church.

40 After the meeting with Hinckley, Hofmann met Brent Metcalfe for lunch at the Crown Burger near his house. Metcalfe had only recently started work as a "researcher" for Hofmann, locating descendants of prominent historical figures to see if they could provide any grist for his boss's documents mill. Both men knew it was more a favor than a real job. (Hofmann didn't seem to need any help finding documents.) After his severance pay from CFS ran out, and a six-month stint as a researcher ended, Metcalfe was badly in need of other employment. Hofmann agreed to pay him $2,000 a month and 20 percent of the profit from any documents that turned up as a result of Metcalfe's research.

While they waited for their burgers, Metcalfe wanted to know, "What's the juiciest thing you've ever seen in The Vault?" (Hofmann had often bragged to him before about seeing unknown documents there.) Metcalfe, he knew, was obsessed with the Church's secrets, and, for that matter, any tidbit of information that he could pass along to the Mormon underground.

Hofmann smiled. He seemed almost amused. Metcalfe wasn't the first person to notice that the more outrageous Mark's discoveries, the more furor they stirred up, the more amused he seemed to get. He explained it as professional detachment. He was only interested in history, and he couldn't understand why the truth should rattle so many cages.

Hofmann described a meeting with Hinckley at which he asked if there were any other accounts resembling the Salamander Letter in the Church's archives. Hinckley reportedly sent his secretary to fetch a document from the First Presidency archives and showed it to Hofmann. It was the Oliver Cowdery history.

Metcalfe nearly jumped out of his chair. He remembered the footnote in a book by Joseph Fielding Smith about an early history of the Church written by Cowdery, the Church's first historian. Smith had even indicated that the history was in the possession of the Church, but, until now, it had been just another of the many myths locked away in The Vault. A year ago, Hofmann had said he thought it existed, but now he was saying he had actually seen it.

Hofmann was into the story now, savoring the surreptitiousness of it as well as Metcalfe's breathless attention. If the Oliver Cowdery history should ever leak, he said, it would really shake some testimonies. According to Cowdery's account, it wasn't Joseph Smith who first discovered the gold plates, it was his brother, Alvin. It was only after Alvin died (from eating too many green turnips) that Joseph retrieved the plates and began translating them. In other words, there was no First Vision!

Metcalfe couldn't believe his ears. He himself had dug up some persuasive evidence that Alvin played a more significant role in the founding of the Church than most people thought, but this was confirmation. He couldn't have found better proof, he thought, if he had made it up himself.

Metcalfe wanted more. He always wanted more.

The Cowdery history also mentioned a salamander that appeared three times, once to Alvin, twice to Joseph, according to Hofmann, confirming the story told in the Martin Harris letter.

Hofmann later said that he swore Metcalfe to secrecy. Metcalfe remembered only that Mark had told him, "You can tell other people about this, just as long as you don't tell anyone where the information came from." Given Metcalfe's irrepressible enthusiasm for secrets, it amounted to the same thing.

As Hofmann must have foreseen, Metcalfe went straight to Dawn Tracy at the Salt Lake Tribune. A few days later, May 15, Gordon Hinckley had another little embarrassment to explain at the next meeting of the Twelve:

RESEARCHER SAYS LDS HISTORY DISPUTES GOLDEN PLATES STORY

A little-known history written by an important early Mormon leader contains an account of Joseph Smith's brother Alvin finding the gold plates, rather than the Mormon prophet himself, according to a research historian. . . .

Brent Metcalfe, who worked on authenticating an earlier Mormon letter, said officials of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints have the history, written by Oliver Cowdery, who at one time was second in importance only to Joseph Smith. . . .

Mr. Metcalfe said his source is a private eyewitness account of the Cowdery history. The document tells of Joseph Smith's brother Alvin first finding the gold plates by means of a stone, according to Mr. Metcalfe.

Mr. Metcalfe quoted the document as saying: "A taunting Salamander appears to Alvin and prevents him and his companions from digging up the gold plates."

Early Mormon letters, recently released by LDS Church officials, link Joseph Smith to folk magic and to an "old spirit" that commanded Mr. Smith to return with his brother Alvin, who was dead at the time.

This time, when asked about the report, Jerry Cahill hedged his answer. "The LDS Historical Department does not have the Cowdery history," he said, but he refused to inquire if the document was in the "special presidency's vault." In what sounded suspiciously like a nondenial denial, he told the Tribune, "I have no idea if the history is there, nor do I intend to ask. I can't have my life ordered about by rumors. Where does it end?"

It certainly didn't end there.

On May 17, in an interview with KUER radio, Metcalfe repeated the stunning revelations contained in the Cowdery version, that "it was, in fact, Alvin who first discovered the gold plates and not Joseph Smith. And that at the time of the death of Alvin in November of 1823, Joseph Smith then takes over as the seer who then proceeds to try to break the enchantment to get the plates. . . ."

Have you seen this document? the interviewer asked.

"I have not, no. No, I have not seen the Cowdery history, but I did come across a source in which a person was recording his reading of the document."

"And this is a current source?"

"Yes, [a] current source."

"Would you like to name that source?"

"No . . . all I can say is that it's an extremely reliable source and I know, personally I know of no other sources that are more reliable than this one."

Just as this newest crisis was filling the local papers, the last one over the Stowell letter broke in the national media. Both the Los Angeles Times and Time magazine chastised the Church for trying to suppress its own history. Said Time archly: "The church offered no explanation for withholding news of the earliest extant document written by Smith." The anti-Mormons were having a field day. In the Messenger, the Tanners accused the Church of a "cover-up situation . . . reminiscent of the Watergate scandal." The inevitable term, "Salamandergate," made the rounds.

It was fast becoming yet another public relations debacle.

And just when Hinckley may have thought the worst was over—that there were no more bombshells out there waiting to go off—a letter, dated May 22, arrived from Steve Christensen.

In light of the recent disclosures, Christensen thought he'd better let Hinckley in on yet another skeleton in the Church's closet: an "Articles of Agreement" dated November 1, 1825, and signed by Joseph Smith and Josiah Stowell. Confirming the Glass Looker trial record, this document virtually proved the allegation that Joseph Smith was engaged in money digging for fun and profit at the time of the discovery of the gold plates. Christensen was clear about his reason for writing. "Those enemies of the Church who would do us harm by leaning upon the crutch of magic and occultism being involved in the early beginnings of the Church do not give due credit to the way in which this activity was perceived in Joseph Smith's day."

Just in case Hinckley missed the point, Christensen added, "Please rest assured that it is not my intention to make public the existence of this legal document."

That assurance might have offered Hinckley more comfort if Christensen hadn't also mentioned who gave him a copy of the agreement in the first place: Mark Hofmann.

The next time Hofmann appeared in his office, Hinckley was ready to listen.

Hofmann painted a bleak picture. Unless he found $185,000 immediately, the McLellin Collection would fall into the hands of "the enemy." The result would be a public relations disaster of epic proportions, press so bad that the Salamander Letter would look like a release from the First Presidency, so bad that the last few months would look like the good old days. He repeated that he hadn't wanted things to happen this way, that he had planned all along for the Church to obtain the Collection.

But now the clock was ticking off precious seconds. The Collection was in the hands of a nonmember, and worse yet, an anti-Mormon. He wouldn't sell to the Church, but he would sell to Hofmann. The deal could be “wrapped up” for $195,000 (of which he had already put up a $10,000 down payment). All he needed was the balance of $185,000. He had found an investor in Salt Lake City to put up some of the money, but now that investor was getting cold feet and wanted to pull his money out. If Hofmann couldn’t find the money, the deal would slip through his hands—and into those of the enemy.

They were out there too. Hofmann named them: Wesley Walters and George Smith, both “notorious anti-Mormons,” according to Hofmann. They both knew of the Collection, he warned, and were hot on its trail. If he didn’t consummate the deal, one of them would.

It was the eleventh hour.

When Hinckley started to play “the game,” Hofmann knew he had him hooked. They had played the game before. Hofmann wouldn’t tell him any details about the contents of documents; he would wait for Hinckley to ask. That way Hinckley didn’t have to know more than he wanted to know. Hofmann told friends it was a technique they had developed, without ever discussing it, for protecting Hinckley, in case he was ever questioned.

“Did you know that the McLellin Collection contained such-and-such, President Hinckley?”

“No, I did not.”

“Did Hofmann discuss such-and-such with you?”

“No, he did not.”

Deniability. It was a lawyerly trick, but these were lawyerly times.

Hofmann suggested that the Church come up with the money.

No, said Hinckley. It was better that the Collection not come to the Church. Too dangerous for the Church to take actual possession.

Deniability.

Now that the anti-Mormons were on to it, there was no point in trying to keep its existence a secret. The only thing to do now was to ensure that it didn’t fall into the wrong hands.

According to Hofmann’s account, Hinckley then suggested the Steve Christensen solution: find a wealthy devout Mormon to buy the Collection, sit on it, and then, when the commotion died down, donate it.

Christensen was out because of his financial problems, but Hofmann had another suggestion: Wilford Cardon in Arizona.

Hinckley agreed. “Go take care of your investor, and then we’ll talk.” If there’s a problem, he added as Hofmann left, if things really get desperate and you need money, let me know.

Hofmann thanked him.

41 Meanwhile, Al Rust waited for his money.

Not that he was really worried. "The Collection is in the hands of the Church," he told himself over and over, "and nothing can happen to it there."

When he pressed Hofmann for an update, it was always the same story: "Don't worry. Everything's fine." And then the inevitable warning: "Just remember, we've got to keep it quiet. The Church doesn't want this out. Only a few people in the hierarchy know, and they don't want outsiders coming in and asking to see the materials." Rust could understand that. Like everybody else, he had been following with dismay the damaging revelations in the papers. As a good Mormon, the last thing he wanted to do was cause the Church another embarrassment.

Three weeks later, Hofmann called with bad news. "We have a big problem," he began ominously. "The Church doesn't want to buy the Collection."

Rust felt the old anger returning.

"The Church doesn't want to get personally involved with this Collection. They said that if they bought the Collection, it would get out to the public and they'll have the entire public coming to them and asking to see the contents."

Could anything be done to salvage the deal?

"We've had to change plans." Rust knew who "we" referred to. He had heard Hofmann talk often about his close working relationship with Gordon Hinckley. "We've had to find a private collector to buy the Collection and donate it to the Church. That way the Church doesn't have to say it bought the Collection. They don't want to put any money out so that they won't have anybody questioning them about it. We found a private collector in Texas who is willing to buy the Collection and then donate it to the Church."

Mark ended with his usual urgent injunction: "You've got to remember that all this needs to remain confidential. Do not tell a soul. Do not call anybody. Do not do anything."

But the patience of even a patient man has its limits. Finally, Rust decided to write President Hinckley directly. There couldn't be any harm in contacting someone who already knew.

Before proceeding, however, he wanted to give Hofmann one last chance. "I need to see you in my store tomorrow," he told Mark on the phone. "We've got to settle some things."

Hofmann said he'd be there.

He wasn't.

Rust drove to Mark's house to give him another last chance. Dorie answered the door, looking unusually weary and disheveled.

"Mark's in New York," she said.

Rust was dumbstruck. "I can't believe that. We had an appointment to meet."

Dorie looked at him with her utterly vacant eyes. It was a willful stupidity, Rust concluded, too convenient to be real. "Oh, he had to go to New York."

Rust couldn't help himself. He began to yell. "If he calls, you tell him I've had it. I can't hold back any longer. I am going to the LDS Church tomorrow morning."

The next morning, he called Hinckley's office.

Mark Hofmann bragged that he could reach President Hinckley anytime. He even bragged that he could reach Hinckley immediately when he was out of the state. But could Al Rust? Even after years as a tour guide on Temple Square and a lifetime of loyalty and tithing?

Hinckley's secretary put him on hold, then, a minute later, came back on to say, "President Hinckley has indicated that you should write it all down on a piece of paper and hand-deliver it to his office."

So Al Rust wrote President Gordon B. Hinckley a letter. In it, he requested a meeting with Hinckley and Hofmann for the purpose of straightening out some questions in regard to the McLellin Collection. Nothing pushy, nothing confrontational. He came as a supplicant.

The next day he went to deliver the letter to Hinckley's office but got no farther than the security desk. Mark Hofmann could drop in on President Hinckley anytime, without an appointment, but not Al Rust. "I have this letter for President Hinckley," he told them. Hinckley's secretary came out and took it. That was as close as Al Rust got.

Only hours after Rust returned from Temple Square, Hofmann called from New York.

"My wife says you sent a letter to the Church." He sounded very grave.

Rust was defiant. "Yes, Mark, I took it up a couple of hours ago, personally."

"Why did you do that? I told you how important it was not to do anything like that."

"You have been giving me the runaround. I told you I'm just tired of this."

"Well, you shouldn't have done that."

The next day, Hofmann cut short his New York stay and flew back to Salt Lake City. He went directly to Hinckley's office. He had come to explain the letter from Rust. "I've already taken care of that," he reportedly told Hinckley, nonchalant as ever. Rust was the Salt Lake investor whom he had told Hinckley about in their last meeting, the one who wanted his money out.

Hinckley nodded. According to Hofmann's account, he didn't ask why Rust thought the Church had the McLellin Collection when Hofmann had told Hinckley it was in a safe-deposit box. He didn't ask about money. He seemed to have only one thing on his mind.

Are you sure Rust won't make the Collection public?

"Yes, he's a good Mormon."

Are you sure he won't try to obtain the Collection?

"Yes. Wilford Cardon is going to pay off Rust's interest in the Collection."

Deniability.

Hofmann watched as Hinckley wrote a note for his file that the matter had been taken care of.

Nine frustrating days went by, and Al Rust heard nothing. Finally, he called Hinckley's office. He reached a different secretary this time. "The letter is here," she said, "but President Hinckley is gone until the ninth." Hinckley was in East Germany dedicating a new Temple. Rust considered calling or writing again to find out why there was such a delay in responding to his first letter, but decided against it. Who was he to question the Second Counselor to the President of the First Presidency or anything the Second Counselor to the President of the First Presidency chose to do, or not do? Good Mormons don't press the General Authorities. They wait to be called.

So Al Rust waited.

About a week later, Mark Hofmann called. "You probably aren't going to get an answer to your letter to President Hinckley," he said.

"Why not?"

"I've taken care of everything."

"I wonder if you really have."

In early June, Hofmann flew to Mesa, Arizona, to meet Wilford Cardon, to make his pitch. If Cardon would loan him $180,000, Hofmann said, he could buy the McLellan Collection and donate it to the Church. "It's something the Church should have," he stressed. "I'm not entirely sure what each and every item is, but what I know already is enough to indicate that the information would be devastating if it got into the wrong hands."

Hofmann said he was coming into a lot of money soon and would pay Cardon back. It was a loan, not an investment, not a gift. Hofmann wanted to give it to the Church himself. "I've got to get it and give it to President Hinckley," he said. "The Church should not buy it outright or have it loaned to them."

Cardon, a devout Mormon, found the whole proposal troubling. This didn't sound like the Church he knew and loved, all this talk of dangerous documents, clandestine purchases, and enemy hands. "Let's get Hinckley on the phone and ask him what he thinks," Cardon suggested.

"Fine," said Hofmann. "I'll place the call."

He called the First Presidency office. "President Hinckley's not there," he told Cardon. "He's in Germany."

Without Hinckley's okay, Cardon wouldn't touch the deal.

On June 14, the Library of Congress returned the "Oath of a Freeman" to the Schiller-Wapner Galleries in New York City. They were not interested in purchasing it for $1.5 million.

42

The Church needed another push.

Brent Metcalfe had been taking a lot of heat for the Cowdery history. Interviewers were dogging him, always with the same questions: How do you know? What proof do you have? And all he could say was, "I have this source, and he's very reliable." Without corroboration, none of the national papers or magazines would pick up the story. It would remain a local sidebar, the news equivalent of a crank call. Certainly nothing for the Church to worry about.

Metcalf felt as if he'd been hung out to dry. "You put too much responsibility on my shoulders," he told Hofmann. "You're having me talk about these things, without anyone to corroborate what I say. I think you should talk directly to somebody who is known for their integrity and for their knowledge of Mormonism, but who is outside of Mormonism."

Hofmann had just the man in mind: John Dart of the Los Angeles Times. Dart had written extensively on the Church and attended several of the symposiums sponsored by Sunstone and the Mormon History Association. His readership included some of the richest stakes in Mormondom. As the flap over the Stowell letter made clear, when the Los Angeles Times said boo, the Church jumped.

Hofmann told Metcalfe to contact Dart and set up a meeting.

In early June, Dart flew into Salt Lake City and rendezvoused with Hofmann at the Training Table restaurant on Highland Drive near the Cottonwood Mall. From there, they walked to a nearby park and sat down in a gazebo on a hill. Dart, a reserved man with an unexpected sense of humor, pulled out a tape recorder and Hofmann began to talk.

He described the Cowdery history as a volume bound partly in leather, with marbled cardboard covers, about eight inches wide, ten inches long and three-quarters of an inch thick, with lined pages. When asked why he agreed to be interviewed, he said he felt the Cowdery history was important corroboration for the salamander references in the Martin Harris letter, which many Mormons still considered a forgery.

What exactly did Cowdery say about the finding of the gold plates?

"I don't remember the exact wording," said Hofmann, "but the history said that Alvin located the buried gold with his seer stone. I remember clearly that it was not a private venture. Alvin had other people with him, including Joseph."

What did it say about the salamander?

The salamander appeared on three occasions, once to Alvin and twice to Joseph.

Does it sound like there was a conspiracy to keep Alvin's early role quiet?

"Conspiracy may be a bad word to use, but there must have been some sort of agreement that Joseph is the new seer now that Alvin is gone. Certainly the family and Oliver Cowdery knew. I can't imagine that any more knew, because it's an important aspect of the founding of the Church, and it hasn't come down in other histories that we know of."

Do you think this will shake some people's faith in the Mormon Church?

"There is a propensity to keep things the way they are. Dutiful Mormons would say that after Alvin died, the angel came to Joseph and told him what to do."

The interview lasted a couple of hours.

On June 13, Church leaders were awakened by telephone calls from bishops and stake presidents all over Southern California who had opened the Times and seen their worst nightmares on page 3 in a six-column-wide headline: MORMON ORIGINS CHALLENGED ANEW OVER PURPORTED HISTORY.

If Gordon Hinckley had sat down and made a list of everything he didn't want to see made public, it might have read like this: a complete retelling of the embarrassing details surrounding the Stowell letter, more talk of the money-digging craze at the beginning of the nineteenth century, all the most bizarre passages of the Salamander Letter, the Cowdery version of the discovery of the gold plates by Alvin instead of Joseph Smith, and references to the Church's "vague" response to questions about whether it was hiding the Cowdery history.

The article referred repeatedly to a "highly reliable source" who had seen the Cowdery book in the Church's headquarters.

The source, who insisted on anonymity in order to preserve his standing in the church, said the Cowdery history and the role it gives Alvin Smith lend further credibility to the documents disclosed earlier, which portray Joseph Smith's involvement in occult methods to find hidden treasures without any references to religious events so familiar to present-day Mormons. . . . Throughout its history the Mormon Church has had to deal with charges that the Book of Mormon is a figment of Smith's imagination and that Smith was just a treasure seeker.

In Temple Square, the response was near panic. With Hinckley still out of the country, no one knew how to react. For weeks afterward, paranoia ran at an all-time high. The word of the day was damage control.

* * *

Hinckley was still out of the country when Mark Hofmann called Steve Christensen on Thursday, June 27. "I need to see you." His cartoon voice sounded unusually harsh and urgent. "I don't want to discuss it over the phone, but it's important." They agreed to meet the next morning at 10:30.

Christensen recorded the meeting in his journal, marking the pages "Confidential Entry":

The meeting commenced as previously arranged and Mark wasted no time in telling the following set of circumstances. For some time he had actively pursued a collection of Mormon material in Texas which is most commonly referred to as the William McLellin Collection. At one time the Church had pursued the collection, negotiating with the current owner's father; however they were unsuccessful in their efforts. (Mark indicated that the former owner refused to sell it at any price to the Church.)

Mark was finally successful in entering into an option to purchase with the current owner, provided that the owner neither showed nor discussed the collection with anyone other than Mark and provided that Mark could produce the necessary $195,000 needed to purchase the collection. To obtain the option Mark placed $10,000 down as earnest money deposit. The remaining funds needed therefore equalled $185,000. Mark had indicated to me that he had arranged to borrow the funds from a private party; however, in the last days remaining on the purchase option the private party withdrew his financial support.

Hofmann was desperate. The "purchase option" expired on Sunday, June 30, he said, the day after tomorrow. Was there any chance that Christensen could lend him the necessary funds? He made it clear that unless he came through before the deadline, the Collection would fall into "enemy hands."

It was too much money for Christensen, who was on the verge of declaring bankruptcy, but he wanted to help. Normally, he would have called Hinckley—he always seemed to know what to do in these delicate situations—but Hinckley was still in Germany. He suggested instead that they call another General Authority, Hugh Pinnock, a member of the Council of Seventy who happened to be a close college friend of the chairman of CFS; a man, Christensen said, who had "broad financial expertise and a wide circle of friends."

Christensen called Pinnock and quickly reviewed the situation with him. Pinnock didn't require any persuading. "I can have the funds within an hour," he said. "Bring Hofmann to my office as soon as possible."

They arrived at the Church Administration Building about 11:25. Pinnock welcomed them "most graciously," and took them into the more congenial offices of Dallin Oaks, an Apostle and Pinnock's immediate supervisor within the Church hierarchy. Hofmann repeated the dilemma, in even darker tones this time. He spelled out, "in no uncertain terms," Christensen noted in his journal, "how damaging the material could be if it fell into the wrong hands."

He told them how Wesley Walters and George Smith had somehow found out about the Collection and contacted the owner. Should Hofmann miss his funding deadline, there was no question they would rush in and scoop up the Collection. There had been some speculation in print (in the Tanners' newsletter) and considerable rumor that the Church had already purchased the Collection in an attempt to suppress it. Hofmann's message was clear: "If I buy the Collection, then you can deny that you have it." Once again, he was offering what they wanted most: deniability.

Unlike Hinckley, Pinnock and Christensen listened eagerly to Hofmann's account of what the Collection contained.

It was a chilling list. There were pieces of the Egyptian papyrus from which, according to Church doctrine, Joseph Smith translated the Book of Abraham. (The last time some of these papyri surfaced, in 1967, they had turned out to be nothing more than commonplace funerary inscriptions, throwing the divine origins of the Book of Abraham in deep doubt and causing the Church no end of embarrassment.) There were the papers and diaries of McLellin himself, all incendiary stuff. Even without seeing them, Pinnock and Christensen could imagine McLellin's chronicles of manipulation, corruption, fornication, and other assorted scandals.

And finally, most damaging, there was an affidavit from Emma Smith, the Prophet's wife, indicating that Joseph's first religious experience was the recovery of the gold plates in 1827. In other words, additional proof that there was no First Vision! The Salamander Letter and Cowdery history were right—Alvin Smith had been the first to hear of the gold plates. Joseph had merely stepped into his shoes—or carried on his scam, however one chose to interpret it.

There were papers connecting Sidney Rigdon, an associate of Joseph Smith's, and Solomon Spaulding, the author of a romantic novel about early Romans coming to America and establishing a civilization—a novel that predated Joseph Smith's Book of Mormon, about early Hebrews coming to America and establishing a civilization. The Church had always claimed that Smith knew nothing of Spaulding's book, despite many parallels and even common passages. Hofmann's documents would prove otherwise.

In all, there were three orange crate-size boxes filled with dynamite.

Hofmann explained that, from the very beginning, he had intended to donate the Collection to the Church. When Christensen asked him how he could afford such a sizable gift, Hofmann told him about the "Oath of a Freeman." The Library of Congress had agreed to purchase it for $1.5 million, he claimed. The contract was already signed, and the first payment was due on August 15. At that time, he could easily repay the loan.

"This way I can say that I never sold the McLellin Collection to the Church. And the Church's representatives can say they never purchased it. With any luck, no one will ever ask me if I donated the material."

Christensen commented in his journal account: "Though this form of dialogue walks the fine line of 'honest intent' behind a question, it perhaps saves the Church for the time being from having to offer an explanation on why they won't release the material and/or be under the necessity of mounting a public relations move to counter the contents of the collection."

With the fallout of the Salamander Letter, Stowell, and Cowdery fiascos still hanging in the air, it was a powerful argument.

One that Pinnock saw immediately.

Hugh Pinnock was said to have only one ambition in life, to be an Apostle. And this crisis could be his ticket. Only a few days before, he had complained to an associate, "When I was in business, I could measure my success by the amount of money I made. Now that I'm a General Authority, there is no way to measure my success."

Now he had found a way. Mark Hofmann had presented him with an opportunity to save the Church from another devastating revelation, an embarrassment far worse than anything so far. If he could successfully maneuver the Church through these tricky shoals during President Hinckley's absence, it would be an act of stewardship worthy of Hinckley himself, an act that would undoubtedly bring him to the attention of the Council of the Twelve.

He lunged at the opportunity so quickly that even Christensen was startled. He wrote in his journal: "It was remarkable to both Mark and myself that Elder Pinnock was willing to assist to his fullest extent possible with only a brief explanation. It was as though he sensed completely the potential damage this material would cause in the hands of the enemies of the Church."

The money was no problem, Pinnock boasted. He had raised funds in the past for behind-the-scenes projects that were important to the Church, always with utmost discretion. President Tanner had once asked him to find the money—"privately, quickly and quietly"—to restore the farmhouse in Fayette, New York, where on April 6, 1830, the Church was founded. Pinnock relished the story. He had called just the right nineteen men and asked for $25,000 from each. All but three had come through—no questions asked. And why not? asked Pinnock, taking off his glasses for emphasis. Their Temple covenants required them to "literally give all to the Church."

Pinnock savored the story for a few moments, like a man at the end of a rich meal, then went to the outer office to "make a few phone calls."

He returned just minutes later with a satisfied smile that said, "All done, simple as that." He said he had called Zion's Bank—the Church bank—but the chairman, vice-chairman, and president were all out of town. Undaunted, he had called Bob Ward of First Interstate Bank, on whose board, Pinnock pointed out, he served.

First Interstate would provide Hofmann with a cashier's check in the amount of $185,000. All he had to do was sign a promissory note.

Collateral?

No collateral necessary. Hofmann's word that the sale to the Library of Congress was a fait accompli was sufficient.

Pinnock obviously liked this—the sheer efficacy of it. Hugh Pinnock, problem solver. He was all gravity and dispatch. He handed Hofmann four phone numbers. "This way you can reach me day or night." What if the owner of the Collection tried to break the deal by arguing that a cashier's check wasn't "legal tender" on a Sunday because it couldn't be cashed? Not a problem for Hugh Pinnock. He would have $185,000 in cash ready as a backup. Did Hofmann need use of a Church propjet for his trip to Texas to pick up the Collection? Pinnock could provide it. How about an armored car to transport the documents? Better not to take any chances. Pinnock could arrange that too.

"I think that might be overdoing it a little," Hofmann suggested, doggedly deferential. It would be enough just to send the Collection by registered mail and insure it for $195,000.

"I'll keep you updated on the negotiations this weekend," he told them. The plan was this: if all went well—and he had no reason to believe it wouldn't—he would put the Collection in several safe-deposit boxes until the check from the Library of Congress came through. Then he would pay off the loan and hand the materials over to the Church.

As the three men walked toward the door, Pinnock turned to Hofmann. "I wonder if I could talk to you sometime about retaining your services to track down two items for me."

One was the missing 116 pages of the Book of Mormon. Pinnock had heard of a "crazy lady" in Pennsylvania who had leads on the missing pages, as well as a hoard of materials once belonging to Sidney Rigdon.

And the second item?

"I'm not in a position to reveal the second item at this time," Pinnock said, the stiff, paternalistic tone returning. "It's too sensitive to mention."

Christensen and Hofmann went directly to the bank, where the paper work was ready. All Hofmann had to do was sign the promissory note for $185,000 at an interest rate of prime plus one, due September 3, 1985. As Pinnock had promised, no collateral was required. That didn't seem to please Harvey Tanner, the bank vice-president who had been put in charge of the transaction. An unsecured loan of this size was highly unusual. But if the Church wanted it, if his bosses wanted it, who was he to stand in the way?

Just in case, Tanner asked Hofmann to bring in a copy of his contract with the Library of Congress—at his convenience. Hofmann said he would do so gladly.

That night, Christensen wrote in his journal: "I am convinced that Elder Pinnock's personal actions not only preserved Mark Hofmann's ability to purchase the collection, but equally important, he has saved the Church countless time and money and effort in countering what would have been an avalanche of negative publicity should the collection have fallen into the wrong hands."

Christensen also wished Mark Hofmann well on his difficult mission to Texas, armed only with his faith and the Lord's check for $185,000.

Connie Smith had seen many strange things in her eighteen years of selling homes. But this pair took the prize.

"How can these kids afford this house?" she asked herself, not for the first time, as they stood in the twenty-by-thirty living room of the "glorious country estate with marvelous livability and endless quality" in Cottonwood, the most exclusive neighborhood in Salt Lake City.

Partly, it was the way they were dressed. To Smith, an attractive woman in her sixties, always elegant, with good bones and twenty-four grandchildren, it was bad enough that they had worn dirty jeans and thongs to the last ten showings (thank heaven, most of the owners vacated the premises for their visits), but they had worn the same dirty jeans and thongs every day.

As the city's foremost broker of "quality" homes, Smith had certainly seen wealthy people wearing all kinds of crazy things, and she had learned to affect a degree of tolerance. She had learned to judge her buyers' wealth not by their dress, but by their bearing. That was the problem with these two. They not only didn't dress rich, they didn't act rich. They were too shy. They didn't ask enough questions. They didn't take control of the situation. He had more of an air of authority than she did, but that was damning by faint praise. They would enter a room, walk to the center, and just stand there, staring.

She expressed her concerns to the co-agent on the sale, a personal friend of the couple. "Can these people really afford this house?" she asked. "He's my childhood friend," the agent had told her. "He's absolutely qualified. We can trust him."

So Smith stood in the living room and ran down the house's special features one more time (this was their second visit). It may not have been a distinguished house, but it was big: a seven-bedroom brick rambler with big living room, big rec room, big kitchen, big tennis court, and big lawn. Smith looked at the young couple standing in the middle of the room in their dirty jeans and thongs and thought to herself, They look sort of big themselves. Sort of barrel-shaped.

Then she repeated the price, just in case they had missed it the first time: $567,000. It had first been listed at over $700,000, but the real estate market had taken a beating during the recent economic downturn. The $567,000 was “more or less firm.”

The wife explained that they had been very interested in a home in Emigration Canyon. Her husband liked it because it was secluded and had an extensive security system. But she wanted a family house in a good neighborhood where her kids could grow up with “advantaged” children.

Smith, who worked more for pleasure than for money, took pride in her politesse, but she couldn’t restrain herself any longer. She would do it diplomatically, but she had to ask.

“What exactly is your line of work, Mr. Hofmann?”

“I deal in rare documents,” said the barrel-shaped man.

The co-agent on the sale was Mark Hofmann’s former schoolmate, Carl Lundquist. On one of their many viewing trips, this one without Dorie, Hofmann had shared with Lundquist the security concerns that led him to prefer the fortress-like house in Emigration Canyon. “Ever since I found the Martin Harris letter,” he said, “I’ve gotten phone calls, letters—death threats to kill me and my family.”

This comment led to a philosophical debate—like the ones they used to have at Olympus High.

“Under what circumstances,” Hofmann asked, “do you think you could kill a person?”

“I don’t know,” said Lundquist, a little startled by the question and out of practice at philosophical debates.

“Could you kill somebody for money?” Hofmann pressed. “What if you didn’t even know the person, but someone offered you a lot of money to kill that person?”

Lundquist pondered the question for a minute. “If I was in a war, trying to defend my country, I could kill. If someone was breaking into my house and my family was threatened, yes, I could kill. But if I was asked to go out and kill somebody in cold blood, somebody I didn’t know, and they weren’t bad people, and I didn’t have a reason to kill them, and I had no idea why someone wanted them dead? Could I do that? Could I take somebody else’s life without justification? Without cause?”

He paused a minute, trying to give it serious consideration. “No,” he finally decided. “There’s just no way.”

“Me neither,” said Hofmann. “I don’t think I could do that, either.” There was a long pause. “But if you were going to kill somebody,” he started up again, “how would you do it? Would you shoot him, blow him up, poison him, shoot him with a shotgun?” Mark had obviously done some thinking about this, Lundquist realized.

Mark thought the best way to kill someone was with a shotgun. "Shotguns are untraceable. They don't have riflings. With a rifle or a pistol you can trace the bearing marks on the bullet—unless you're using the right kind of bullet. You can use a bullet that, once it impacts, it explodes, and you can't identify that bullet." Hofmann thought about that for a moment, then added, "But you have to be at pretty close range to kill someone with a shotgun. It's something you'd have to do while you were looking at them in the face."

Then he threw out another possibility. "What about a bomb? If a bomb was well built, well thought-out, that would be untraceable. Your fingerprints wouldn't be on it. Nobody would know how it got there if you were careful placing it, and it would be totally impossible to trace."

"Yeah, that would be one way to do it," Lundquist agreed abstractly. "It'd make sure they were dead." Lundquist thought how much fun it was to talk this way again—philosophically—with his old friend. "There aren't a lot of people who are this open-minded, who are willing to talk like this."

Then the conversation turned to sex: who liked what in bed and whether Hofmann, who had been to a nude "health club" on one of his trips to New York, wore gym shorts or ran around in the buff.

44 Al Rust was sick and tired of waiting for his money—$296,750 (including profits), to be precise. He had put up with unreturned phone calls, bounced checks, and bogus stories long enough. One day in August 1985, his slow burn reached the boiling point and he drove to Hofmann's house to have it out.

As usual, Mark wasn't there. When Dorie came to the door, Rust, for want of a better target, lit into her. "Mark isn't being honest with me. He's giving me a runaround again. He's never here when I want to see him. He tells me one thing one day and another thing another day. He keeps promising me all these things, and he doesn't answer my questions. I don't know what to do."

Rust had finally come to the conclusion that Hofmann was taking advantage of his devotion to the Church. It was the most despicable trick of all. "I'll tell you what I'm going to do," he told Dorie. "I am going back to the LDS Church, and if they don't do anything, I'm going to take action."

Tears came to Dorie's eyes. "I don't know exactly what Mark is doing," she said. "He's having lots of problems. I don't know what's going on."

Rust wasn't the kind of man who could watch a woman cry and not soften a little. "I'm not trying to nail him to the cross," he said. "I just need some answers. Have him contact me."

But as he drove away from the house, Rust had that metallic feeling in the pit of his stomach that told him he had been snookered again, that he was too forgiving, that Doralee was once again covering for her no-good husband. Maybe she had no choice. Maybe she was more to be pitied than censured—being married to Mark Hofmann couldn't be easy. But this time, when he stopped thinking about it, he was still angry.

That evening Hofmann called Rust from New York. "I'm taking care of everything," he said. "Everything will be fine. Just hang in there."

Rust "hung in there" until the next time Hofmann came to visit. Then he let him have it. Rust wasn't a screamer or a shouter, but he could be a stern father.

"I've heard four different stories about selling the McLellin Collection. Now you're telling me someone's going to donate the money so the Church can buy it. But none of it ever seems to materialize." Like a good Mormon, Rust was concerned not just about their business dealings, but about the way Mark was running his life. "It seems like you're collecting money from Peter to pay Paul. You're just trying to get money from one person to cover a debt to another person. You sell something, and instead of giving that money to pay back a person you're obligated to, you take the money and go do something else. You're running around like a chicken with your head cut off."

Hofmann sat and listened, stone still. He didn't try to defend himself. He didn't try to apologize. He just sat, not looking at Rust, not looking at anything, as vacant as a display case without the display. Al Rust was a very gentle and softhearted man—his wife was always criticizing him for it—but, at that moment, he could feel his anger rising. He felt the urge to raise his fist and smash it into that soft, blank face—just to get its attention.

When Hofmann left that night, still without a response, Rust told his wife. "I've never seen Mark like this. Nothing I said tonight got through to him. We spent two hours of wasted time." He also suspected, for the first time, that there was a side to Mark Hofmann he had never seen.

* * *

On August 12, Hofmann signed a contract to buy the big Rambler in Cottonwood for $550,000, only $17,000 less than the asking price. Connie Smith wondered why Carl Lundquist had let his client pay near full price in a buyer's market where offers routinely ran $150,000 below asking price. But she didn't want to ask too many questions.

Lundquist wondered how Mark planned to pay.

"No mortgage," Hofmann insisted. "I'd prefer to pay in several installments over two or three years. I've got a bank account in Switzerland with five hundred thousand in it. I've done some deals over in Europe, some document deals, where the proceeds have gone into my Swiss account. I could pay cash for the whole thing if I wanted to. I just don't want to."

Instead, Hofmann agreed to pay $5,000 in earnest money, $195,000 at the closing, and three additional annual installments of $195,000.

The closing was set for 1:00 P.M., October 15.

45 Sometime in mid August, Hofmann brought Al Rust a check for $40,000. It bounced. A few days later, Hofmann brought a cashier's check for $125,000. He also said that if Rust redeposited the $40,000 check the next day, it would go through. To Rust's astonishment, it did. From a total of $296,750, the indebtedness had been reduced to $131,750. Mark promised to pay the balance by August 25.

Sure enough, on the 25th, Hofmann appeared in the store looking jubilant and reporting that things were going "marvelously well." He waved a check made out to Rust for $132,000.

"What's the story with the McLellin Collection?" Rust asked.

"I acquired a document that is very valuable," Hofmann said. "It's worth over a million dollars, and it's being sold to the United States government. They are going to pay me on September 1." Just when Rust was about to ask what this had to do with the McLellin Collection, Hofmann added, "So I've donated the McLellin Collection to the LDS Church myself as tithing."

Rust was stunned. "Gosh, how can you give away a collection that you don't own? I paid the money for that collection. It's a partnership. How could you give that away when it wasn't yours?"

Hofmann tried to explain that the Church didn't want to get involved in buying it, and "this just seemed like the easy way. I was getting all this extra money and I pay tithing anyway, so I thought I would just give it to them. Don't worry. I'm going to be making so much money on this other deal."

Rust told himself that it didn't really matter where the money was coming from as long as it was coming. "Boy, that's great, Mark," he finally conceded.

"So I guess we don't need the safe-deposit box any more," Hofmann prompted.

"I guess we don't." The two men went across the street, and Hofmann retrieved his documents and books.

The next day, the $132,000 check bounced.

Steaming, Rust instructed his bank to monitor Hofmann's account daily and to put the check through for collection at the first sign of solvency.

One day toward the end of August, Jill Stone, Mark's former girlfriend, saw him at a Park West concert at the huge, circular Salt Palace on West Temple. Actually, he saw her, somehow, in a crowd of five thousand people. They hadn't spoken in almost six years. It was a brief, awkward reunion.

Two days later, he called.

She was shocked that he had been able to find her unlisted number.

"I want to see you," he said in a high, plaintive voice, like a small child.

"Aren't you married—with kids?" she reminded him curtly.

"Yes."

"Then you have no business calling me."

"But you're not married, are you?"

"That's none of your business. My life is my own, and it doesn't involve you in any way."

"I want to see you." An insistent edge crept into his voice. "I want to make you understand. . . ."

"I'm sorry. I needed answers six years ago—not now."

Then she hung up.

He called again the next day.

"I want to see you," he repeated, more shrill this time. "I need to see you. I need to explain things to you."

"You don't seem to understand. I don't want to talk to you any more."

It was as if a bomb had exploded on the other end of the line. Hofmann erupted into incoherent screaming—just as he had six years ago. She knew if she had been in the same room, he would have tried to hit her again. "Why can't you understand?" he railed. "Why won't you ever listen to me? Why won't anybody listen to me?" he shrieked uncontrollably, his voice filled with menace. "Why won't anybody listen to me?"

She hung up again and, terrified, called a psychologist friend. "What if he calls again? What am I going to do?"

"Whatever you do," she said, "don't make him angry. Don't make him mad."

At the First Interstate Bank, Harvey Tanner waited all day September 3 for Mark Hofmann. The $185,000 loan that Hugh Pinnock had arranged was due. Tanner's bad feeling about this whole affair had only gotten stronger, and eight hours of looking up from his desk and hoping to see Hofmann's face didn't help his fraying nerves. At the end of the day, after the bank closed its doors, he called Hugh Pinnock to give him the bad news.

Pinnock turned around and called Steve Christensen.

In his desperate search for Hofmann, Christensen called Brent Metcalfe. "I'm looking for Mark," he said, unusually frantic. "If you see him, tell him he has to call me."

"What's going on, Steve?"

"I've got to get ahold of him right away. I need to get some money from him. His $185,000 note is due. Mark has to get ahold of me quick."

A few days later, Hofmann called Pinnock and told him he was having some financial problems. Pinnock told him to call Harvey Tanner and explain. When Hofmann called, Tanner suggested that he come in and discuss the matter—and bring with him the contract to sell the "Oath of a Freeman." They set a date and time for the meeting.

Hofmann never showed up.

He did show up a few days later in Hugh Pinnock's office to offer reassurances that he was financially sound. When he left, Pinnock called Christensen. He wanted Steve to make sure the loan was repaid. Everything had to be handled discreetly, of course—Hofmann was in a sensitive position—but there could be no mistaking Pinnock's message: Get that money.

A few nights later, Metcalfe got another urgent call from Christensen. "I've got to get ahold of Mark right away."

"What happened now?"

"He's just bounced a check for $185,000. Hinckley and Pinnock are really concerned. They're thinking of pressing criminal charges."

On September 9, Hofmann visited his cousin Ken Woolley and gave him a check for $40,000 to pay off an old debt. He looked real happy, Woolley thought. "Things are going good," he said. "I am going to get the house."

46 Later the same week, Hofmann walked into Thomas Wilding's office on West Temple with spectacular news. "The Haunted Man," the Dickens manuscript, had finally sold for a 66 percent gain! Wilding could hardly believe it. His old friend Mark really did have a Midas touch. Not that Wilding hadn't had a few doubts along the way, especially when five months went by without any word. He had even tried to see Mark's dealer, Justin Schiller, on his recent Labor Day trip to New York, but Hofmann, who was in charge of arranging the meeting, called at the last minute to say Schiller was out of town for the weekend. Now, in the midst of the celebration, he felt a little embarrassed. How could he have doubted?

"Who did you sell it to?" Wilding wanted every delicious detail.

"The Pierpont Morgan Library, in New York."

"You'll get us a sales receipt?"

"No problem."

There was one problem, however. The money, $400,000, wouldn't be paid until October 16. When Wilding asked why, Hofmann explained, "When you sell a major manuscript, there is often a delay. That's standard for the industry."

But wait, there was more good news. The Brigham Young letters that Wilding had helped him buy in August had also sold for a 42 percent gain. Almost 50 percent in one month. And that money, $34,130, was available immediately.

It was available, that is, if Wilding wanted to pass up an even better deal.

"You should know," Hofmann began with the twinkle in his eye that all his investors loved to see, "I now have probably the best potential investment I've ever had."

For Mark Hofmann, that was saying a lot.

"I can offer you a chance to get in on the biggest investment yet, an investment that is just phenomenal. I'd really like you to participate in it."

Wilding couldn't wait to hear.

It was a second copy of the "Oath of a Freeman."

"It's the first printed document in colonial America," Hofmann boasted. "I sold the first one to the Library of Congress for a million dollars. That was through Justin Schiller too. If the first one sold for a million, the second has to be worth a million and a half." He told Wilding how he had found the first one serendipitously in the Argosy Book Store. "This second one I've been offered by a documents dealer in Boston." The dealer's name? Lyn Jacobs.

"I need to raise half a million dollars for it," said Hofmann, brimming with excitement. "As soon as I can get the money, I'll fly to Boston to pick it up."

Wilding didn't know beans about documents, but he did know business, and his business sense told him it couldn't help to have two copies of the same document on the market at the same time. "You're sure the first one has already sold?" he asked.

"Absolutely. The first one has been sold."

Wilding struggled to square up the story. He wanted to believe it was true, that the deal was really this impossibly good. "If the document's worth over a million dollars, why would Mr. Jacobs sell it to you for 500 thousand?"

"He's owned it for a year and has a gain in it sufficient enough that he's willing to let it go."

Wilding didn't need to hear any more. All of Mark's deals were a little screwy, but who could argue with his record? He gave the go-ahead to reinvest all the profits from the sale of the Brigham Young letters, and he arranged a meeting with some of his investors to scare up the rest of the money Hofmann needed. The deal was so good he called family first. The obvious choice was his brother-in-law, Sid Jensen. Jensen had recently come by a large sum of money in an unfortunate way: he had lost an arm in a buzz-saw accident and successfully sued the plant where the accident occurred. Now he wanted to invest his winnings. This was just the deal for him, Wilding thought: high return, no downside. Jensen came to the meeting with Hofmann accompanied by his wife, father, and mother.

After Hofmann repeated his pitch, Wilding and Jensen asked if they could call Schiller in New York to get some more information. Mark hesitated for a minute (These document dealers, Wilding thought, so secretive) but then agreed—on one condition. He didn't want Schiller to know there was a second "Oath." Wilding could ask about Schiller's opinion of the "Oath" itself, its background, rarity, value, salability, etc., but he mustn't reveal the existence of a second copy. If he did, he might "blow the deal."

Blowing the deal was the last thing Wilding wanted to do. With Hofmann listening on another phone, he treaded through the conversation very softly, very carefully—so carefully that he never bothered to confirm if the first copy of the "Oath" had, in fact, been sold. By the end of the conversation, Schiller had pushed all the right buttons—"He couldn't have done a better job if he had been selling it himself"—and Wilding was satisfied.

Jensen, too, was in.

On September 12, Harvey Tanner looked up from his desk at First Interstate Bank and finally saw the person he had been looking for: Mark Hofmann. He leaped from his chair and caught up to him at the teller's window, buying cashier's checks. "Can I speak to you privately?" he said in the most restrained voice he could muster. The two men that were with him looked startled. Hofmann looked cornered.

During their brief, tense conversation, in which Tanner demanded repayment of the $185,000 loan, Hofmann somehow failed to mention that he was carrying $173,870 in cash and cashier's checks—the money that Wilding's group was investing in the second copy of the "Oath."

Wilding and Jensen stood not far away, watching the conversation in heated pantomime. They couldn't catch any of the words, but the grim expression on Harvey Tanner's face said more than they wanted to hear. They looked at each other with identical expressions of apprehension: This man is taking $200,000 of our money. This man already has almost $200,000 of our money. Why does this man's banker look like he wants to have him arrested?

In the parking lot, Wilding asked, as nonchalantly as possible, "What was the problem, Mark? That man sure looked upset."

Hofmann shrugged his shoulders. "Well, I co-signed a loan, a small loan, and it's a little bit overdue. That's all. It will be taken care of." He seemed suddenly in a terrible hurry to get to the airport to catch his plane for Boston to pick up the second "Oath." No time to waste on trivial matters.

Jensen, a solid, quick-tempered man, wasn't satisfied. When they dropped Wilding back at his office, Jensen decided to stay with the money. Together, he and Hofmann drove to Hofmann's bank on 33rd South, where Jensen surrendered his check and Hofmann deposited all the checks in his account and had new cashier's checks issued.

Jensen noticed that instead of having a single check made out in the amount of the purchase price, Hofmann was having a number of checks made out in varying amounts, the biggest one only $100,000. Jensen asked what he was doing.

"I want to leave myself some room for negotiation," Hofmann explained.

"Then why don't all the checks add up to the purchase price?"

Hofmann seemed to stumble for a few seconds. "I, ah, already sent some checks to the dealer in Boston," he finally said.

That didn't sound very likely to Sid Jensen. He was liking this whole proposition—and Mark Hofmann too—less and less.

On his way to the airport, Hofmann dropped Jensen at Wilding's office. He gave him the flight information. Before Jensen had even reached the office, however, Hofmann called Wilding from his car phone. "Sid seems real nervous about something," Hofmann said. "If he wants me to buy $20,000 of his investment in the 'Oath,' I'll be glad to do it."

Wilding, who had had his own nervous flutters, was noncommittal. "I can't answer for Mr. Jensen. I'll have to talk to him."

Jensen, in fact, was way past nervous; he was mad. As soon as he returned to Wilding's office, he recruited Gary Smith, another investor in Hofmann's project, to help him investigate Hofmann's elusive financial situation. Smith immediately called Harvey Tanner at First Interstate Bank. Tanner wouldn't give specifics, but he did say that Hofmann had "a large, outstanding loan that he can't seem to pay." Hofmann had lied on at least two counts: it was a loan to him personally, and it was a loan for a significant sum. Armed with this alarming news, Jensen stalked into Wilding's office.

"Gary Smith thinks that what happened today shows up some inconsistencies in Mark's story and that we ought to get ahold of him right now and find out what the problem is." They didn't want to say it, but both men were thinking the same thing.

They tried calling Hofmann's house, but there was no answer.

They called the airport, giving the airline and flight number that Mark had given them. There was no such flight at that hour. Maybe he got the information wrong.

They jumped in Wilding's truck and headed for the airport. First, they looked for Hofmann; then they drove up and down the parking lots looking frantically for his car.

Maybe he planned to leave later that night. No, there were no more flights to Boston or New York.

They drove to his house. It was 10 o'clock. He wasn't there.

47

After a sleepless night, Wilding drove to Hofmann's house at 5:30 the next morning, Friday, the 13th of September. He had to wait an hour until Smith arrived. He wanted a witness.

Dorie answered the door. "What's going on?" she said, obviously concerned. The harassment was starting earlier and earlier in the day.

"We need to talk with your husband."

"Mark's in the shower," she said quickly, heading them off at the door to the back hall. "I'll tell him you're here."

Eventually, Hofmann came out, his hair wet and neatly combed. "What's the big deal?" he asked.

Wilding could barely control his rage. "I'll tell you what the big deal is. There are a lot of things you've been telling us that don't add up. You're supposed to be on a flight to Boston, but there isn't any such flight. You're supposed to get the money to Lyn, but you're still here. What's going on? Where's the money?"

Hofmann looked at them with a startled, slightly wounded expression. How could they distrust him so? "No problem. I still have the money, and I'm going today. I was going to go yesterday but I decided to go today, and I'm taking my son." That was a reminder: his family was in the house.

"I don't care anymore," Wilding shot back, unappeased. "The deal's off. You haven't done what you said you were going to do, and there's no way we're going through with the deal. There's no way we want to invest this money. We just want our money back. If you've still got the money, go get it."

Mark went downstairs, and came back with the back portion of a cashier's check made out to Lyn Jacobs the day before for $154,000. "I already sent the check," he said.

But he had just said he was leaving with the money later that day. More lies, Wilding thought. "Mark, I have a lot at stake here. I have investors who trust me, and I trusted you, and now there are obviously some problems."

Dorie broke in. She had heard the heated voices. She knew something was wrong. "Mark, what's going on?"

He dismissed her. "Let me handle this."

Then Mark finally began to realize what was going on. "You can't turn down a good deal," he said, suddenly, obviously anxious, his voice edging toward petulance. "You can't turn down a good deal."

"We can, and we are," said Wilding firmly. "We want our money back. And I'm going to stay with you until I get it."

Hofmann tried another expression: indifference. "Well, okay, no problem. I've got other investors who will take the investment with no problem at all. We can go to the bank and get your money. I'll meet you at the bank at 10:30."

Wilding had had enough of his tricks. "I'm not leaving here, Mark. You and I will go to the bank together."

They rode together in Hofmann's Toyota to the Rocky Mountain State Bank. Hofmann's account contained only $18,000—$160,000 less than they had given him the day before. He hadn't gone to Boston, he hadn't bought the "Oath," and the money was gone.

"Where's the rest of the money?" Wilding demanded, irate by now.

Hofmann avoided answering him directly. "You'll get your money back."

"Let's get it back now."

Hofmann said he had several business appointments that day. (But he was supposed to go to Boston today, Wilding thought.) He could call in some debts while he was out and meet Wilding back at his office with the money.

No sale. Wilding wanted to be right there with him the whole day. Who knew what other creditors, like Harvey Tanner, were waiting out there to grab anything Mark put his hands on? Wilding wanted to make sure that every dollar came to him first. "Look, Mark," he said, "I don't care who you call or what you do. Just get our money back. What you do from there is up to you."

Finally, he had evoked a reaction: Hofmann began to tremble.

* * *

The first stop was Deseret Book.

Wade Lillywhite and Curt Bench, Lillywhite's boss, had never seen Mark Hofmann so distraught. He was usually so calm, so detached, so in control. The first thing Lillywhite said, even before "Hi," was "What's wrong?"

"I'm in a little difficulty," Hofmann said, lowering his voice. "I need some money right away and wanted to talk to you about the possibility of a loan. A fairly large sum of money."

Hofmann was always pulling strange stunts, but this one puzzled even two longtime associates like Lillywhite and Bench. Just the other day, he had been in the store with a $100,000 check to cover a previous purchase. They knew the documents business had its ups and downs, but how could Hofmann have $100,000 one day and need a loan the next?

"How much do you want to borrow?"

"One hundred thousand."

Curiouser and curiouser, thought Lillywhite.

"I'll give you my collection of children's books as collateral."

Bench and Lillywhite both knew the collection well, and knew it was worth at least that much.

"I'll pay good interest." They had never heard Hofmann so eager. It sounded like more than just "a little difficulty."

There was a problem, though. Hofmann still owed them $16,000. The recent $100,000 check hadn't covered the entire debt from the previous deal.

"I've got that for you," he said quickly.

"I'll have to talk to my boss about the loan," said Bench. "Come back later this afternoon."

Hofmann got back in the car with Tom Wilding. Next stop: Al Rust.

Rust wasn't at his coin shop, he was manning a booth at the Utah Coin Show being held at the Salt Palace, a sports arena and convention center not far from Temple Square. Hofmann ran frantically from aisle to aisle until he found him. "I've got to talk to you," Hofmann called out as he approached, obviously agitated, trying to catch his breath. Rust later recalled it was the first time he had ever seen fear on Hofmann's face.

Rust noticed a man following Mark, standing a few paces back. "Let's go into the foyer," Hofmann suggested. Once they were outside, Mark threw his hands in the air in sheer exasperation. "Things are terrible. I'm losing everything," he wailed. "They're coming to get my car, my home!"

"What's the matter?"

"I borrowed $185,000 from a bank, and they're foreclosing on me today. They're on their way to lock my home up and take my car and everything. I'm going to lose my home and everything." It was unnerving to see Mark—cool, collected Mark—suddenly panic-stricken.

"Calm down," said Rust. "You're running in every direction at once. Just settle down and tell me what's going on." Then suddenly it struck him what Hofmann was saying, and what it meant to him and the money Mark owed him. The kindly, avuncular coin dealer was transformed instantly into the stern father. "You still owe me $132,000, and now you're telling me you owe a bank $185,000? What is going on?"

No matter how distraught, Hofmann always had an answer. "I borrowed that money to buy the 'Oath of a Freeman,'" he said. "I'm getting a million dollars for it. Also I have half ownership on a document that's in a safe-deposit box in New York."

"My goodness, Mark, how can you get in these predicaments?"

"The government promised to pay me by September 1, and then I was going to pay you. But the bank is foreclosing. They've seen my check to you, so they know I owe you $132,000, and they know I owe them $185,000, so they're locking me out." He was practically in tears.

Then he asked for a loan.

With $132,000 in uncollectable debt, a bad check sitting at his bank, and a second mortgage on his home, Rust had every right to say no—car or no car. But Al Rust took his Mormon faith very seriously, especially at times of crisis. So, reaching deep into his heart, he found one last measure of sympathy.

"I don't have any more money to help you," he said. "If I did, I would, but I just don't have it. But maybe I can help you arrange someone to loan you what you need. Let's meet in five hours to see if we can figure out somebody to help us." It was so much like Al Rust to say "us."

"Now, just calm yourself," he added as Mark left. "There's got to be a solution to all this."

The next stop on Hofmann's desperate itinerary was the Union Park Center in Midvale, south of the city, where his cousin, Ken Woolley, worked. Again, Hofmann asked for privacy. Reluctantly, Wilding agreed, remaining behind in the futuristic lobby, watching to make sure the elevator stopped at the right floor.

To Woolley, Hofmann seemed "in a panic."

"I'm in big financial trouble," he said. "I borrowed $185,000 from the bank. I was expecting to pay it back with the sale of the 'Oath of a Freeman,' but the Library of Congress didn't want to buy it. I'm desperate. I'm willing to sell it for $250,000. Do you think you might be interested?"

Woolley had had his share of problems with his cousin's crazy investment schemes. Mark still owed him $68,000 on one of them. He wasn't even slightly enticed by the offer and promptly said so.

"Well, I've got to get some money some place to pay this bank off. I wrote them a check, and it's gonna bounce."

"You what?" Woolley had come to the conclusion months before that Mark was a liar and a cheat, but he didn't think he was stupid too. "Why did you write them a check? You can't do that. It's illegal. It's a criminal violation. It's much better to default on a loan than to write a bad check."

But Hofmann didn't seem to be listening.

"What you've got to do, Mark, is sit down and do a financial statement of all your assets and liabilities. Then go to the bank and say, 'This is what I've got, this is how I'm gonna work it out.' I'll be happy to go to the bank with you."

That wasn't the kind of help Hofmann was looking for.

The options were running out.

They drove back to Deseret Book. Ron Millett, the president, wanted to think about the loan over the weekend. That was too late, said Hofmann. Millett agreed to see him later that afternoon.

At one point, Hofmann pulled Wade Lillywhite aside. "I can't wait till Monday," he said in an urgent whisper.

"If the deal doesn't go through and Deseret Book can't give you the money, let me know and I think I can line you up with somebody who can get you the money."

"Fine," said Hofmann. Finally, a breath of hope.

When he came out, he told Wilding, "They're contemplating investing in the document and they want to meet again at four to make the decision."

Back to the Salt Palace for a second meeting with Rust. Again, Hofmann and Rust went to the foyer to talk privately. Rust, who was rushing to get away for a fishing trip to Boulder Mountain, had only made a few phone calls—all unsuccessful. But he did have a suggestion.

"Since the Mormon Church has got the McLellin Collection, why don't you go to them and see if they will lend you some money against it until you get paid for the 'Oath' and can bail yourself out?"

Hofmann had a better idea. Ever since he gave Rust that rubber check for $132,000, Rust's bank had been monitoring Hofmann's account, waiting for funds to come in to make it good. If Rust would pull back that check, Hofmann would have a little more breathing space in which to work things out.

Rust agreed, but not without a stern warning. "Listen very carefully," he said. "I'm giving you till November 1. If you don't pay me the $132,000 by November 1, I'm taking action. Number one, I'll go back to the Mormon Church. Number two, I'll go to a lawyer. And number three, if I go to a lawyer, they're going to subpoena the Church, because the people there have a lot of answers to give."

Every time Rust mentioned the Church, he could see Mark flutter a bit. "If you give me that thirty days, there won't be a problem," Mark said earnestly.

But Rust wasn't finished. "The first mistake you make, I'm taking action—if you don't check in regularly, nearly every day. Or if you sell even one item for $5,000 and you don't turn the money over to me. I don't want you waiting until you accumulate $132,000. You go ahead and pay me the $5,000."

"Hey," said Hofmann, suddenly blithe, "no problem."

When he rejoined Wilding, Hofmann told him that Rust had come up with the name of someone he thought would put $50,000 into the deal.

Back to Deseret Book for the 4 o'clock meeting with Ron Millett. Wilding waited downstairs while Hofmann met with him for half an hour. Millett had reservations. Several times over the last few months Hofmann had "pulled a few real bad stunts," according to Millett. He wasn't sure he wanted to do business with him any longer. And then there was the $16,000 of outstanding debt. He wanted to think about it over the weekend.

But next week was too late.

Hofmann reported to Wilding: "They wanted until Monday to make a decision, and I told them, 'Look, either make a decision today or forget it.'"

"Well, as far as I am concerned," said Wilding, "any investor confronted with that kind of decision would say forget it."

About 6:30, they drove back to Wilding's office, where Sid Jensen was waiting for them. When it was clear that the day had produced nothing, Jensen began to boil.

"Where's our money?" he demanded.

"Back East," said Hofmann, suddenly, preternaturally calm. "One of my associates took the money to Boston and purchased the 'Oath.' You saw the cashier's check today—the one made out to Lyn Jacobs."

More lies. Jensen was fuming. First he said he was going to take the money back East himself yesterday, then he said he was taking it today, now he says he sent the money back East in the hands of an associate. It was all contradictions, evasions, and lies, and Sid Jensen had had enough of it.

Gary Smith had written out a list of accusations, and he fired them at Hofmann.

"Did you lie about the Brigham Young papers?"

"Yeah."

"Did you lie about having bought the 'Oath?'"

"Yeah."

"Did you lie about using the money we gave you to purchase 'The Haunted Man?'"

"Yeah."

But he insisted that the latest deal was for real. He had, in fact, used the money they gave him yesterday to purchase the "Oath" from Lyn Jacobs for approximately $420,000, and he was willing to sign a statement to that effect. But when they requested a receipt, he couldn't produce one.

"Why didn't you tell us all this earlier?" Wilding demanded.

"I didn't want to squelch the deal."

Jensen wanted to know only one thing: "How are you going to get our money back?"

Hofmann remained very cool. "I have other people who want to invest. I'll raise the money."

They didn't believe him.

"I'm telling you the truth," he insisted. "The money was sent back East to Lyn Jacobs. To be honest with you, the 'Oath of a Freeman' should have been purchased by four this afternoon."

"And how did you get the money there?"

"I sent it with one of my associates," he repeated.

"What's his name?"

"I prefer not to tell you."

That was clearly more than Sid Jensen could take. He had sat through the detached arrogance, the smug looks, the nerdy grins long enough. It wasn't just any money Hofmann was talking about, it was the money they had paid him for his arm. If anybody knew life could be unfair, he did, but to watch this arrogant little twerp gloat over his loss was unendurable.

"I don't think you're taking seriously what we're talking about," Jensen spat, and before anybody could stop him, raised his one arm and slugged Hofmann in the face.

There was a moment of stunned silence.

"No one's ever struck me before," Hofmann whimpered, his voice so high and soft that everyone in the room thought he sounded like a little girl.

After that, the meeting turned strangely businesslike, the calm after the storm. Hofmann owed Wilding's investors some $200,000, plus $100,000 promised profit. They had a lot of books and documents as collateral, but they wanted their money, as soon as possible.

They wrote up an agreement that required Hofmann to produce all the money, plus the $160,000 that had supposedly gone into "The Haunted Man," by the following Tuesday, September 17, at 3:30. Hofmann, Wilding, and Jensen all signed.

Wilding was skeptical. How could Mark raise that kind of money in that short time?

But Hofmann was confident. "Don't worry. I'll do it. I don't need any more time than that."

He had just one request. Could they keep everything confidential? After all, his business was built on reputation and without his reputation, he couldn't raise the money. And they did want their money back, didn't they? Of course, neither Wilding nor Jensen thought much of Hofmann's reputation any longer, but they saw the dilemma. If word of this scam got out, he wouldn't be able to raise enough money for a phone call. So they agreed: no inquiries, no letters, no lawyers, and, certainly, no police. At least until Tuesday.

Tom Wilding walked out of the meeting that night thinking, This is a Friday the 13th I'll never forget.

Mark Hofmann, apparently, felt differently. Early the next morning, he called Wade Lillywhite, waking him up. "Never mind about that loan," he said cheerily. "It's all been taken care of."

48 Everybody took Sunday off. Mark Hofmann went to church with his wife and children. So did Al Rust, Tom Wilding, Sid Jensen, Brent Ashworth, Steve Christensen, and, of course, Hugh Pinnock and Gordon Hinckley.

But the next day, the heat was on again.

Ron Millett of Deseret Book called to say “no go” on the loan.

By Tuesday evening, the 17th, Hofmann was back in front of Tom Wilding. It was obvious from the moment he shambled in that he didn’t have the money. Wilding hadn’t really expected that he would. That’s why he had arranged to meet in the offices of his attorney, John Ashton.

Ashton had the papers already drawn up.

The agreement terminated the partnership and put Hofmann in a strict debtor-creditor relationship with Wilding’s group. According to its terms, Hofmann not only agreed to pay back all the money invested, but also the fantastical gains that he had reported over the months. Wilding was out for blood. He was determined to make Hofmann eat his words: 100 percent gain in one month! Indeed, Hofmann signed two promissory notes: one for $188,488, due September 17, and one for $266,667, due October 16. Total: $455,155. And just in case that wasn’t enough to put the fear of God into him, there was a penalty clause: $2,000 per day per note.

The first penalty clause kicked in on October 15.

Wilding also wanted more collateral. He wanted the deed to Hofmann’s house and the titles to his cars.

Hofmann agreed—readily, submissively.

They wanted the second “Oath of a Freeman.”

Hofmann gulped. “I can’t. That needs to remain confidential.”

“I’ll put it in my safe-deposit box,” Wilding said. “No one has to know.”

They wanted a list of all his other debts: liens on the house? None, said Hofmann. Outstanding loans? Just the one at First Interstate Bank for $185,000. Other assets? The first “Oath” was being sold to the New York Public Library for $1.5 million. Seventy-five percent of that was his.

They wanted it.

This was hardball. "I'd never sign this agreement," Wilding said to himself. But this was the only way, apparently, to show Mark that they were dead serious, that they weren't playing games; the only way, it seemed, to wipe that smirk off his face. "We want to get this thing taken care of," he told Hofmann with all the gravity he could muster. "You seem to have lots of financial backing somewhere. So just do it."

Back at Wilding's office, the ordeal continued. Gary Smith had some more questions.

"Is this a systematic scheme to defraud people out of their money?"

"No, it isn't," Hofmann said emphatically. He seemed offended at the suggestion.

"Do you intend to cheat and not pay back any of these funds?"

"I intend to pay back the money."

"Have you lied to Tom?"

Hofmann didn't answer.

The meeting was over—and still no one had threatened to call the police.

The next morning, Hofmann brought the second copy of the "Oath" to Wilding's bank. As they left, Hofmann repeated, "I don't want any of the other people involved to know you've got this."

Wilding didn't care. "As long as we get our money, that's fine."

49 In mid-September, Hofmann received a call from Kenneth Rendell, who happened to be in Topeka, Kansas, that day on business. He wanted to make sure that he had correctly understood an order that Mark had left with his secretary in Massachusetts the week before. The order was for an Egyptian Book of the Dead in hieratic script, the shorthand, abstracted version of the more famous, more pictorial hieroglyphic form of Egyptian writing. He had also specified that he wanted it from the first century A.D., if possible, and he wanted it on papyrus.

To Rendell, it seemed like a very strange request.

"Why do you want this?" he began. "Because, you know, if your client really knows anything about this stuff, it isn't good quality, and if they really know nothing about it, they're going to want hieroglyphics instead of hieratics." But Hofmann was insistent. He knew what he wanted.

On September 16, Rendell mailed him, on thirty-day consignment, two examples of hieratic script on first-century papyrus, one eight by twenty-four inches, the other, nine by three. The discounted price for both: $10,500.

It looked like the real thing to Wade Lillywhite of Deseret Book: a small fragment from an Egyptian Book of the Dead, written in hieratics rather than hieroglyphics, on papyrus rather than linen. Lillywhite considered himself something of an amateur Egyptologist—no expert certainly, but knowledgeable enough to know this fragment was from about the first or second century A.D.—the Roman period. It wasn't such a surprising skill for a rare-book dealer in Salt Lake City, Utah. Despite being thousands of years and half a world away from the Nile Delta, the Mormons consider themselves "spiritually related" to the Egyptians through the religious writings that their Prophet "translated." Anything Egyptian has a certain cachet.

According to Mark Hofmann, however, this piece of papyrus had more than just cachet; it had real religious significance. He was offering to sell Lillywhite one of the very papyri that Joseph Smith had used in translating the Book of Abraham.

"Where did you get this, Mark?" Lillywhite thought there was a slim chance Mark might answer.

Hofmann smiled. "It's from the McLellin Collection."

A few days later, Lillywhite went to the CFS offices in the old Auerbach's building to appraise Steve Christensen's book collection. Christensen knew he would have to declare bankruptcy and was selling off his most precious asset to pay debtors. While there, Lillywhite happened to mention that Hofmann was "shopping around" important papyri from the McLellin Collection.

Christensen went white.

By October, Hugh Pinnock and Steve Christensen were close to panic. Hofmann was a month behind on a loan that was unorthodox to begin with; he had been buying and selling documents all over town, running up unknown but probably huge new debts; there were articles in the paper daily, it seemed, about the supposedly still secret McLellin Collection, some of them saying that Mark Hofmann had sold the Collection to a third party. The Mormon underground was already salivating over the juiciest rumors and, worst of all, the Collection was still "out there," somewhere in the great Mormon-bashing unknown, ready to spring any minute onto the pages of the Los Angeles Times.

And to top it off, Christensen had learned that Hofmann was peddling bits and pieces of the Collection around town.

On October 2, after weeks of bounced checks, broken appointments, and unreturned phone calls, Christensen finally tracked Hofmann down and convinced him that his only hope of salvation was to face Hugh Pinnock and make a full confession. "If you want to win your way back into Church favor," Christensen admonished him, "this is the only way." Hofmann, surprisingly contrite, agreed, and the two of them drove to Hugh Pinnock's house at 10:30 that night.

"Tell Elder Pinnock your problem," Christensen prodded, drawing on his experience as a bishop.

Throughout the "confession," Hofmann's eyes remained riveted to the floor. "I'm not going to get the million and a half for the 'Oath of a Freeman,'" he told them. Why not? "Because the Library of Congress is having problems authenticating it."

"What else, Mark?" Christensen pressed.

"I won't be able to make a donation of the McLellin Collection."

What else, Mark?

"I pledged the Collection to Al Rust as security on a loan of $150,000." And?

"And I didn't use the money to pay off the loan you arranged. I purchased other documents with it."

Anything else?

"I owe some money to a doctor."

Any other debts?

"No."

Pinnock took off his glasses in the traditional gesture of candor. He wanted to know about Mark's agreement with Al Rust. Hofmann said he was to repay $150,000 and then Rust would release the Collection. Hofmann had one key to the safe-deposit boxes where it was stashed, but two keys were required and Rust had the other one—and Rust was out of town.

Was there any money coming in?

Yes, said Mark. "The American Antiquarian Society has offered $250,000 for the 'Oath.' I'll get $150,000 from it."

Pinnock seemed to care about only two things, the McLellin Collection and the loan. Which was not unreasonable, considering that his reputation, his standing within the First Presidency, his chances for advancement, even his position in the Celestial Kingdom were on the line. He told Hofmann to use the $150,000 from the "Oath" to pay off Rust. In the meantime, Pinnock would find someone else to buy the Collection and donate it to the Church.

By the time they were finished, Hofmann looked close to tears. "What will President Hinckley think of me?" he lamented. "I just wish I was still in a position to donate the documents to the Church." To demonstrate his contrite heart, he told them about $20,000 that he had been paid that morning. A friend had the check, but he would pick it up that very same evening and deliver it to Harvey Tanner the next morning.

Christensen volunteered to go with him.

It was midnight by the time they arrived at Shannon Flynn's house. Flynn came to the door groggy but handed Hofmann the check without complaint. Using Mark's car phone, Christensen called Pinnock. "I've got the check in my pocket."

The next evening about eight, Christensen returned to Temple Square for a meeting at the First Presidency building. On his way, he stopped at a video store in the Crossroads Mall and bought a videotape of a "Miami Vice" episode—"just to get in the mood for this event," he told a friend the next day.

The event was a meeting with Church bosses to discuss "the Hofmann problem." Clearly the Church had another crisis on its hands.

The meeting opened in Pinnock's office, then moved to the office of Dallin Oaks, Pinnock's supervisor and one of the Twelve. Then all three men walked to Gordon Hinckley's office. He, after all, was the master of damage control. Hinckley was emphatic that the Church still wanted the McLellin Collection. Finally, they asked Christensen to go back to Pinnock's office and wait while they conferred.

The jury was out only ten minutes. Pinnock came back alone.

"You know, Steve," he began in his most patronizing tone, "President Hinckley paid you a great compliment. He said, 'We can totally trust that young man.'" Trust to do what?

The Church had a very special mission for Steve Christensen, Pinnock began. Mark Hofmann had demonstrated beyond a doubt that there were dozens, perhaps hundreds of documents still out there waiting to be discovered, many of which could harm the Church. There were now rumors that he had leads on the missing 116 pages, the seer stones, the Urim and Thummim, perhaps even the gold plates themselves. Such discoveries could hurt the Church in many ways. What if there was evidence that Smith had plagiarized Solomon Spaulding's romance in writing the Book of Mormon? What if Emma Smith did say, as Hofmann had indicated in his description of the McLellin Collection, that there was no First Vision? What if there was further proof of folk magic and profiteering, not just by Smith, but by his entire family?

These things were out there, the Brethren believed, and it was no longer acceptable just to leave them for the Mark Hofmanns of the world to dig up and sell to the highest bidder. The Church should be actively pursuing these bombshells itself—preventive damage control. The Brethren, especially Hinckley, believed they could no longer trust Hofmann. "We think he's too concerned with making a profit," said Pinnock. "We question his intentions. We don't think he is being totally honest with us. We are interested in finding someone who would handle these documents with the Church's concerns in mind."

Someone like Steve Christensen.

They had decided to commission Christensen to search for documents on behalf of the Church. They would extend to him a $500,000 line of credit and provide him with any services he needed. (In particular, Pinnock repeated the offer of an armored car.) This was to be a highly secret mission, said Pinnock. No one must know for obvious reasons. "You are not even to keep a private journal of your acquisition activities for the Church—that's how secret it must stay."

The next morning, October 4, the Church swung ponderously into action.

At 7:30, President Hinckley met briefly with Mark Hofmann.

Christensen may have been there too. The purpose, undoubtedly, was to remind Hofmann, in the gravest terms, of his Temple covenants.

At 9:30, Pinnock met with Dallin Oaks. The purpose of the meeting: to identify a reliable "collector" to buy the McLellin Collection and donate it to the Church. Pinnock called David E. Sorensen, a wealthy Mormon businessman who had recently sold his hospital business and was therefore "very liquid." He was serving as mission president in Nova Scotia. The two men had known each other since the 1950s. Their wives had been college roommates. Just as Pinnock had expected, Sorensen agreed immediately. If Hugh Pinnock said the money was needed, then he would provide it.

Arrangements were made on the spot. Sorensen, through his attorney, David West, would purchase the Collection from Hofmann for $185,000. He would then donate the Collection to the Church, keeping it in his possession only long enough to let the brouhaha die down and, of course, maximize the tax benefits. The sale was scheduled for the next week at David West's office, and both Hofmann and Rust were to be present.

Sorensen asked only one thing: that someone be on hand to authenticate the documents. Pinnock said he had just the man.

At 11:30, Pinnock met with Steve Christensen, who agreed to authenticate the documents at the exchange. According to the plan, he would then put the Collection in a safe-deposit box under his name. (That day, he rented two boxes at the First Interstate Bank.) At the meeting, Pinnock railed against Hofmann. Oaks and Hinckley both agreed with him, he said, that Mark was "a crook" who was trying to "rip off" the Church. Christensen gingerly suggested that perhaps it wasn't dishonesty, just hard times. "Mark has hit some financial difficulties recently," said Christensen. That would account for the lies. It wasn't exemplary, but it wasn't necessarily evil.

By the end of the day, everything was ready. Now they could only wait for Al Rust to return with his key.

51 Meanwhile, frantic, Mark Hofmann scoured Salt Lake City for money. After leaving the meeting with Hinckley, he went to Glen Rowe, who had succeeded Don Schmidt as Church archivist, and sold him a Book of Common Prayer that had been signed by Martin Harris. The price: a paltry $700 in trade. The next day, the 5th, he drove to Ken Woolley's office in Midvale. Woolley had never seen his cousin so desperate. He needed to borrow $20,000.

After their last deal, Woolley had vowed never to do business with Mark again, but Hofmann was pleading with him. This wasn't a deal, it was just a loan. And he had with him a fistful of Deseret currency to put up as collateral. These were the same notes Woolley had seen in Al Rust's book on Mormon money so he knew they were valuable. And Mark promised to pay him back within a week. Woolley wrote out the check.

From Midvale, Hofmann drove back into town to the Hotel Utah, where he met with Shannon Flynn and Wilford Cardon in a room with a spectacular view of Temple Square. Cardon had chosen today of all days to fly in from Arizona and "settle accounts." Hofmann calmly recounted his sale of the Jim Bridger notes: ten to Brent Ashworth, two to Charles Hamilton, and one at auction, for a total of $52,602. Cardon wanted his share of the profits immediately so Flynn wrote out a check for $19,034, knowing the check would bounce unless Hofmann made it good. (It bounced.)

Sunday was all quiet except for a phone call from Ken Rendell in Massachusetts. He called Brent Ashworth to say he was planning a trip West and would be seeing clients in Salt Lake City, including Hofmann. Ashworth relayed the good news to Mark.

At nine the next morning, in a three-way phone conversation, David West, David Sorensen, and Steve Christensen discussed ways in which the McLellin Collection could be kept secret. Christensen reported that Rust had not seen many of the papers in the Collection but may have seen some. All agreed that Rust was a potential problem. Christensen said he would question Hofmann for more details on the extent of Rust's knowledge.

Christensen wasn't the only one with questions for Hofmann. Brent Ashworth wanted to know what had happened to the money Mark owed him for two Missouri elder's licenses he had agreed to sell. Hofmann had called him that morning to say he had the money and would bring it by his office in Spanish Fork at eleven. Ashworth had delayed plans to drive to Salt Lake City to be there when Mark arrived.

At eleven, he called instead. "I'm tied up, but I'll be there at one, with the money."

Ashworth was sick of Hofmann's shenanigans and told him so. But he agreed to wait until one. Hofmann did show up at one—without the money. Ashworth couldn't believe it. He had waited around all morning for nothing. He struggled to contain his anger—"Don't blow the deal," he repeated to himself.

As always, Mark had an excuse: "I sold the document once, but that deal fell through. So I had to resell the document. That's why so much time has passed." Ashworth listened and promised himself—not for the first time—that he would never do business with Mark Hofmann again. All he wanted now was his money back.

"The guy I just sold it to will have the money by this evening," Hofmann said. "Can I bring the money down tomorrow morning at 10 o'clock?"

But the next morning, Hofmann had other fires to put out.

Just after eight, Robert Pitts was sitting at the conference table in Steve Christensen's office in the Judge Building. While Pitts and Christensen were talking, a man walked in and asked to speak to Christensen "privately." Without introducing him, Christensen took the man into the outer office. Their conversation was hushed but heated.

Suddenly, Pitts heard Christensen's voice, loud and agitated. "You can't hide that!" Then the conversation receded again into angry, unintelligible whispers. A few minutes later, Pitts saw the man leave "in a solemn mood," and Christensen came back into the office with a grave look on his face. Not a word was said about the strange encounter. Only later did Pitts learn that the visitor was Mark Hofmann.

Later the same morning, while Brent Ashworth waited impatiently in Spanish Fork, Hofmann met with Hugh Pinnock to review the Joseph Smith papyri that Hofmann said came from the McLellin Collection. As soon as Hofmann left the meeting, Pinnock picked up the phone and gave status reports to Sorensen, Oaks, Christensen, and, at 10:30, Gordon Hinckley. Then he met with Oaks and perhaps Hinckley to compare Hofmann's papyri with photographs of the other Book of Abraham papyri the Church had reluctantly acquired in 1967. There wasn't an Egyptologist among them, but they had to admit the two papyri looked troublingly similar.

The next task on the agenda was to solidify the Church's alliance with Christensen. The solution: the usual mutual back scratching. If Hinckley's itch was Hofmann, Steve's itch was money. He was in the process of declaring bankruptcy and struggling to get his new syndication company started. So Pinnock offered a partial bailout: he would find someone to buy Christensen's book collection and donate it to Westminster College. Christensen would get $100,000, the college would get the books, the buyer would get the deduction, and the Church would get some good P.R. and the insurance of Steve's gratitude. To throw an appropriately religious mantle over the day's dealings, Pinnock closed the meeting with Christensen by giving a "blessing of comfort" regarding his personal life and financial problems.

Mark Hofmann spent the same afternoon trying to appease Tom Wilding. He had good news and bad news, he told Wilding. The bad news was that the "Arizona deal" was not going to materialize. The good news was that an even better deal was in the works with the LDS Church. A businessman named Steve Christensen was acting as the Church's agent in a "major transaction," Hofmann said, a deal that would yield $185,000. The money was already in escrow with an attorney, David West, and would be released when the deal closed the next day, October 11.

Wilding had learned enough to be skeptical. "It must be quite a significant thing if it's going to sell for $185,000."

"Well, it's a very large collection of stuff I've collected over the years. There are several boxes, so many boxes that I have to use my van to deliver them."

Sid Jensen was also at the meeting, and he wanted to know why the Church would pay $185,000 for odds and ends, the leftovers of Hofmann's collection.

Hofmann fudged. "There's just so much of it, that I was able to obtain that much. It's worth that much."

Hofmann offered to give the Wilding group $150,000 from the deal.

"No," said Jensen, "we want the entire $185,000."

Later that evening, Kenneth Rendell's secretary, Leslie Kress, received the first of several strange phone calls at her home in Cambridge, Massachusetts. A male caller wanted Rendell's home address. "Leslie, I have a gift for Mr. Rendell, and I want to send it to his home," he said in a high voice. When she asked the caller to identify himself, he said his name was "Mr. Thornton."

Kress was immediately suspicious. She didn't know a Mr. Thornton. Why did he use her first name? How did he get her unlisted phone number? Why did he refuse to give any more information? She decided not to give out the address. Rendell had just been married and was out of town on a honeymoon. Fearing that burglars might be casing his empty house, Kress phoned the police and reported the calls.

52

The first day of Steve Christensen's Columbus Day weekend, Friday, October 11, began like every other day: looking for Mark Hofmann. He called David West, Lyn Jacobs, and a dozen other names on his list. He wanted to tell him that the meeting to transfer the McLellin Collection had been reset for Tuesday, October 15.

In fact, Hofmann was in Gordon Hinckley's office—with yet another bombshell.

Joseph Smith was the butt of many jokes during his lifetime, but none more famous than the joke played on him by three men from the town of Kinderhook, Illinois. The men cut six sheets of copper into bell shapes, inscribed them with crazy letters, corroded them with acid, then buried them with some bones in an ancient Indian mound. When they were uncovered, in the presence of several Mormons, the plates were taken to Joseph Smith, who promptly "translated" a portion of them. They were a history of the man whose bones were buried with them in the mound, Smith announced, and the man was "a descendant of Ham, through the loins of Pharaoh, king of Egypt."

Smith's "translation" was lost, but one plate was later discovered in the Chicago Historical Society Museum, mistakenly labeled "one of the gold plates of the Book of Mormon."

In Hinckley's office, Hofmann claimed to have found not only the missing Kinderhook plates, but, far more devastating, Joseph Smith's missing translation. It was in Orson Pratt's handwriting, said Hofmann, but it was dictated by Smith.

That afternoon, when Hofmann recounted the meeting to Lyn Jacobs, Jacobs was aghast. "What a smack in the face," he said. "Here's Joseph giving an inspired translation of these fake plates. Doesn't look good. The media will go mad!"

Hinckley had seen the same thing, Hofmann said. "He promised me $150,000 for it all."

"Is he going to give you cash?"

"I'll know Tuesday morning."

Later that day, Al Rust returned earlier than expected from his fishing trip to Boulder Mountain and called Steve Christensen. If at all possible, Christensen wanted to complete the McLellin transaction that day and not wait until the following Tuesday. He called Hugh Pinnock, who canceled his plans to go away for the weekend. David West was put on alert. For a few hours, it looked as if the deal might go through.

But Christensen couldn't find Mark Hofmann.

He wasn't the only one looking.

Brent Ashworth wanted his money.

"I have it," Hofmann had said again over the phone that morning.

Ashworth was blunt. "You bring it to me. I'm tired of trying to chase you down." Mark said he would be there about noon, and Ashworth told him to leave the money in the mailbox at his house if no one was home. When Ashworth returned from lunch with his family at a nearby pizza parlor, he looked in the mailbox. Nothing.

Lyn Jacobs wanted his money. He had provided the collateral for the loan from Hofmann's orthodontist client, Ralph Bailey, and felt entitled to some of the profits from the sale of the letters that Bailey had financed. In fact, he had his eye on a fabulous 1972 Jaguar that he had seen in the showroom of a local dealership. Mark said he would meet him there with $10,000 the following Monday, October 14.

Ken Woolley wanted his money. A week had passed, and Hofmann hadn't repaid the $20,000 loan and he hadn't called. Woolley phoned him to demand the money. He had learned there was no other way with Mark.

"That transaction isn't completed yet," Hofmann said. "The buyer hasn't returned to Salt Lake yet so I'm still waiting for my money."

Tom Wilding wanted his money. He had come into the office early that morning for a meeting with Hofmann, but Hofmann hadn't shown up.

He tried calling Mark on his car phone. No answer. Finally, about 11:30 Hofmann called. Wilding had only one question: "Do you have the money?"

"No, the transaction has been put off until Monday."

Wilding was out of patience. "I think you better come up and see me, Mark. We need to talk about this. You've been promising dollars for so long. We're sick and tired of what's going on."

Hofmann pleaded. "The transaction has just been put off until Monday. I have something I think will suffice for over the weekend."

When Hofmann got to Wilding's office, he laid a piece of paper on the desk. It was a letter on David West's letterhead, confirming that $185,000 had been placed in an escrow account. Below the statement signed by West was another statement, on a different typewriter, noting that the funds would be available on October 14. It was signed by Steven F. Christensen.

"You see," said Hofmann. "Everything is in order. The transaction is going to take place."

Wilding wanted to show the letter to his lawyer, John Ashton. He and Hofmann went together to Ashton's office.

"Well, I know Steve Christensen," said Ashton. "Why don't we just give him a call and verify this?"

Hofmann froze. "I don't think that's necessary. If you need to do it to verify the deal, let me do the talking while you listen." He said he was afraid that anything else might "cause some concerns and . . ." (he rolled out the big gun) ". . . possibly even stop the transaction from going through."

"Well, we'll give you a little bit of time," said Ashton, trying to screw the word little into a threat. If Hofmann didn't come through with the money, he now had a weapon to threaten him with.

"I'll have the money for you on the 14th," Hofmann vowed solemnly.

Al Rust wanted his money. On Saturday, Hofmann came into his store and announced, "We finally got the McLellin Collection settled. We've got a buyer for the Collection, but for a lot less than before. It's $185,000, and we're selling it to a man who's a mission president in Europe."

Rust had heard so many stories, he gave this latest one little credence.

But Hofmann was persistent. "Now the money will be sent immediately," he said. "It will probably be here Wednesday or Thursday. Are you going to be here Wednesday or Thursday?"

"Oh, yeah," said Rust, relaxed after the serenity of Boulder Mountain. "I'm here all week."

"I'll keep you informed. But it's definite. We will have the money."

Well, thought Rust, one way or another, it will all be settled by November 1.

Steve Christensen decided to spend the long weekend at home with his family. The months of anxiety over leaving CFS, declaring bankruptcy, and pursuing the McLellin Collection for the Church had taken a toll on his marriage. Like many wives, Terri Christensen felt that her husband didn't give her enough attention, but normally she kept her frustration out of sight. Better than anybody, she knew how Steve had suffered recently. Telling his father about the failure of CFS (and the loss of his investment) had been the hardest thing he had ever done, harder even than selling his precious book collection. At least the Church had not forced him out of his position as bishop—as he had expected they would.

But, for Terri, things were different now. She was pregnant with their fourth child, and she needed his support. She wasn't willing to look the other way when he came home and buried his head in a book.

The problems came to a head on that Friday night, October 11, when Terri demanded that they "have a talk." After a week of chasing down Mark Hofmann, talking was the last thing Christensen wanted to do. When he balked, however, Terri threatened to walk out the door. He had put her off long enough. "If you want to go off and do all those things when we need you here, okay, but you can't expect me to sit around here and wait for you," she told him flatly. When he still wouldn't listen, she made good on the threat: she walked out the door.

The gesture had stunned Steve enough that, when she returned, he was ready to talk. "You're right and I'm wrong," he apologized. "Sure I'm worried about money. I'm worried about bankruptcy, about the business. But the only thing that's important in life is you and the kids."

To show he meant it, he went out and rented three videos, one for each night of the long weekend, and every night, after the kids went to bed, they stayed up late and watched them together. And he never even reached for a book. Terri tried to remain level-headed about it but couldn't help feeling, in her bones, that this time was different. From now on, their life together would be what she had always known it could be.

If Mark Hofmann thought the holiday weekend would bring some relief from the pressure, he was wrong.

On Saturday morning, Brent Metcalfe tried to cash a $1,000 paycheck Mark had given him. He had waited for months to be paid and finally had to beg to get it, but kept telling himself he should be grateful for the job. Then the check bounced.

That night, Metcalfe set out for Hofmann's house to demand that Mark make the check good and pay him the rest of $1,700 he was owed. But his car broke down on the freeway and he had to phone his wife, Jill, to pick him up. With their daughter, Michala, the Metcalfes finally arrived at the Hofmann house on Marie Avenue only to find that Mark wasn't there. "He's with Shannon at his lawyer's office writing his will," Dorie told them. "He'll be right back."

When Metcalfe called the lawyer's office, however, no one answered.

Instead of waiting, he and Jill drove back to his stalled Ford Escort and tried, unsuccessfully, to revive it. Then they swung back by the Hofmann house one last time to see if Mark had returned. Preoccupied by the expense of repairing the Escort, Jill Metcalfe missed the turn onto 23rd East and was forced to turn around in a church parking lot half a block farther on. The lot was empty—except for one car parked all the way to one side, near some bushes. Metcalfe recognized it immediately: Mark Hofmann's Toyota MR2. Mark was sitting in the driver's seat.

Jill muttered under her breath, "This is psychic."

She pulled up next to the MR2, and Mark looked up. There was only one word for the look on his face: anguish. His eyes seemed "filled with stress," Jill thought. His forehead was creased—so strange for the baby-faced Hofmann. He looked "scary." It was definitely the look of a man who didn't want to talk, Jill thought, but Brent got out of the car and approached him fearlessly. He opened the door on the passenger side and climbed in.

Hofmann seemed startled. He took the papers he had been poring over and hastily turned them face down on the dashboard.

"Dorie mentioned that you had been working on your will," Metcalfe pointed at the papers.

Hofmann didn't respond. It was clear even to Metcalfe that he didn't want to talk about it.

"I got a death threat," he said. "There was a call about seven this morning. This voice said, 'You're gonna die. I'm gonna kill you.'"

Metcalfe didn't think to ask how this anonymous caller had been lucky enough to get Mark on the phone. Like everybody else, Metcalfe had tried dozens of times at every hour and never succeeded. It was the subject of black humor among Hofmann's associates: Mark never picked up the phone. Except this once, apparently.

Metcalf had only one thing on his mind: money. Specifically, the cost of repairing the Escort and the pay Hofmann owed him. "Come on, we're friends, Mark. I don't want to be begging for my salary. I'm working and deserve to be paid. I shouldn't have to ask all the time. Look, if this is too stressful for you, I can go out and find another job."

Metcalf could believe that Hofmann was having a cash-flow problem. Dorie was always complaining about how terrible Mark was with money. "He takes checks out of the checkbook, and I don't know how much they are," she had told him, "until it comes back in the statement. One month it's feast, and the next month it's famine. I go out and buy groceries for three months so if it's famine we'll at least have food."

Perhaps this was just one of those periods of famine, Metcalf thought. Perhaps it was his financial situation, which he always kept so close to his chest, that he was going over when they surprised him.

If Hofmann was going over his financial picture that night in the car, it was no wonder his face showed signs of stress. In the next few days, he would be expected to repay $455,155 to Wilding's group, $171,000 to First Interstate Bank, $20,000 to Shannon Flynn, $132,000 to Al Rust, $10,000 to Lyn Jacobs, $5,500 to Brent Ashworth, $170,000 to Schiller-Wapner, $109,000 to Ralph Bailey, $185,000 as a closing payment on the "marvelously livable" house in Cottonwood, and $65,000 in other miscellaneous debts, for a total of $1,322,655, plus, if he didn't pay the Wilding group by the 16th, penalties of $4,000 per day.

"If it would be easier, you know I can always go and get another job," Metcalf offered sympathetically.

Hofmann seemed insulted by the suggestion. "With the kind of money I make," he scoffed, "a thousand dollars every couple of weeks doesn't make the slightest difference. I'll get a check to you tomorrow."

Monday morning, October 14, Hofmann called Wade Lillywhite, who was vacationing at his parents' house in California. His voice was frantic and far away.

"I have to sell that papyrus fragment from the Book of Abraham. The one we talked about before. I need the money right away, and I have to get one hundred thousand for it."

"Is it from the McLellin Collection?"

"Yes."

"I'm surprised that you're selling off pieces of that Collection." Lilly-white had seen Steve Christensen's reaction when he told him about Mark's double-dealing.

"The Church is getting most of it," Hofmann explained, "but there are a couple of pieces that I'm going to sell off because I need to raise some cash right away." Lillywhite said he would make some phone calls, and Hofmann promised to call him back later that afternoon.

It may have been a holiday for Lillywhite, but Tom Wilding and John Ashton were in Wilding's office at two that afternoon waiting for Mark Hofmann to show up. He arrived about 2:45—a bad start to an already difficult meeting.

Things quickly went from bad to worse.

First, Hofmann didn't have the additional collateral he had promised. He also hadn't brought with him the deed to his house or the titles to his vehicles, as he had agreed to do. He didn't have the payment on the outstanding balance. He didn't have the legal description of the house that Ashton had asked for, or the releases from Dorie and his parents (whose names were on the deed).

All he had were a couple of small checks, one for $10,000 and one for $20,000. Wilding earmarked them for the smaller investors. There wasn't much else he could do, except make Hofmann promise to bring the legal description and releases by Ashton's house later that night so he could prepare the documents.

Mark cheerfully agreed.

After the meeting, he called California. Lillywhite said he had found one person who might be interested in the papyrus but he wanted to find out more about it.

"Never mind," said Hofmann, eerily calm. "I've found another buyer for it." He did, however, have a page from the original manuscript of the Book of Mormon that he wanted to sell for $20,000. Lillywhite told him to come by Deseret Book at three on Wednesday.

That night, Brent Metcalfe visited Hofmann to drop off John Dart's most recent article in the L.A. Times on the Oliver Cowdery history. Jill and Michala stayed in the car while Brent and Mark spent fifteen minutes at the kitchen table, ignoring the commotion of Dorie's trying to get the kids ready for bed.

Suddenly, Hofmann ended the discussion. "I hate to rush off like this," he said, reaching for a coat, "but I've got an appointment that I've got to go to." As they left the house, Hofmann saw Jill waiting in the car. He went over and leaned in the window. "Gosh, if I'd known you were here I would have invited you in. I'm sorry. I'm in a rush tonight. I've got to go."

Brent couldn't help wondering why Mark Hofmann, a man now in his thirties, still wore that silly, worn-out high school letter jacket.

The next morning, October 15, Steve Christensen slept late for the first time in months. He lingered in bed until quarter past seven—late for him—and, to Terri's delight, stayed for breakfast. He finally got off about 7:45 but stopped at the Country Cousins store, next to McDonald's (where his boys were always clamoring to go), and bought two six-packs of Tab and a bag of mini-doughnuts. Terri, who was always exhorting him to diet, wouldn't like it, but she couldn't expect him to change everything overnight.

About the same time Christensen left his house, Mark Hofmann called Brent Metcalfe. He sounded much more relaxed than the previous evening, Jill Metcalfe thought, as she handed the phone to Brent and rushed off to work. They chatted for half an hour, mostly about the L.A. Times article and the Cowdery history.

At 9:30, John Ashton was shocked to hear that Mark Hofmann had arrived. The meeting wasn't until eleven. It was heartening that he would come of his own volition, even if he only had more excuses to offer. Hofmann apologized for not dropping off the necessary papers the previous evening. He hadn't been able to get a legal description of the house yet.

Ashton got right to the point. He wanted to know if Mark would have any money for the 11 o'clock meeting. Mark said he was still working on it. "We really do have to have the funds today," Ashton insisted, "and the legal description of the house."

Parenthetically, Ashton mentioned that he had heard a report on the radio as he was driving to work, something about a bombing at the Judge Building.

"Yeah, I heard something about that too," Hofmann said, interested. "Has the name of the victim been released?"

"I haven't heard."

When Hofmann reappeared, on time again, for the 11 o'clock meeting, he was clearly upset. "Curt Bench told me that Steve Christensen was the person killed," he told Ashton. Ten minutes later, Tom Wilding came in. He, too, was surprised to see Hofmann there. He also thought it strange that at this hour he looked as if he had just showered and shaved.

"Our problem has taken a bizarre turn," Ashton told Wilding as soon as he walked in. "Have you heard on the news that there's been a bombing?"

"Yeah, I did."

"Well, Curt Bench said the person killed was Steve Christensen."

Wilding looked over at Hofmann. He was hyperventilating.

PART THREE

Lying for the Lord

Janet McDermott arrived early at the Judge Building the morning of October 15, early enough to find a parking space just a few feet from the entrance. So early, in fact, on this slow-starting Tuesday after the Columbus Day weekend, that the door was still locked and she had to punch in a combination to let herself in. So early that the big lobby chandelier hadn't been turned on yet, the store windows inside were still dark, and both elevators sat idling on the ground floor. She took one to the sixth floor.

Off the elevator, she turned right and headed down the short, ancillary hallway she shared with a new tenant in the building, Steve Christensen. As she started to unlock her door on the right side of the hall, she noticed a package, wrapped in brown paper, lying in Christensen's doorway on the left. It seemed oddly placed—not lying flat, not leaning against the door, but standing bolt upright in the doorway. She would have liked to ignore it—she had come in at this ungodly hour to get an early start on the day and this package looked like an armful. But she and Steve had agreed that whoever arrived at the office first in the mornings would pick up the other's mail. And a deal was a deal.

She walked over and bent down to pick it up. That's odd, she thought: no stamps, no UPS or Express Mail labels. Besides, it's too early for a professional delivery. It must have been left here late last night. But the cleaning people usually put packages in the office if they find them outside at night. The address wasn't typed, it was hand-lettered with a black Magic Marker in big block letters: STEVE CHRISTENSEN. Not "Steven Christensen" or "Mr. Steven Christensen," just STEVE CHRISTENSEN. "This looks personal," McDermott said to herself: cookies maybe, or a present. "Maybe I better leave it here." At this hour in the morning, nobody would disturb it. If Steve hadn't picked it up by the time she went out for her first appointment at about eight, she would take it into her office.

At 7:55, she ran down to put more change in the parking meter. When she came back, she had just enough time to make a few more phone calls and throw some things in her briefcase before setting off for her appointment. As she opened the door into the hall, she caught a trailing glimpse of Steve Christensen walking toward his office.

She was just about to say something when she saw the sign on her door: TURN ON YOUR ANSWERING MACHINE. She was always forgetting to do that. In mock exasperation, she put her briefcase down again and marched back to the desk. The door closed slowly on its own. She picked up the receiver and dialed 7 and 2, the code that would automatically connect her answering service. It was always a long, frustrating wait for the dial tone and the seven-digit number that would indicate the service had clicked in.

Then she heard a loud bang in the hall. It sounded like a rifleshot, only louder. The sound came from the hall but it ricocheted all around her. She thought something had happened in the room itself, but she didn't know what. She didn't see the nails that exploded through the door and lodged in her walls. She didn't see the nail that shattered the picture frame on her wall. She didn't see the nail that shot past her leg, grazing the skin and drawing blood, so quickly, so razorlike, that she didn't feel the wound until later. All she registered was the tremendous force of the explosion.

She ducked behind the desk and tried to tame her wild thoughts. Did the phone line explode? Were there men with rifles in the hall? Then she heard a sound in the hallway, a whimpering, like the crying of a child. Oh, my God, she thought, a little girl has been shot!

And the gunmen were still out there.

Then the phone began to beep loudly and she thought they would hear it. They would know she was in there and come after her!

Then she smelled sparks and fire. It was a fire! She grabbed her briefcase and coat and ran out the door. Down the hall, toward Christensen's office, there was nothing but dust and debris. She could see his door, but it wasn't in the right place. It had been blown off its hinges. Then she saw him. All she could see was blood: his chest, his legs, nothing but blood.

She heard the crying again. It was coming from him, only now it sounded more like the moaning of a man. She moaned herself, involuntarily. The sight of him transfixed her.

At the far end of the corridor, people had begun to come out of their offices. She yelled at them, "Get an ambulance! Someone is dying!"

Christensen's partner, Randy Rigby, wasn't sure he would make it on time to their 8 o'clock meeting that morning. Like everyone else, he had been a little slow getting started after the holiday, and then he had to make a detour to his old office at CFS to pick up some things. He would have made it easily, with five minutes to spare, if he had found a legal parking space in front of the Judge Building. But he didn't, and he had too many parking violations to chance an illegal spot. So he would be a few minutes late. Steve would understand.

Rigby had spoken to him just the night before. He knew Steve was on the verge of closing a major documents deal. "How is it going?" he had asked.

"I've been going solid until just now," Steve had said, "working on the McLellin project. It looks like it's finally gonna happen Wednesday."

And they talked about their new business venture. "Why don't we get together at eight tomorrow morning and go over things," he had suggested, "just kind of brief each other on where we're at, preparing for the future. Tomorrow looks like a pretty laid-back day."

When Rigby heard the sirens and saw the lights of the police cars, he thought it was probably a fire, but a policeman in the street told him no. Just in case, he took the stairs instead of the elevator to the sixth floor. There, amid the rubble of wall board and ceiling tile, the first thing he noticed was a can of Tab. Had the refrigerator exploded? Steve usually stopped at the convenience store in Centerville to pick up a sack of doughnuts and some pop so they could "chow down" on junk food during their morning meetings. His eating habits were atrocious. Rigby had never realized that a refrigerator could blow up.

Then he heard Janet McDermott shouting. "Steve has been hurt! Don't go down the hallway!" A policeman appeared out of nowhere and told him to move out of the way.

"I'm Steve's partner," Rigby said, suddenly feeling dizzy. "I had an 8 o'clock meeting with Steve. That's our office."

"Good God," said the cop. "What kind of business were you guys in?"

Rigby tried to get past the police to give Christensen a priesthood blessing, the Mormon last rites, but the firemen arrived and ordered everybody out of the building. They feared there might be more bombs.

In the lobby, Rigby caught up to Janet McDermott. "Is it Steve?" He had to know.

"I'm not sure."

"Is he all right?"

"I'm not sure. I heard him moan."

"How can this happen?" he said, pacing distractedly in a three-foot square. "This happens in New York, L.A., not Salt Lake City."

"Has his family been notified?" he asked a policeman.

"It will all be taken care of."

That wasn't good enough. He went to the nearby office of a friend and called Terri Christensen. There was no answer. Then he called Steve's father. "Mac, a bomb's gone off in our office, and I'm not sure if it's Steve—he's either critically injured or he could be dead."

Mac controlled himself. "Please let me know if you hear anything," he finally said and hung up.

Then Rigby called his wife to tell her he was all right.

Then he called Hugh Pinnock. Steve had been keeping Rigby informed about the McLellin Collection, and had even invited him to become a partner in the document searches the Church had commissioned him to undertake. "Hugh. You don't know me. I'm Randy Rigby, Steve Christensen's business partner. But a bomb has just gone off in our office, and Steve Christensen has either been critically injured or is dead."

There was a silence at the other end of the phone. Then, in an even voice, "I appreciate knowing that. But I'm sure you have to know that this has something to do with the CFS problem."

What a strange reaction, Rigby thought.

54 As soon as he hung up the phone with Randy Rigby, Mac Christensen burst into tears. In the middle of the store that he ran like a Prussian military school, the huge man sobbed inconsolably. When he told his son Scott the news, he refused to believe it. "I want to see the body for myself," he said.

Scott went first to the police station, then to the Judge Building, but they wouldn't let him up to the sixth floor. They said they already had positive identification. He still refused to believe it until he saw the body.

Mr. Mac called a friend to take him to Terri's house.

Terri Christensen was still in the shower when the phone started ringing. In the seventh month of her pregnancy, she found everything took longer than it used to. The first call she picked up was from a friend who had heard something about a bombing in the Judge Building. One fatality. Terri brushed it off. "Steve had a meeting somewhere this morning at eight," she explained. "He wasn't in his office. There's no need to come over. It can't be him." Besides, she had to go to the dentist.

Just to put her mind at rest, though, she called Steve's office. She heard his voice, but it was only the answering machine: "Hello. You've reached the offices of Steve Christensen. . . ." That was strange, she thought, for the machine to be on this late. So she called Randy Rigby's wife—she knew Randy was Steve's 8 o'clock appointment. Sandra Rigby answered the phone but was sobbing too hard to say anything clearly. All Terri could understand was: "It's not Steve. It's not Steve."

A sense of panic began to creep over her, but she fought it. She called Joan Christensen, Steve's mother. "I talked to Mac, and he says he's on his way home," was all she could say.

"I'm on my way there too," Terri said. "I don't want to be alone."

As she walked out the door, another friend was walking up the sidewalk, sobbing hard. She had come with a message, but was crying too hard to give it. By now, she didn't need to.

At Steve's parents' house in Bountiful, Terri sat perfectly still and quiet. She knew that if she moved or spoke a word, everything would come apart. Finally, she felt strong enough to call her parents in Montana, but they had already heard the news and were packing for the long drive to Salt Lake City. The planes were too slow for their grief.

Someone offered to get Terri's sons out of school immediately so they could be told by a family member. Someone else called her obstetrician to get some Valium for her. They were beginning to worry: she still hadn't cried. She just lay there on the couch, staring at the ceiling. "What are you feeling?" someone ventured.

"I don't want to feel," she answered. "I'm too afraid to feel." Then, to herself, "I can't have this baby alone. Why do I have to be pregnant?"

Finally, when no one expected it, she let out a terrible sound, a long, heart-stopping shriek.

Joan Christensen held out until later that evening when Don Tanner, a friend of Steve's, came to pick up his wife. He parked his car in front and walked up to the door. At that moment, Joan looked out the window and saw Tanner's dark hair and plaid shirt—the kind that Steve favored—and thought it was Steve, walking up to greet her. Then she realized her mistake. After hours of grim poise and brave optimism, Joan burst into tears and fell into the arms of her son Scott.

Tom Wilding had a different reaction to the news.

"Does this totally destroy our chances of this sale going through?" he asked.

If Hofmann thought the bombings might give him a temporary respite from his many creditors, he was badly mistaken.

Knowing that Hofmann and Christensen were friends, Wilding reminded himself to be sensitive to Mark's feelings. But as far as he was concerned, the bombing didn't change a thing. After all, he was responsible to his investors. He wanted the $185,000 that Christensen was supposed to pay Hofmann, and he wanted it now. He wasn't going to let anything, even a bombing, interfere with the transaction.

Hofmann was surprisingly cooperative. "I still think there's a good chance we can put it together. I'll just have to find a new agent to replace Steve in the deal." He said he had one in mind but didn't want to give them the name. John Ashton assumed it was Hugh Pinnock.

"Do you want to use my phone?" Wilding offered, trying not so subtly to convey a sense of undiminished urgency.

"No," said Hofmann. "I'll just use the phone in my car." He agreed to return at four, when Ashton would have ready the documents transferring Hofmann's house to HWJ, Wilding's investor group. Bombing or no bombing, they still wanted their money.

Bombing or no bombing, the Church still wanted the McLellin Collection.

But from the moment Mark Hofmann called that morning with the news of Steve Christensen's death, Hugh Pinnock knew it wasn't going to be easy. He wondered if the bombing might have been related to the Salamander Letter and, by extension, the McLellin Collection, but Hofmann didn't think so. His theory was that it was CFS-related, a theory that Pinnock passed on to a puzzled Randy Rigby when he called a few minutes later. It was a remarkable piece of guesswork on Hofmann's part—the bomb at Gary Sheets's house hadn't gone off yet.

On Hofmann's heels, David Sorensen called. David West had been waiting for Hofmann to appear with the Collection at ten when he heard the news and called Sorensen in Nova Scotia. The national media hadn't yet picked up the story. "There's been an explosion, and Steve Christensen was blown up. The news people are starting to talk about the Salamander Letter. Maybe this is related to that in some way." West and Sorensen had agreed that it probably wasn't, but Sorensen wanted some reassurance from the Church. Pinnock told him that Hofmann had called and said he was still willing to go through with the deal. The meeting was reset for ten the next morning. Relieved, Sorensen called West to give him the new time and reassure him. "Hofmann will bring in all the stuff to you tomorrow."

Even though West had heard about the Sheets bombing in the interim, and accepted it as evidence that the bombings were CFS-related, he was still uneasy. "Well, Dave, I really don't know," he told Sorensen. "I'm a little bit nervous, but okay, we'll go ahead. Except that now we've got to hire somebody—we've got to get some expert in here to really look this stuff over. I don't know who to hire." Sorensen said he would check it out, but by the time he got back to Pinnock that morning, Pinnock had left the office to speak at a funeral.

While there, Pinnock learned that the second bombing victim was Kathy Sheets, whom he had known since college. Whatever the shock, the news also had to be a relief: it proved positively that the bombings weren't documents related. He went from the funeral to the home of David Burton, Gary Sheets's stake president, to console his old frat brother. Sheets, who had heard the theory that the bombings were documents related, asked him, "What do you know about Mark Hofmann?" Without flinching, Pinnock replied, "Nothing." A few minutes later, however, Jimmy Sheets overheard him on Burton's phone trying frantically to get ahold of Hofmann.

Hofmann, in fact, had gone to the First Presidency building to find Pinnock. When Dallin Oaks found out Hofmann was in the building, he had him brought to his office. Oaks, one of the Twelve Apostles, ex-president of B.Y.U., and a former justice of the Utah Supreme Court, was a shrewd lawyer and sophisticated tactician.

He began by telling Hofmann, whom he was meeting for the first time, that Pinnock had kept him informed of the McLellan Collection and of his efforts to obtain it. In other words, he could speak freely. What he didn't say was that he, Hinckley, and Pinnock had already concluded that Hofmann was a crook, trying in some as yet unknown way to hoodwink the Church.

Hofmann said he feared the police would question him about the Collection and he wanted to know what he should say. The message was clear. If the Church wanted him to keep quiet about the Collection, he would.

But Oaks wasn't about to be drawn into Hofmann's scheme, whatever it was. "Why would the police want to question you," he asked, if the bombings are, in fact, related to CFS? "Their business activities don't have anything to do with you, do they?"

Hofmann said they didn't.

Oaks pressed. Did Hofmann have any reason to suspect that the bombings had something to do with his documents business with Christensen?

Hofmann said no.

"Do you know anyone in your documents business who would enforce his contracts with a bomb?"

"No."

"Well, then," said Oaks triumphantly, "what do you have to worry about? The police probably won't question you, and if they do, just tell them the truth."

Oaks asked if he was planning to go ahead with the closing on the McLellin Collection the next day.

Hofmann said yes.

It was a perfect cross-examination. No open questions, no unnecessary information from the witness, no unexpected bombshells. And, on Oaks's part, complete deniability. If Hofmann had admitted wrongdoing, Oaks would have been forced either to go to the police himself or become an accomplice. This way, he was covered. He wrote up his notes of the conversation and put them away. He must have sensed that they might be needed soon, even if he didn't yet know for what.

Hofmann ran into Pinnock in the Church Office Building parking lot. He told him about the meeting with Oaks and said he was flying to New York the next day to get money to pay off the loan at First Interstate Bank. "It's fortunate that the bombings were related to Steve's business," said Pinnock. By now it had become a kind of incantation. Hofmann didn't respond. He just sat in his car and stared straight ahead.

Pinnock met immediately with Oaks, then called David Sorensen, who had phoned earlier to find out who could take Christensen's place at the meeting the next morning. Pinnock gave him a list of names but his preference was Don Schmidt, the former Church archivist who was now retired and living in Provo. Sorensen relayed the name to West, and West called Schmidt. "Can I hire you to look at some documents?—we've got some historical documents." Schmidt agreed to be there at ten the next morning.

Finally, Pinnock and Oaks met with Gordon Hinckley. By now, Pinnock was distraught. Despite his best efforts, the deal for the Collection seemed to be unraveling. Christensen was dead, Sorensen was nervous, and no one knew what Mark Hofmann was up to. No one knew if he would even show up at ten the next morning.

In the meantime, Pinnock and the others told themselves again that the bombings were related to CFS, not the documents. If that's what they had to believe to keep this deal together, if that's what they had to believe to keep the police and the press away, if that's what they had to believe to ensure that the McLellin Collection would find its way into safe hands, then that's what they would believe. They had certainly believed far more improbable explanations to reap far more intangible rewards.

An hour after leaving the First Presidency building, Hofmann returned to the office of Wilding's lawyer, John Ashton, at 79 South Main Street. Ashton presented him with the documents to be signed by his parents, whose names were on the title to the house. But Hofmann wanted to do it a different way. He wanted Ashton to prepare a deed conveying the house from his parents to Mark and Dorie, then he and Dorie would sign the trust deed over to Wilding's investor group. He was willing to come back later when the revised papers were ready.

But Ashton didn't want even one more delay. He told Mark to wait while he redrafted the documents.

During the wait, Hofmann tried several times to reach Hugh Pinnock. Each time he got a secretary: "Hello. This is Mark Hofmann, and I need to talk with Elder Pinnock. It's very important. No, I don't want to leave a message. I'll call back later."

Pinnock was with Oaks in Gordon Hinckley's office trying to figure out what to do about Mark Hofmann.

"Why are you calling Pinnock?" Ashton asked after the second or third try.

"He's a good friend of mine," said Hofmann.

When the documents were ready, Ashton told Mark to get notarized signatures from his parents and from Dorie and to bring the documents back the next morning.

"No problem," said Hofmann.

When he got back into his car, he tore the documents up and threw them on the floor.

56

October 15 also happened to be the day of the closing on the house in Cottonwood. Starting at one, Connie Smith and her clients waited at the Western States Title Co. office for the Hofmanns to arrive—and waited and waited. “I can’t find Mark,” Carl Lundquist said when Smith called his office.

The seller, meanwhile, was having a fit. “Connie, we’ve had an uneasy feeling about this all along,” she huffed. “Oh, I am not impressed! I am not impressed with this.”

Finally, Lundquist called with the explanation. “The reason that Mark isn’t there is that he was supposed to have picked up $200,000 from Steve Christensen this morning. If he had been five minutes earlier, it would have worked, but Christensen was blown up and killed. Mark is somewhere in total shock, because Christensen has been killed, and because he’s convinced that the bombing was meant for him.”

“Now what?” Smith asked, cool as usual.

“Mark is flying to New York, where he will get fifty thousand, which he will put down in good faith to keep this contract together. He’ll be back on Thursday. He wants the house and he will have the money, but there will be a delay now, because the money is going to have to come from overseas and there will be a thirteen-day delay while the check is cleared. Find out if the seller is willing to wait.”

The seller said she “just wanted to forget the whole thing” but asked Smith’s advice.

“We don’t have another buyer,” Smith told her, “so let’s wait. Let’s go for it.”

Carl Lundquist called again. “We’ll have fifty thousand, if your client will close on that.”

“Fifty thousand is nothing to sneeze at,” Smith told her client. “Take it. If he doesn’t come through, that’s good wages. If it takes you a year to reclaim the house, that’s good wages for a year.”

So they reset the closing for the next day, the 16th.

Smith didn’t know whether to believe Hofmann’s story. She was too old, she told herself, not to believe crazy things.

* * *

That evening, local television stations devoted their news programs to weather, B.Y.U. sports, and the bombings. KSL, the Church-owned CBS affiliate, gave equal time to the CFS explanation and the Salamander Letter.

Jeff Simmonds, the Utah State archivist, and his wife, Jeannie, were watching the KSL newscast in their breakfast room. When it was over, Simmonds turned off the set. "Well, by God, if it is the Salamander Letter, Mark will blow up tomorrow."

Jeannie looked at him. "If he didn't do it."

Simmonds had always known that his wife loathed Hofmann. "Ah, you're crazy," he said.

Scott Christensen still had to see his brother's body. It wasn't that he held out hope that there had been some awful mistake. He just had to see for himself. So he headed for the funeral home on Haynes Street in Bountiful.

He vaguely knew two of the Rustin brothers who ran the mortuary. "Where's my brother Steve at?" Scott asked the one who answered the door. They led him to the room where Steve's body was laid out on a table covered by a translucent plastic sheet. There were no cosmetics. They hadn't yet covered the wounds, although they had sewn him back together. Scott took what meager solace he could in that. "At least he survived the blast in one piece," he told himself.

Gretchen Sheets, Kathy's daughter, had been in school when the policeman came to get her. "Gretchen," he said, "there's somebody waiting outside." But when they got outside, his story changed. "You need to come with me. There's been an accident at your house."

She begged him to tell her what had happened, but he wouldn't. So she got her books and drove with him to the police station. "Maybe they're bringing me in for a traffic ticket," she told herself, although she knew they weren't. She stared out the window of the police car and let the sense of shock slowly envelop her. She remembered the recurrent nightmare she used to have in high school. In it, her parents had died and a policeman came and got her out of school. When he told her the news, she screamed and pounded on the windows. She had written about the dream in her journal and talked about it with her friends, but after she started college, it went away. She figured it must have been just a high school dream.

At the police station, she saw her boyfriend's parents. She saw her sister's car and her father's car. Gary met her in the parking lot and told her the news. But she didn't scream or pound on the windows. She simply fell to the ground and wept. "I felt like someone had taken the bones from my body," she said later.

Jimmy Sheets, the quiet one, the athletic youngster with the straight-A report card, the apple of his mother's eye, was the one who screamed and pounded on the windows.

Later that evening, Kathy's friend, Cherie Bridge, walked over to the empty Sheets house to find a better photograph of Kathy. The one the police had, the one they had released to the press, showed her with glasses and wasn't very flattering. Kathy would have hated it. Cherie wanted the press to have a picture that did her justice.

Still later, Cherie's husband, Mike, a strong, solid, handsome man, father of seven, brought a pail of water and a brush over to the Sheets house. That afternoon, Gretchen had come back to pick up some things and had to walk past the place where it had happened, past the blackened wood and the patches of blood. Everyone agreed that someone needed to clean it up but no one felt strong enough. So they picked Mike. He was the strongest one. So he took his pail and brush and knelt down on the blackened catwalk and cleaned the stains of blood and sobbed the whole time.

After a day of trying, Brent Metcalfe reached Mark Hofmann that night.

"Wow," Mark said, "can you believe what's happening?"

"No. God. It's bad enough to kill Steve, somebody of his caliber," said Metcalfe, "but I can't understand how anybody could do that to his kids."

There was a long pause at the other end of the line.

"You've got to tell the police that you got this death threat," Metcalfe continued. This was the message he had been trying to get through to Mark all day. "If you don't tell the police, I will."

Hofmann seemed strangely puzzled. "Don't you feel like you can rest more comfortably tonight," he asked, "since it seems like this is all about Steve's business, Gary Sheets and the CFS thing?"

Metcalfe was taken aback. "Mark, don't you realize that Gary was the primary funder behind the research project on the Salamander Letter?"

Again, complete silence on the other end. "No, I didn't," he finally said, suddenly agitated. "Wow! I guess we can't rest easier."

The next morning, Wednesday, October 16, Tom Wilding waited for Mark Hofmann to call. When he didn't, Wilding called Dorie at her parents' house. She sounded distant and nervous. She didn't know where Mark was. He had driven off early that morning and, as usual, told her nothing. The best Wilding could do was leave a message for Mark to call him. For good measure, he called Bill and Lu Hofmann's house and left another message. He didn't care who knew: he wanted his money.

John Ashton, too, spent the morning waiting, waiting for Hofmann to deliver the signed papers on his house. He never did.

Hugh Pinnock couldn't find Hofmann either. When he arrived that morning, however, there was a message from Dorie. She had called at 8:15 to say that Mark "was going to see some other people" and would close the deal on the McLellin Collection at two that afternoon instead of ten that morning as originally planned. Another delay. It was a bad way to start the day.

Pinnock called David West about 9:30 to let him know that Hofmann wouldn't be there until two. That meant West would have to rearrange his afternoon appointments, even though Don Schmidt was already on his way from Provo. A thoughtful attorney, and a cautious man, West liked this deal less and less. With all the bombs going off and one of the parties already dead, he would have liked to call the whole thing off. But he called Sorensen and told him he would do whatever was necessary to get the job done. "Whatever we're gonna do," he told himself after hanging up, "let's just get it over with."

Don Schmidt arrived as promised at ten, and West asked him if he could come back at two.

"That would be okay. I'll just kind of stick around," said Schmidt, then thought to ask, "What is it that I'll be looking at?"

"Something called the McLellin Collection," said West. "Someone named Mark Hofmann has it."

Schmidt recognized that name. "Oh, yeah, I know Mark Hofmann, and I know the McLellin Collection. I'll be happy to wait around."

Schmidt returned promptly at two, and he and West adjourned to the tufted leather chairs of the conference room to wait for Hofmann to arrive with what West called "the goodies." From the picture window, they could see beyond the tall white tower of the Commercial Security Finance Building to the Temple and the Tabernacle.

And they waited. Schmidt filled the time by telling West what he knew about Hofmann. Then they waited some more. West's uneasiness returned. He wondered if perhaps there had been some mix-up on the time. After all, he hadn't spoken directly to Hofmann. He called Sorensen in Nova Scotia. "Dave, are you sure that we had an appointment at two?"

Sorensen was sure. "I thought you guys would probably have this deal all closed by now," he said.

"No. We haven't seen him. We haven't heard from anybody or gotten any calls. We're just sitting here waiting and wondering if maybe we might have gotten the wrong word or something on the appointment time."

"Well, I don't know any more about it."

But he could sure as hell find out. Like West, he had every reason to be fed up with the endless complications of a deal that had been undertaken solely as a favor for the Church. He called Hugh Pinnock, but Pinnock was out of the office, so he voiced his concerns to Dallin Oaks. Oaks turned around and called Pinnock. Just as he had the day before at Burton's house, Pinnock launched into a frantic series of phone calls in search of the elusive documents dealer. He called every number Mark had ever given him. Finally, at 2:45, he reached Dorie.

"Where is Mark?" he demanded. "Mark's supposed to be in West's office, and he isn't there. They're waiting for him impatiently." But Dorie still didn't know where he was. All she knew was that Shannon Flynn was there, at her parents' house, also looking for Mark.

Everybody, it seemed, was looking for Mark.

Within minutes of Pinnock's call, West and Schmidt heard police sirens breaking the serenity of Temple Square. West guessed immediately it was another bombing. He turned on a radio and heard a newsman saying that there had been an explosion on North Temple. Somebody had been blown up in a car.

West had a feeling he knew who it was—and that somehow the deal was off.

Driving back to his house in Bountiful, Brent Metcalfe remembered the strange conversation he had had with Hofmann the night before.

"Have you seen the drawing yet?" he had asked, referring to the police composite drawing of the bomber. Apparently several people had seen a man walking into the Judge Building early that morning with a package in his arms. They had given their descriptions to the police.

"Have you seen the drawing yet?"

Mark seemed very interested. "No, I haven't. Have you?"

"No. I was just wondering if it's come out yet."

"I don't think it's been released yet."

There was nothing strange about it, Metcalfe convinced himself. Mark seemed calm—too calm, in fact. Calmer than Metcalfe, certainly, who had packed his family up and taken them to his parents' house for the night.

Later that day, after stopping by Hofmann's house and finding it empty, Metcalfe called Tribune reporter Dawn Tracy about an AP article on the previous day's bombings that had quoted him. While they were on the phone, Tracy told him to hold: a story was coming over the wire. There had been a third bombing over by Deseret Gym. A car had blown up.

Metcalfe panicked.

"What kind of car was it?"

"It was a Toyota MR2."

"What color?"

Tracy left the line to check. A few seconds later: "It's blue."

"I've got to get right over there," Metcalfe cried and hung up the phone. He'd never driven faster than he did on the way to the Deseret Gym. He didn't think about where he was parking. He just stopped and jumped out.

When he saw the car, his knees turned to jelly. He began losing the feeling in his arms. It sat on the opposite side of the street from the gymnasium, near a low concrete wall that skirted the base of a tall luxury apartment complex—the Design Summit. The road climbed steeply on that section of 200 North, just to the west of Main Street, so the scene was laid out like a tableau on a raked stage, much easier to see from a distance. The car itself was a blackened shell, the roof mangled, the insides soaking wet from a relentless dousing by an overzealous fireman. Policemen, uniformed and ununiformed, stooped beside it, hovered over it, poked inside it, and conversed in small knots. The only thing Metcalfe could recognize was the still-blue front end, strangely untouched by the blast and fire. To the left of the wreck, in the street, he could see what looked like bloodstains. If Mark was still alive, he was lucky. Metcalfe asked a policeman and was told the ambulance had just left.

He told the policeman, "I'm Brent Metcalfe. I think I know the owner of that car."

The police already knew who he was. "We need to take you into protective custody," said a detective. "Your life is in danger."

Connie Smith heard the sirens from inside her silver BMW as it sat in a parking lot at the Triad Center, a third of a mile from the Deseret Gym. A second later, a team of KSL reporters scrambled from the building and jumped into trucks, cars, and camera vans.

When her client heard that there had been an explosion near the Deseret Gym, he jumped out of the car and hitched a ride with one of the news vans, so Smith headed toward her office in Cottonwood, eager to beat the inevitable police barricades and rubbernecking traffic jams.

When she walked into the office, a chorus of voices greeted her: "No closing tomorrow."

"What?"

"Mark Hofmann was just blown up in his car. He's not dead, but we won't be having a closing."

The next day, Carl Lundquist called and said, "Mark still wants the house. Just sit tight." No matter what the police were saying, his friend Hofmann wasn't guilty of the bombings.

The seller wasn't so sure.

When Smith asked her what they should do about the earnest money, she said firmly, "If he's guilty, I am not going to give it back."

At about three, Jeff Simmonds was in his office when both of the Utah State archive's phones rang at once. One call was from his mother, the other from a friend, both saying that KSL had just broken into its program to announce that Mark Hofmann had been blown up in a third bombing. Stunned, his staff gathered around a radio for more news. "My God," said Simmonds. "If they're blowing people up who said something about the Salamander Letter, then I'm in trouble because I have said as much as anybody in the state."

He went into his private office and called Sandra Tanner. "Have you heard the news?"

She certainly had. "I called the police and they said that Hofmann himself was the bomber and he was in the hospital."

"Do you buy that?" Simmonds certainly didn't.

"Well," said Sandra. "Just don't pick up any brown packages."

When David West heard the news that Mark Hofmann was the victim in the third bombing, he immediately called David Sorensen. "Dave," he said, the strain of the last few days obvious in his voice. "I have absolutely no idea what's going on. I really don't. But it's time you and I get out of it, whatever it is. We don't want to have any more to do with it."

Sorensen agreed. "Absolutely."

When he went home that night, West got in his car and said to himself, "This is pretty darn scary stuff." Then he gritted his teeth and turned the key.

59

After the third bombing, everyone panicked.

But no one panicked the way Hugh Pinnock panicked. No one had more to lose. In two days, his seemingly brilliant stroke to ingratiate himself with the Brethren by bringing the McLellin Collection discreetly under the Church's aegis had backfired—backfired spectacularly, backfired lethally, and, worst of all, backfired publicly. Two people were dead, one seriously injured, and the Collection was still out there. There had always been a danger that it would fall into enemy hands (i.e., public hands), now there was a virtual certainty. With police and press snooping around in the affairs of Christensen and Hofmann, it was only a matter of days, perhaps hours, before the details of the transaction, the Church's involvement, and Hugh Pinnock's involvement showed up on the evening news. And that, more than the deaths, would be the end of Hugh Pinnock in the LDS Church.

"Poor Hugh," Gary Sheets later lamented. "If it hadn't been for all this, he would have become an Apostle."

And Pinnock wasn't the only one whose position in the Celestial Kingdom was on the line. Everybody, from Hinckley on down, who had been involved with Hofmann remembered what happened to Henry D. Moyle.

Soon after Moyle was brought into the First Presidency as a counselor by David McKay in McKay's dotage, he began to think he ran the show. As McKay floated in and out of senility, and in and out of hospitals, "Money Man" Moyle took more and more of the Prophet's authority to himself. He decided, for instance, to build the giant twenty-eight-story Church Office Building. The Twelve opposed the idea, but Moyle went ahead with it anyway, and with other controversial projects as well.

Needless to say, the Twelve found such behavior unsuitable. Moyle hadn't come up through the ranks; he hadn't paid his dues in some remote, thankless outpost like the Bolivian mission. And here he was, telling the Council of the Twelve what to do. Eventually, when they couldn't take it any longer, they torpedoed him. Not publicly, of course. They didn't even announce his demotion in the Church News. Citing his health problems, they simply yanked McKay's authority, and with it, Moyle's. When they signed the checks, nothing else mattered. Stunned, Moyle slipped off to Florida for an "extended vacation" and obligingly died.

It was a sobering lesson, even for someone as powerful as Gordon Hinckley, who was on the Council when Moyle met his end. "You have no idea what it means to have that kind of position taken away from you," says a Church insider. "In the Mormon Church, a man's righteousness is inextricably tied to his rank in the Church. The higher up you are, the more righteous you are, the closer you are to God. If, all of a sudden, your position is taken away, it's worse than a demotion in any corporation, it's worse than a demotion in the Soviet Union—because they don't believe in God. They just have to worry about getting shot. In the Mormon Church, it means your eternal life is affected."

It must have been fear for his eternal life that prompted Pinnock to tell Gary Sheets that he knew nothing about Mark Hofmann. And it must have been the same fear that brought him to Steve Christensen's house the day after the bombings. He told Terri that he had come to "collect" Steve's confidential papers on the McLellin Collection. After all, the transaction was a "private matter," and therefore all materials relating to it should be kept under "Church control."

And it must have been his eternal life that was on his mind when Police Detective Don Bell interviewed him at 1:12 in the afternoon on October 17, the day after the bomb exploded in Hofmann's car.

"Elder Pinnock, this is the deal," Bell began, notebook in hand. "This is a homicide investigation. Do you know Mr. Hofmann?"

Pinnock paused and reflected a moment. "No, I don't believe I do."

60

Don Bell, a sixteen-year veteran of the Salt Lake City Police Department, was already in a bad mood. When it was decided that Pinnock had to be interviewed, one of the Mormon officers in the department had suggested that it be done with kid gloves. "These people are different," he said. "We have to treat them differently." Bell shot back, "This is a homicide investigation. We have people to talk to, we talk to them. We don't care if they're presidents of corporations, we don't care if they're ditch diggers." By itself, that exchange was enough to set him on edge. Then he called Pinnock's secretary.

"I'm sorry. Elder Pinnock's in the Temple."

"How long will he be there?"

"I don't know. Who is calling?"

"This is who is calling. I need to talk to him." The suggestion that Pinnock be given deferential treatment had riled him.

"Is there anything we can do for you?"

"No, there isn't. I need to talk to him."

Five minutes later, Bell's phone rang. But it wasn't Pinnock, it was Martell Bird, the head of Church Security. "Why don't you give me the message for Elder Pinnock," he suggested.

Bell was really feeling the fire now. "Because I don't want to give you the message. It has nothing to do with you. I want to talk to him. I can fit it around his schedule, if necessary. I'm sure he's busy. So am I. But I need to talk to him. If we have to do it at night, that's all right." He paused. Clearly, this guy needed a shove. "Maybe the easiest thing to do is to get an investigative subpoena and have it served."

He could hear Bird jump on the other end of the line. "Hold on! We don't need to do that."

Twenty minutes later, Pinnock called. "I have the whole afternoon free," he said in his most unctuous voice. "I can see you any time you want."

"How about right now?"

"Beautiful."

(As Bell drove over to the First Presidency building, a delegation from Church Security, headed by Martell Bird, was paying a visit to Bell's superior, Police Chief Bud Willoughby, to let him know what they thought of Detective Don Bell's manners.)

Bell already knew from an interview at the First Interstate Bank that Pinnock had arranged a loan for Mark Hofmann. Now Pinnock claimed he didn't know Hofmann. Bell choked back his astonishment and tried again. "Do you know anything about the McLellin Collection and this man who was trying to sell it?"

"Well, wait a minute," said Pinnock, apparently catching the look on Bell's face. "I think I do."

Somebody was lying, thought Bell, either the people at First Interstate Bank or Hugh Pinnock. Bell laid bets it was Pinnock. Down at the Metropolitan Hall of Justice, that bet would have been worth a lot. In sixteen years as a policeman, Bell had earned a reputation as one of the best, if not the best interviewer, in the department. It was Bell who had cracked Arthur Gary Bishop, extracting, within twenty-four hours, confessions to a wave of murders of young boys that had paralyzed the city. As an interviewer, he was a legend. He certainly knew when he was being fed a line.

"The McLellin Collection?" Pinnock fumbled with the pronunciation and mused another moment. "I think I remember something about that. There was a guy who came here. Now, I know nothing about him myself, but I remember that some guy came in and said something about a collection. And I remember having to get up and walk down the hall and go into Elder Oaks's office. And I asked Elder Oaks, 'Are we interested in a "McLellin Collection" or some kind of collection?' And he said, 'No. We're not buying anything. If the guy wants to donate something, that's fine.' And I came back and told the guy, 'If you want to donate something, that's fine.'"

Bell could hardly contain himself. Lies, especially when they came in great clumps like this, could be very entertaining. "You know," he said, "we have some information that Mr. Hofmann met with President Hinckley."

Pinnock leaned back in his chair, put his feet up on the desk, and brought his hands together in prayer position. "You have to understand something," he began, summoning up all of the sanctimonious sonorities of his most patronizing tone. "People come into this building all the time. Then they leave this building, and they go and they talk to their friends. And they say, 'We've been down there visiting the First Presidency of the Church.' Or, 'We've been visiting President Hinckley.'"

"This is sort of what my job is. You see, the First Presidency of the Church doesn't have the time to just listen to people who come in off the street. So they steer the people in to me and I listen to their concerns, and I'm nice to them. Then, when they leave the building, they often go say they've been meeting with President Hinckley or something. Nine times out of ten, they've just seen somebody low down on the totempole like me."

Bell had been raised a Mormon, so he knew that was true. Not just anybody could walk into the offices of the First Presidency. Perhaps Hofmann had been bragging about the visits with Hinckley. But First Interstate wasn't bragging about the $185,000 loan. Bell had held the loan application in his own hands. There was no doubt in Bell's mind: Hofmann was lying, but so was Hugh Pinnock.

"I'm afraid that's about it," Pinnock concluded. "I wish I could give you more help. But I'm sure President Hinckley has never met this man. The whole situation is very sad. Isn't it awful? In fact, I did know Steve Christensen slightly. I was friends with Gary Sheets in college, and, of course, I know Mr. Mac."

Bell pursued the subject of Steve Christensen. Pinnock said that Steve had been involved in arranging a donation of "some documents" to the Church just before his death. The donor was a private collector in Canada, and Steve was supposed to authenticate the documents.

"What kind of documents?" Bell pressed.

"Oh, some letters from Joseph Smith, something like that. Al Rust of Rust's Coin Store was somehow involved. I believe he had put up some money on some of the documents. The documents were supposed to have been donated the day Steve was killed."

Bell knew backtracking when he heard it. Pinnock had apparently figured out that Bell was likely to uncover something about the transaction. Then he backtracked on Mark Hofmann.

"You know, that Mark Hofmann you mentioned? I think I now remember that on the 15th, his wife called my secretary and left a message saying he wanted to see me that afternoon to talk about some document collections. But we never had the appointment. There was no need to.

After all, the Church wasn't interested in any collections." He was weaving an increasingly tangled web.

On his way to his car, Bell didn't doubt for a moment that he had been lied to. He only wanted to know why. Back at the department, he told a group of fellow officers about his conversation with Pinnock and other Church officials. "We've got some real problems," he said. "They're obviously stonewalling us. They're lying to us. I don't know what it is, but they're hiding something." Suddenly, one of the assistant chiefs, known to be a devout Mormon, slammed his hand down on his desk as hard as he could and leaped out of his chair. "I'm getting damned sick and tired of hearing they. 'They this, they that.' Just who the hell is they?" And he continued to rant until someone took him aside and calmed him down. Everyone knew what his problem was—just as everyone knew who "they" was.

The minute Detective Bell left his office, Hugh Pinnock contacted the nearest lawyer, Dallin Oaks. It was only then that he found out Oaks had already spoken to Shannon Flynn.

61 Sometime before eleven that morning, Flynn had come looking for Hinckley. "I'm going over right now and talk to President Hinckley," he told Lyn Jacobs, who happened to be in the Church Office Building. The police wanted to interview him and, with Hofmann in the hospital, he needed some guidance. What better place to look than Gordon Hinckley? That's what Mark would have done. "He's got to get involved in this," said Flynn. "I mean he knows he's involved—and, of course, I'm involved." Jacobs thought Flynn sounded more excited than worried.

About the same time, Detective Don Bell began to wonder why Flynn hadn't shown up for his 10 o'clock interview. Bell called the number Flynn had given him at his father-in-law's. Flynn wasn't there. Bell again sensed that he was being avoided. "You tell him that if I don't hear from him by noon, I'll have a warrant for him. These are homicide cases, you know."

Twenty minutes later the phone rang. It was Martell Bird. "I understand that you are looking for Shannon Flynn." For a moment, Bell thought the Church had tapped his phone.

"Yes, I am."

"Well, he's over here."

"He's over where?"

"He's over here talking to some officials of the Church."

That was curious, thought Bell—talking to Church officials before he talked to the police. "That's fine, but he had an appointment with me at ten. As I told his father-in-law, by noon I'll have a warrant for him."

"I thought you would understand."

"Understand what?"

"He's here talking to Elder Oaks."

After the events of the last few days, Shannon Flynn must have been the last person Gordon Hinckley wanted to see—next to Mark Hofmann. But it would have been too risky to turn him away. What would he tell the police? How much had Hofmann told him? The mere fact that he was showing up on Hinckley's doorstep meant he knew too much to be dismissed. For all these reasons, presumably, he was sent for cross-examination to the lawyer on staff, Dallin Oaks.

Justice Oaks was in impeccable form. He called in two men from Church Security to act as witnesses—and for protection, if necessary—and a stenographer to record every word of the conversation. Shannon Flynn, soldier of fortune, was considerably out of his depth.

"Are you a member of the Church?" Oaks began. It was a standard opening that Hinckley also used to invoke the authority of his office.

Flynn said he was, then spilled his story. He told Oaks that he and Hofmann were partners, that the police had found a check in his name endorsed over to Mark and now they were on his trail. They wanted to interview him, and he needed to know "what posture to take." He was particularly concerned that they might ask him about the fishy $185,000 loan from First Interstate Bank. "I know Mark's position," he said, "and I know there is no way he could get a loan for that amount."

"Do you know anything about why he got that loan?" asked Oaks. Since Oaks knew exactly why Hofmann got that loan, he must have wanted to see how much Flynn knew. Just exactly what was the Church's exposure?

"He needed those funds to get the McLellan Collection," Flynn answered. He knew that much. He had flown with Hofmann to Arizona in his unsuccessful bid to solicit funds from Wilford Cardon.

"Have you seen the McLellin Collection firsthand?" This had to be Oaks's first concern. Along with Pinnock, he had taken responsibility for bringing the Collection into the Church, and it was still out there.

Like everybody else, Flynn had seen only bits of the Collection, but he knew President Hinckley was very interested in it. Hofmann had spoken to Hinckley long distance about it recently, and twice discussed it with Francis Gibbons, Hinckley's secretary. "[Mark] told me President Hinckley had arranged the loan for him at the First Interstate Bank," Flynn added helpfully. He used Hinckley's name with stunning nonchalance. What would the police think?

Oaks broke in. "What was your relationship to him?"

Flynn explained they were "partners"—"not in business but in specifics."

"Are you partners in the McLellin Collection?" Now Oaks was revealing too much. "I am an interested bystander," he added cautiously.

"No. He came to me and told me that President Hinckley was nervous to have it." Flynn was losing what little cool he'd come in with.

"But where was the McLellin Collection?" Oaks demanded. It was clearly the only question on his mind.

Flynn said it was in a safe-deposit box in Texas, but Hofmann couldn't get at it until the money was paid. He had expected to be able to pay it off with the sale of another document, but at the last minute, that deal had gone sour and Mark was caught short of cash.

"The Library of Congress deal?" Oaks volunteered. For an interested bystander, he was extraordinarily well informed.

"Yes." The sale had gone through, Flynn explained, but some of the money was held up. That was why Mark had gone to see Hinckley. "President Hinckley wanted to get that Collection," he repeated. "President Hinckley arranged for a ninety-day loan from the bank." The plan was for Mark to pay for the Collection and then donate it to the Church.

How did Flynn know all this?

He had been with Hofmann when he went to Hinckley's office to ask for the loan. "I waited outside in his car. At 11:00 A.M. he went to the bank. The loan had been arranged for." In an attempt to clarify his dilemma, Flynn added, "Several banking regulations had been broken in making that loan."

Oaks jumped on that. "That is your judgment," he said quickly. This was the first mention of illegal activity. All of a sudden, Oaks's decision to have a stenographer present for this interview seemed very wise. If, horror of horrors, Flynn's allegations later proved to be true, Oaks would need to protect himself on the record from accusations of a cover-up.

Flynn only made it worse. "Obviously [the banker] was persuaded by President Hinckley."

"Did [Mark] say 'President Hinckley'?"

"Yes."

Oaks was still mulling over the last response. Undoubtedly, he had hoped that Flynn knew nothing about the loan. It was, after all, the Church's only real, legal vulnerability. Everything else could be explained away with the usual all-purpose denials ("the Church didn't buy the documents, etc."). Now it turned out that Flynn did know about the loan, but he knew only this cockeyed version of the story that Hofmann had fed him, a version that deeply implicated Gordon Hinckley. To correct him would be to reveal Oaks's own knowledge. He needed to find out just how cockeyed Hofmann's version was.

"Was anyone else's name mentioned in connection with obtaining this loan?"

"No."

Oaks had to be relieved. In his self-importance, Mark had failed to mention the real middleman, Hugh Pinnock. Now Oaks knew everything he needed to know. He looked at Flynn with a benign smile. "How can we be of help to you?"

"I want to find out what posture I need to take. The whole room is falling down."

Oaks was too smart to touch that question. The last thing he needed was for this overweight, overeager errand boy to go to the police and, under hard questioning, say, "Elder Oaks told me to tell you. . . ." Besides, there was nothing in his story that could hurt the Church. The allegations about Gordon Hinckley's role in the loan transaction could be easily and truthfully denied.

With the Church's deniability ensured, Oaks leaned back in his chair with a look of gravity and sincerity, and with the stenographer scribbling busily in the background, dictated a press release through Shannon Flynn, knowing that if Flynn didn't relay his words to the police, Oaks would.

"The Church is going to cooperate fully, and it has absolutely nothing to hide. Sometimes there are some confidential transactions but this is a murder investigation. Confidentiality is set aside. We will cooperate fully. You will not do anything favorable by assuming that you need to cover up."

There was one other point Oaks wanted to make, a point about Gordon

Hinckley—although he avoided alerting Flynn to the manipulation at work by mentioning the name. He said to be careful, when talking to the police, to distinguish between “what you know and what someone told you. I would urge you not to say, ‘I know this,’ when all you know is what he told you. Do you understand?”

Flynn nodded.

“You are a member of the Church,” Oaks continued in his best hypnotic, Sunday-school drone. “The Church has nothing to hide in this transaction. . . . We have great concern for the lives that have been lost.”

Flynn nodded again. It was no longer a dialogue—if it ever was.

“I am not going to talk to the newspapers,” Oaks added, suggestively. “The less said to the newspapers the better. People read the papers and get their whole ideas from the newspapers.”

Finally, one last reminder, “Be sure to say what you were told,” and then the meeting was over. Flynn later said it seemed like “centuries.” It had been less than twenty minutes.

Soon after Flynn left Oaks’s office to confront the police, Hugh Pinnock called, still shaking from his interview with Detective Bell.

62 Pinnock hadn’t just lied, he had lied in easily disproved ways; he hadn’t just obfuscated, he had obfuscated clumsily; he had contradicted himself and raised more questions than he answered. But worst of all, he had violated the prime directive. In his panic, he seemed more interested in protecting himself than in protecting the Church.

Not all was lost, however. The FBI agents who had interviewed Oaks the day before were coming to see Pinnock later that day. Pinnock didn’t have to make the same mistakes a second time.

And he didn’t. By the time the two special agents arrived, Pinnock was ready for them. Not with the whole truth, by any means, but with considerably more of it than he had given Detective Bell. He not only acknowledged knowing Hofmann, he detailed most of their dealings, including the loan from First Interstate Bank. He knew how to pronounce “McLellin.” He even gave them David Sorensen’s name.

But if the details were scrupulously correct, the overall picture was vastly misleading. The Church's role in the whole affair was really a minor one, Pinnock underscored. The transaction was really between Hofmann, Christensen, and Sorensen. The Church was merely (as Oaks had told the FBI in his interview) "an interested bystander." Christensen had kept Pinnock informed from time to time of progress on the sale, but his only substantive role in the deal had been finding Sorensen, whom he portrayed as a collector genuinely interested in the McLellin Collection who might, at some point in the future, donate the Collection to the Church. Which suited the Church just fine, said Pinnock, because (and he stressed this point) the Collection is "not really that significant of an item of interest for the Church."

The other thing missing from Pinnock's account—and from Oaks's account the previous day—was the name Gordon Hinckley.

This, it seems, was to be the strategy: first, the Church was merely a bystander in the deal; second, the Church didn't care about the documents; and third, Gordon Hinckley had nothing to do with it.

Someone with a sharp legal mind must have cautioned Pinnock that all of his records would be subject to subpoena, because from that time on, his journal entries took a curious turn. The conversation with Oaks itself was described not as a frantic exercise in damage control but as a friendly chat in which Pinnock expressed "concern for the safety of his wife and kids" and complained about not being able to sleep at night. The next day, he noted in his journal: "All we know is in the newspaper." And later: "Why don't we know more about what's going on?" And later: "We're saying everything we know."

The strategy worked for a day or two. Caught up in the drama of the bombings and the immediate aftermath, the papers made no mention of the Church or the McLellin Collection. Then on Thursday, the 17th, the news of Oaks's meeting with Hofmann on the day of the Christensen and Sheets bombings hit the front page of the Salt Lake Tribune. By the next day, the Tribune had wind of the Church's interest in the McLellin Collection and was speculating that it might provide the key to the motive for the bombings.

The Church did what it could to keep a lid on the speculation. Over at the Church-owned Deseret News, there was a determined effort to keep the public's attention off the McLellin Collection and the Church's pursuit of it. POLICE FOCUS ON EVIDENCE, NOT THEORIES, headlined the October 18 issue.

Theories abound on killings. . . . Theories of conspiracy, elaborate forgeries and hundred-thousand dollar payoffs may make interesting reading, but police say they are more interested in solving two murders.

It didn't take the media long to put two and two together. If the Church was pursuing the McLellin Collection and Hofmann was selling it, then Oaks and Hofmann must have met to do business. According to the Tribune: "Hofmann was attempting to sell documents, described as the M'Lellin Papers, to various clients, including the hierarchy of the Mormon Church." Reporters were calling Church officials up and down the echelons asking about meetings with Hofmann, Flynn, and Al Rust. Some even wanted to know if it was true that Hofmann had access to President Hinckley.

On Saturday, the Church released an official statement admitting what was already common knowledge: Hofmann had contacted Church officials to propose that he give or sell them historical documents or artifacts, including the William McLellin Collection. But it was too little too late. After the revelations about the Salamander Letter and the backtracking on the Stowell letter, the Church had used up its credibility with the press. The story was out of control. On Sunday, on the front page of the Tribune, Dawn Tracy reported the unthinkable. "Complex business dealings of a document dealer accused of killing two people reach into the office of LDS Church President Gordon B. Hinckley."

Then, on Monday morning, Hugh Pinnock woke up to a nightmare.

A member of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints secured a $185,000 loan for bombing suspect Mark W. Hofmann, who sources say may have used the money to purchase the missing Mormon McLellin Papers.

The article in the Tribune named "Elder Hugh W. Pinnock." It also repeated the accusation that Hofmann did "regular business with President Gordon B. Hinckley," and reported for the first time Hofmann's meeting with Pinnock in the Church Office Building parking lot the morning after Christensen was killed.

Pinnock had had some warning. After checking the story with several sources, Tribune reporter Mike Carter had called him and asked him to confirm it. Pinnock was dumbstruck. "Oh, gee, well. Yeah, gee, I don't think I can talk about that."

But Carter pressed ahead. "I am writing this story, and I'd really appreciate it if you'd clear up any misconceptions that I have." He read the first few paragraphs. When he stopped, there was a moment of utter silence on the line. Finally, Pinnock said, "I can't talk to you."

The Tribune ran the story in the first edition.

Before the second edition went to press, Pinnock managed to formulate a new response. He called Carter back: The loan in question "was not out of the ordinary," he insisted. And the reports that the Church was planning to buy the McLellin Collection were "completely false . . . the purest of fabrication."

Later that day, Pinnock issued a terse, two-page statement to drive home the key points. It was a model of deft, legalistic, and impeccably truthful distortion. Alluding to the night on which Steve Christensen and Mark Hofmann came to his house and retrieved a $20,000 check from Shannon Flynn, which was then used to pay down the loan (the same night Christensen called Pinnock from Hofmann's car phone to assure him "the check is in my pocket"), Pinnock simply noted, "I have been informed that several weeks ago Mr. Hofmann brought the interest on the loan up to date and made a partial payment to First Interstate Bank."

In accordance with what appeared to be the Church's emerging grand strategy, Pinnock emphasized that he was not acting on behalf of the Church, that Christensen had come to him "because of the career I had had in business before being called as a General Authority," and that the Church itself had no interest in the McLellin Collection. No mention at all was made of David Sorensen or the Church's second, more recent effort to acquire the Collection.

The statement also included the bizarre observation: "I have found Mr. Christensen to be honorable and open in all dealings"—as though Steve Christensen's reputation was somehow in question. "Our thoughts and prayers have been with the families of all affected parties," he concluded, "and we pray the Lord's protecting hand will be with them."

If Pinnock thought that would satisfy the press, he was woefully mistaken. The next day, his name appeared in the New York Times, and the day after that, Al Rust came forward to say that Mark Hofmann had told him that the Church had bought the McLellin Collection months ago.

The Church, of course, denied it, but the Church had denied having sensitive documents before and been caught red-handed. Was this just another Josiah Stowell letter? Another damaging piece of history that the Church was trying to deep-six in The Vault? Did Steve Christensen and Mark Hofmann know that? Is that why they were blown up?

The rumors flew like shrapnel. Like it or not, the Church was now in the middle of a murder investigation—up to its clerical neck.

63 Unprecedented problems called for unprecedented solutions. On Wednesday, October 23, the Church called a press conference to “tell all” about its dealings with Mark Hofmann and Steve Christensen, and to put an end, once and forever, to the scurrilous rumors.

This wasn’t just any press conference. On the elevated stage, usually occupied by some obscure spokesman from the Church Office of Communications belaboring the obvious to the oblivious, sat three senior officials of the LDS Church: Hugh Pinnoch, a member of the First Quorum of the Seventy; Dallin Oaks, a member of the Council of the Twelve Apostles, and Gordon Hinckley himself, second counselor in the First Presidency and, as everyone in the room knew well, the most powerful man in the Church.

The event was impeccably stage-managed. The three officials sat behind a conference table overlooking the small, carefully chosen audience in the 350-seat auditorium in the Church Office Building. Television cameras and lights filled the back of the room. The “ground rules” were announced: like a televised presidential news conference, reporters would be allowed only one question and one follow-up. Mike Carter, who broke the loan story, remembers, “The reporters were a little nervous. The intimidation factor was definitely there. These guys up there weren’t just people, they were prophets of God, and on a first-name basis with the Lord, at least.”

That was the message: the Church wasn’t obliged to give a press conference, it wasn’t badgered into giving a press conference. This was a favor, granted to the media in the spirit of noblesse oblige.

To underscore that this controversy was a mere blip in the great ongoing work of the Church, it was scheduled to begin only one hour before the dedication of the Church’s new Genealogy Building, an event at which the Church leaders were required to be present. One hour minus the twenty minutes needed to walk to the dedication, minus twenty minutes for opening statements, that would leave about twenty minutes—no more—for questions. Lest reporters forget, Richard P. Lindsay, Director of Public Communications for the Church, opened the press conference by reminding them: “We will try to stay carefully on schedule.”

Hinckley began with expressions of sympathy to the “families and associates of those who have been victims of the bombings in our community. That such tragedies could occur here is beyond our comprehension.”

Then he came out swinging.

In defense of the Church’s efforts to procure documents, Hinckley said, God told us to do it. “The Church’s interest in documents and artifacts pertaining to its history was mandated through revelation.” It was an explanation worthy of Joseph Smith. As for the Church’s methods in acquiring documents, Hinckley insisted that they had “followed the normal, accepted, and professional procedures employed by collectors generally.”

As for the accusations that the Church was hiding documents, Hinckley claimed that he personally had made the decision to make sensitive documents public. He cited two in particular, the Salamander Letter and the Josiah Stowell letter, that he had voluntarily released to the press. There was no mention of the fact that both documents were made public only after they had leaked or that one had been kept secret from the Church’s own archivist for two years.

As for Steve Christensen, Hinckley didn’t really know him. “While I had received a letter earlier indicating Mr. Christensen’s desire to donate the document to the Church after research on it had been completed, I have no recollection nor any record of his ever having been in my office until the day he presented it to the Church. Nor has he been in my office since then.”

As for Mark Hofmann, Hinckley didn’t really know him either. And the meetings with Hofmann? “Many people come to see me,” said Hinckley, suddenly expansive, echoing Hugh Pinnock’s sermon to Detective Bell. “Many from many areas across the world, about scores of matters. I have tried to maintain a reasonable open-door policy and have met and talked with many hundreds, if not thousands.” Hofmann was just one among the faceless masses.

And what about the rumors that he met with Hofmann only days before the bombing? Hinckley said that Hofmann had come to discuss “the so-called Kinderhook plates”—the bogus plates that Joseph Smith was fooled into “translating”—but Hinckley’s “recollection of this episode of history was dim.”

“That concludes my statement,” said Hinckley, with emphasis on the word concludes.

Dallin Oaks was next.

“I welcome this opportunity to share what I know about what appeared to be a normal, though confidential, commercial transaction.”

Oaks went immediately on the offensive. “With the benefit of hindsight, and in the feverish context of a murder investigation, and in the glare and innuendo of publicity accompanying the recent investigations, a normal though confidential proposed commercial transaction has been made to appear sinister and underhanded. My own contact with it has been seen as mysterious and questionable. I therefore welcome the opportunity to set the public record straight.”

Oaks apparently wanted to convey two messages to the assembled reporters: one, the Church had done nothing improper; and two, Dallin Oaks was a very wise man indeed.

As for the McLellin Collection, Oaks insisted that he had made it clear from the beginning that the Church shouldn’t be involved even indirectly in the acquisition of the McLellin Collection and had “so advised Elder Pinnock.” When asked if the Church would be interested in receiving the Collection as a gift, Oaks had informed Pinnock “that the Church probably would at some future date, but in that event it had to be a genuine gift from a real donor.”

Nor, according to Oaks, did the Church seek out collectors to buy the Collection, although it may have “brought the Collection’s availability to their attention.” In fact, by Oaks’s telling, the suggestion of a donation came as a complete surprise to the Church, and his response, when asked if the Church would be willing to accept it, was a disinterested “I suppose so.” (Missing from both Hinckley’s and Oaks’s accounts was the fact that Sorensen wasn’t a collector at all, and never would have bought the Collection if the Church hadn’t approached him.)

As for the loan arranged by Pinnock, Oaks again took pains to exculpate the Church and congratulate himself. “I said I saw no harm in that, provided it was clearly understood by all parties that the Church was not a party or a guarantor and that Hugh Pinnock was not a party or a guarantor to such a loan.”

As for his meeting with Hofmann, Oaks was willing to breach the wall of confidentiality that normally protects “a conversation between a General Authority and a member of the Church,” and read the unfaultable instructions he had given Hofmann in their meeting: "Hofmann came to my office and said he thought the police would question him. What should he say when they questioned him? And I said, 'You should simply tell them the truth.'"

Hugh Pinnock was next. Except Hugh Pinnock had nothing to say. Elder Pinnock has already issued his statement, said Richard Lindsay, and copies were available.

Hinckley and Oaks had decided, apparently, that Hugh Pinnock had already said more than enough.

Finally came the questions—barely fifteen minutes' worth.

Dawn Tracy of the Tribune wanted to know why Don Schmidt, the Church archivist, wasn't informed when the Church purchased the Josiah Stowell letter? And why didn't Dean Jessee, the foremost authority on Joseph Smith's handwriting, find out about the letter until after it was acquired? In other words, who exactly did authenticate that letter? This was a direct challenge to Hinckley's statement that the Church had followed "normal, accepted, and professional procedures" in all its document dealings. A hush fell over the room.

"I don't know why Don Schmidt wasn't advised," said Hinckley good-naturedly. "The head of the Historical Department knew about it." The head of the Historical Department, G. Homer Durham, had brought the Stowell letter directly to Hinckley. Contrary to Hinckley's implication, it was he, not Durham, who had ordered the letter kept secret.

Next question.

A young reporter mumbled his name and identified himself as KBYU News. That was all the Brethren needed to hear. This had to be a slow pitch, a B.Y.U. journalism student, all eagerness and deference, who probably knew nothing about the case. What could be safer?

"This is to President Hinckley. A few months ago the L.A. Times did an article on the Cowdery papers, and John Dart, who was the author, had a 'Deep Throat' source that said someone had access to the First Presidency vault. I was wondering if you could tell us who that person was and if it was Mark Hofmann."

It was a fast-inside curve ball. Oaks and Hinckley shifted in their chairs, obviously wondering who had let this rogue into the room.

On the spot, the best Hinckley could come up with was a clumsy obfuscation. "I'd like to know if someone has access to the First Presidency's vault," he said. "I don't have. Except through the one man who has the combination. I couldn't get in there if I wanted to without one individual who has the combination to go into that vault letting me go in there." What he didn't say was that the one man who had the combination was one of his subordinates, and all he had to do was instruct the individual to let him in.

This was not the way it was supposed to go. Oaks went from cocky to testy.

When Rodd Arquette of KUTV asked, "Do you believe that the McLellin papers exist at all, and if so, are you still interested in purchasing them?" Oaks commandeered the mike.

"Your question assumes that the Church is interested in purchasing them, and I stated flatly the Church is not. Would you like to rephrase your questions?"

"Do you believe they exist?"

"What I believe about the existence or nonexistence of the McLellin Collection is really quite beside the point."

Arquette picked an easier target. "Elder Pinnock, do you feel it is proper for a high-ranking official of the LDS Church to help secure a loan for any member of the Church, as has been reported that you did so for one Mark Hofmann?"

Pinnock smiled nervously. "When they came in that Friday afternoon, and when at that time I called two banks, I had not thought it improper. I was calling on what I thought was a legitimate transaction. I will say that there comes into our offices many people asking questions, but we would certainly not use our office for a favor for someone that was inappropriate." His grammar, like his poise, was falling apart.

Richard Lindsay jumped in. "One final question. Someone that's not had the opportunity." He scanned the room for someone innocuous looking. He picked another B.Y.U. student.

"Brad Mauss with KBYU News. I just have a question. Why is the Church so intent on getting the papers? Is it to secure them in the right hands so that they are not taken advantage of and make the Church look bad? And where does the money come from to purchase these letters?"

That was enough. Oaks grabbed the mike. "Again—why, you say, is the Church so intent on getting the papers? I thought it was clear from my statement that the Church was very intent on not getting the papers, so that there would be no misunderstanding about this. Could you rephrase that question?"

Oaks had successfully intimidated the young reporter into incoherence. "... letters in the past, like the blessing that Joseph gave to his son and other letters," Mauss stumbled.

Hinckley stepped in to bring the conference to a close with an ink cloud of homilies and a plug for the new genealogical library. "Well, of course, I explained in my statement. I think very clearly that we are under mandate. . . . We have an obligation to keep a history of the Church, and we regard that very seriously. We are going over to dedicate the new genealogical library. It is essentially a historical library. It's cost a very handsome sum, and it's a beautiful archive. The finest in the world, and the purpose of it is historical—historical research."

The audience was ended. Lindsay thanked, not the reporters, but his bosses for discharging this burdensome duty with such grace and candor.

Reactions to the press conference varied. The Church leaders were reportedly fuming at the thorny questions posed by the B.Y.U. students. It was one thing to suffer the blasphemous skepticism of the Tribune, but to get blindsided by representatives from the Church's own university, a university that Oaks himself had once presided over—that was intolerable.

The next day, a letter of apology from Thomas A. Griffiths, the Director of Broadcast Services at B.Y.U., was on Oaks's desk.

Dear Elder Oaks,

Just a note to commend you on your normal preciseness and forthrightness at today's news conference regarding the historical documents issue. The information helped all of us understand what has been going on and provided valuable insight into how the Church operates.

I must also apologize for one of our KBYU reporters, Brad Mauss. His final question at the news conference clearly demonstrated that he had not listened and understood what was stated earlier. Unfortunately, we are only able to discover a student reporter's weaknesses when they are actually under pressure to perform.

Watching the conference on television at home, Terri Christensen felt her blood rising. She remembered all the times Steve had dropped whatever he was doing because Hinckley had called and wanted to see him. She remembered the confidential files, the long, familiar letters to Hinckley—Personal & Confidential . Now he was telling the world that he hardly knew Steve. And she wanted to know why.

At Katie Sheets Robertson's house, Joe Robertson watched the press conference while Kathy Sheets's granddaughter Molly played nearby. He remembered the time Steve Christensen had borrowed his car. "Mine is in the shop," he said, "and I've got to go meet with President Hinckley." Mark Hofmann was standing there beside him, and Steve introduced him.

When he returned the car, Steve said that he and Mark and President Hinckley were "working on some stuff that makes the Harris letter look like a priesthood manual." And now Hinckley was telling the world he didn't really know either Steve or Hofmann. And he wanted to know why.

In the back of the auditorium, Detective Don Bell stood against the wall and listened to the Church leaders. He felt momentarily vindicated when Hinckley admitted that he had met with Hofmann. "I knew it," he said softly to himself. Pinnock had lied to him. In any other investigation, he would have been on the phone that afternoon to Pinnock, saying, "Listen. Don't you ever lie to me again." But as he watched the three men on the stage read their statements and deflect the softball questions, another realization crept up on him.

This wasn't any other investigation. That Mormon officer who ticked him off the other day had been right. These people were different. And they would have to be treated differently if he or anybody else was ever going to get at the truth.

PART FOUR

Total Faith

64

On the morning of October 17, Jim Bell returned to LDS Hospital to interview Mark Hofmann. He felt a lot smarter this time. In the eighteen hours since the last interview, he had talked to Jerry Taylor, the ATF's crack bomb man. There was no doubt about it: Hofmann wasn't a victim. He wasn't even a suspect, really. He was the bomber. Like any good cop, Bell hoped for a confession.

Another detective and a nurse were with him in the room. He leaned close so Hofmann could hear him.

"This is Jim Bell, Mark," he said. "I'm the guy who was here yesterday."

Mark said he recognized him.

"Can you hear me, understand me?"

When Hofmann said yes, Bell pulled out his Miranda card and read Hofmann his rights.

"Do you understand your rights?"

"Yes."

"Do you waive your rights to an attorney?"

"Yes."

"And you feel like talking to me?"

"Yes."

Now Bell was set to start again. "What happened when you got to your car?"

"I walked up to the car and opened it and a package fell off the seat onto the floorboard and exploded." It was the same answer as yesterday, only today Bell knew it was a lie.

"Were you the person who had parked your car at that location?"

"Yes."

"Where were you coming from?"

"I had just been in a meeting at the LDS Church, in the basement of the Church library. . . . After I left the Church, I walked through the Deseret Gym, got a drink, and walked to my car. I went to my trunk first, then I opened up my car door. That's when the package fell."

"When you opened up the door, which hand did you open it with?"

"My right hand."

"Did you go anywhere else before you opened up the car door?"

"I went to the trunk."

"Who would want to kill you? Do you know anybody who would want to kill you?"

"No, I don't."

Bell decided to lower the boom. "You should know," he began slowly, "that I am confident you're the bomber."

He paused to let that sink in.

"We did a search of your vehicle and your house, and we recovered some pipe and gloves and the letter jacket. I'm interested in why you killed those people."

Hofmann said, very coolly, "I didn't, I didn't do it."

Bell pressed. "Listen, I know you're the guy. We've got your letter jacket, Mark, and a witness saw you wearing the letter jacket when you carried the bomb up the elevator in Steve Christensen's building."

At that, every medical alarm in the room went off: the heart monitor, the IV monitor, the respirator, the whole battery of them lit up and sang and chirped like a video arcade. The nurse asked them to leave and ushered them hurriedly out the door. Another nurse rushed in at the sound of the alarms.

On the way out, Bell turned to the other detective and said with a satisfied smile, "That's the best polygraph I've ever seen."

That afternoon, the day nurse told Hofmann's lawyer, Ron Yengich, about the interview with Bell. "When they began to talk with him, his vital signs jumped off the chart," she said. Yengich, a short, fiery man with a Yosemite Sam mustache and an unscratchable itch for confrontation, had seen this kind of thing before and it made him flaming mad. Growing up small and Catholic in the tough Mormon mining town of Bingham, Utah, where his Croatian grandparents settled, he had seen his share of bullying: by the Kennecott Copper Company, which devoured Bingham; by the company management that fought his father, a labor leader in a state where unions were considered the tools of Satan; and by local Mormons who wouldn't let their children play with non-Mormon kids like Ron Yengich.

But Yengich wasn't about to knuckle under to the system. He fought his way out of Bingham and into college on a baseball scholarship. After law school, he continued to mine the same rich vein of childhood resentments, building a profitable practice and earning a reputation as the most aggressive—possibly the best—criminal defense lawyer in Utah. He liked to say that his heroes were the Pee Wee Reeses of the world, "scrappy, little people without a lot of skills who made it big." People like Mark Hofmann.

Yengich ordered the men from the sheriff's office on duty not to interview Hofmann unless he or his assistant, G. Fred Metos, was present. Then he shot off letters to all the law enforcement authorities informing them that he was representing Hofmann and that no one was to speak with his client if he wasn't present. To prevent another incident like the one that morning, he sent a letter to the hospital instructing them that if any policeman attempted to speak to Hofmann, they were to call him, Yengich, immediately, at home if necessary. Short of standing round-the-clock vigil at the bedside, it was the best he could do.

It wasn't good enough. About 11:30 that night, the night-shift nurse, Nancy Loden, heard Hofmann's alarms go off. From her monitors, she could see that his respiratory, heart, and blood-pressure signs were rising dangerously. She rushed into his room and found a policeman and two hospital security guards around Hofmann's bed.

She had been warned about this. When she came on duty about 6:45 that evening, the day-shift nurse had told her about the interview that morning and the angry letter from Yengich. "If anyone should try and question Mark, or if Mark needs him," she was told, "notify Yengich."

Loden didn't have to hear anything more. She was already fuming over what Ken Farnsworth had said to Nurse Bowdoin the night before: "You patch him up, and we'll stand him up and execute him." That slip had quickly made the rounds of the hospital staff, and nobody was more burned up about it than Loden. As the daughter of a public defender—and a lawyer herself some day, she hoped—she knew all about oppressive police tactics. Now they were invading her territory—no one is more territorial than a night nurse—and she wasn't going to stand for it.

She walked up to Hofmann's bed, wedging herself between him and his tormentors. She asked if he needed anything. Mark said, very gravely, "I would like to make a statement, so I need a tape recorder."

Loden leaped into the breach. "Are you aware that you could have your lawyer present?"

"Yes," Hofmann answered.

"Would you like me to call your lawyer?"

"Yes."

She rushed into the anteroom, picked up the phone, and notified her nursing supervisor, Betty Townsend, to call Ron Yengich. Yengich was on his way out the door to take his girlfriend home for the night but insisted she come with him to the hospital instead. "I want an independent witness," he said, "in case the cops have him down and are bludgeoning him with their sticks." He also called Metos and told him to get to the hospital immediately.

Meanwhile, the policeman at Hofmann's bedside, Scott Hallock, rushed to the phone in the special-procedures room and called Sergeant Duffy Diamond. Hofmann had asked for a tape recorder. He wanted to make a statement. "The nurse has already called Mark's lawyer," said Hallock. "Why? I don't know. And she won't let me near his bed." Diamond called Jim Bell and told him to get to the hospital on the double. Hofmann was ready to confess.

The race was on.

Loden rushed back into Hofmann's room. His blood pressure had indeed risen, his heart rate had shot from about 100 to a whopping 180 and higher. He was shaking so badly he could hardly keep the thermometer in his mouth. When she finally got a reading, his temperature was normal, which only confirmed her suspicions that he wasn't feverish, he was just terrified. When he asked to be positioned a little differently, she cleared the men from around the bed and ordered them to back off.

After that she washed his clammy face with cool water and swabbed his mouth—and swabbed and swabbed and swabbed.

Anything, it seemed, to keep him quiet until Yengich arrived.

She talked to him, ostensibly trying to calm him down. Meanwhile, Officer Hallock grew increasingly impatient and angry. Hofmann obviously wanted to talk, and he wanted to talk before his lawyer arrived. Only Nurse Loden wouldn't let him.

Finally, Hallock lost his patience. "You're not a lawyer, you know, you're just a nurse."

It was absolutely the wrong thing to say.

"Just a nurse," she huffed.

Yengich won the race, arriving about 12:45 A.M. The first thing he did was to ask the police to step outside.

"He wants to talk to us," said Hallock, outright angry by now.

"Hey, he's not talking." Yengich would show him what real anger looked like. "Call your captain. Call whoever you have to. But he's not going to talk. And I'm staying here to make certain he doesn't talk to you. Now I want everybody out of the room so I can talk to him."

Hallock refused to leave. "He's not to be left alone."

Yengich turned to Hofmann. "Mark, are you going to follow my advice?"

Hofmann nodded. "Yeah."

"We're not talking to them. We've got to call your father. I want to call your father." Yengich had known Hofmann only since eleven that morning, when Bill Hofmann first contacted him. But he had already seen enough to know that Mark Hofmann obeyed his father. If the "Shut up" came from Bill Hofmann, Mark Hofmann would shut up. At the mention of his father, Hofmann's blood pressure/heart rate alarm went off.

When Jim Bell finally arrived, he told the uniformed officers to leave the room so Yengich could talk to his client. "Don't put the nurse in the position again of having to notify me," Yengich warned him as the policemen filed out. Nurse Loden remained in the room with Yengich and Hofmann.

During the conversation, Bell could hear the alarms go off several times. He had a good idea of what Hofmann was saying.

When he heard Hallock's story of Nurse Loden's actions, Jim Bell's own alarms went off. He was furious. It was one thing for her to call Yengich, but it was something else entirely for her to keep Hofmann occupied, even to prevent him from confessing by swabbing out his mouth endlessly and needlessly until Yengich arrived. As far as Bell was concerned, Hofmann had wanted to confess and she had prevented him. If it hadn't been for her, the case would be over now. They would have a confession, and the rest would be paperwork. If she had been standing there, he would have slapped handcuffs on her on the spot. Fortunately, he had time to tell himself that the case was too important to blow it with some rash mistake. Besides, she was in the room with Hofmann at that moment, listening to everything he said. Maybe he could still get that confession.

When Yengich finally emerged from Hofmann's room, Bell heard him ask Nurse Loden, "Did you hear anything?" She said yes. First thing tomorrow morning, Bell thought, he would get a warrant and find out what she had heard.

As soon as Yengich left, Nurse Loden sedated Hofmann. That would keep him quiet for the rest of the night.

The next morning, October 18, Jim Bell and Ron Yengich met at the hospital with Bud Ellett from the county attorney's office. Yengich wanted to deal. He hedged it with hypotheticals, but the message was unmistakable: "Life in exchange for a guilty plea. You give me life in prison, and I'll give you the other people who are involved."

If Jim Bell needed any more proof that Hofmann had confessed, this was it. Little Markie had spilled his guts to Yengich, and the nurse had heard everything.

As Yengich walked out with the offer still dangling, Gerry D'Elia, another prosecutor from the county attorney's office walked in on his way to see Nurse Loden.

If anybody on the public side of the case was Ron Yengich's equal it was Gerry D'Elia. Short, short-tempered, cynical, and street smart, D'Elia was, like Yengich, a child of the sixties, always humming a Beatles or a Stones tune between bursts of manic energy. Born in New Jersey and raised in an Italian Catholic family, he was also about as out-of-place as an American could get in uptight, upright Utah. What brought him here wasn't the religion, it was the skiing. The higher he could get in the mountains, the closer he got to a nosebleed, the happier he was. In the middle of winter, he was always tan, his brown hair streaked with gold highlights from hours in the brilliant white, reflected sunlight of the slopes.

On or off the slopes, he was, like Yengich, a risk taker and a poker player.

When Bell briefed him on Yengich's offer, D'Elia brushed it off. "We are not far enough into the case to even talk about a plea," but, like everybody else, he took it as a sure sign that Hofmann was guilty and that Nurse Loden knew he was guilty. If they could get her testimony, they wouldn't need to deal.

But it wasn't going to be that easy.

The next morning Loden arrived at the Hall of Justice with shorts on, a chip on her shoulder, and a lawyer from the Church's law firm. A plain, stocky woman in her thirties with brown hair, Loden radiated hostility.

She made it clear that she couldn't wait to go to law school so she could save society from overreaching law enforcement officials. She and the Church's buttoned-up, establishment lawyer, Charles W. Dahlquist, made an odd pair.

He opened the meeting with a bombshell. It was the position of the hospital's counsel that the conversation overheard by Nurse Loden was subject to the attorney-client privilege.

Gerry D'Elia didn't like the sound of that one bit. This was the third time in three days he had pursued some evidence only to find the Church standing in his way. First, the person that he sent to the Church to get Hofmann's documents had come back empty-handed. "We don't trust local law enforcement," they told him. Then, they had shipped the Salamander Letter off to the FBI so the county attorneys could never get their hands on it. And now, a woman who had overheard a confession by the prime suspect was being told by a Church lawyer who had nothing to do with the case not to answer questions.

Why would the Church want to protect Mark Hofmann?

"I won't have my client answer the questions you are giving me," said Dahlquist.

"Why not? Who are you?" D'Elia's temperature, always high, was approaching boil. "You're just here to make sure she doesn't end up in a bind, not to stop her from helping out."

"I am not letting her answer any questions against Mark Hofmann. I feel that there is an inadequate basis for you to ask the questions."

D'Elia couldn't believe what he was hearing. "What is going on here? The Church this. The Church that. Now I got the Church with the nurse." He asked himself, not for the first time, if there could be a conspiracy of some kind, headed up by the Church, and, if so, why? "Fine, then," said D'Elia. "You stay here while I go over to the court and find the first judge I can." He would get a judge to grant a motion compelling her to talk—now. "Then we'll sit down right now. I've already got a court reporter lined up."

It wasn't that easy. None of the judges wanted to touch it. Compel a woman to testify over the objections of Church counsel? No way. One judge suggested he go back to the judge who issued the investigative subpoena. "Get him to hear you," he said. "I don't want to hear it." Neither did the second, third, or fourth judge D'Elia went to.

"I have a legal issue that hasn't been assigned to anybody yet," he pleaded. "All I want you to do is to hear the legal issue."

"I don't want to hear it this morning."

"I have a criminal investigation here with a homicidal maniac out on the street planting bombs. What do you mean you don't want to hear it this morning?"

Finally, he got ahold of the judge who had signed the subpoena, Dean E. Conder. Conder agreed to hear the motion at two that afternoon. Meanwhile, Dahlquist called Yengich and told him to get down to the courthouse in a hurry. That only contributed to D'Elia's growing suspicion that he was up against a conspiracy.

Yengich and Metos arrived in time for the hearing. Dahlquist represented Loden, and D'Elia represented the county attorney's office. Yengich began with a request that the proceedings be kept confidential. Judge Conder agreed.

D'Elia tore into Loden. "Mr. Hofmann began asking for the officer, or asking for a tape recorder, if I recollect, and this nurse, Nancy Loden, took it upon herself to intervene in this situation." He wanted permission, not only to depose the nurse as to the contents of the conversation she overheard, but also to look into any criminal actions that might be brought against her for obstruction of justice. "If this gentleman [Hofmann] at one time wanted to waive any right to counsel or waive any right to his silence, or whatever the case may be, we want to investigate the possibilities of this nurse being any party to the obstruction of justice."

Yengich argued that he told Nurse Loden to stay across the room but she said she couldn't leave, that it was a medical necessity for her to be there.

"I am not going to call anybody a liar," D'Elia shot back, "but regardless of what is being said, I want an opportunity to explore this myself."

Dahlquist argued that irreparable harm might be done to the hospital if Loden was compelled to testify. "I am scared we'll be held liable if it should turn out that she comes within the attorney-client privilege. We'll get sued over it."

D'Elia jumped out of his chair. "How can you get sued over it?" he protested. "That's totally ridiculous."

Throughout the heated session, D'Elia couldn't shake the feeling that there was a dimension to the proceedings that he was missing. "I was a non-Mormon in Mormon land," he said later—Alice through the Looking-Glass, not just pushing against the nurse or the lawyers or even Hofmann, but against a whole system.

Judge Conder decided D'Elia could depose Nurse Loden, but not on what Hofmann had said. "You can't ask her what she overheard but you can ask her about the circumstances surrounding it to see if she was really necessary," he ruled. If the deposition made it clear that the nurse's presence was not a matter of medical necessity, then he might reverse his decision and allow her to be questioned on the substance of the conversation overheard.

The deposition was taken at 4:15 that afternoon. Dahlquist represented Nancy Loden. Ken Farnsworth joined D'Elia. Loden lived up to her billing as surly and uncooperative. Both D'Elia and Dahlquist had to remind her to speak up for the court reporter. When she did speak up, she laced her answers with impenetrable, officious medical jargon.

Still, the facts came out.

First, Nurse Loden was not tied down to Hofmann's room. As the nurse in charge of the unit, which included twelve other rooms, she had other duties that required her to leave Hofmann's room several times. "I was in and out probably ten times," she admitted when asked to be specific, although never for "longer than five or ten minutes."

This was exactly what D'Elia had been waiting to hear. "Let's go back to the point where Mr. Yengich entered the room and he had a conversation with Mr. Hofmann. What was it that Mr. Yengich asked you, if anything, with respect to your being present in the room during his conversation with his client?"

Her face went blank. "I don't remember anything."

"Did he ever state to you that he wanted you to leave the room?"

Loden just shook her head.

"Audibly, please," prodded D'Elia.

"No."

"Did he ever state to you that there was an attorney-client privilege of which you must keep secret anything that he was talking about to his client?"

"No."

"Did he ever discuss whether or not you were necessary in that room?"

"No."

"Do you remember telling Mr. Yengich or Mr. Metos that you had to specifically stay in that room with Mr. Hofmann because, if you left, you were worried about his condition?"

"I don't know if I stated it to them. I was worried about his condition at the time."

"But you don't recall whether you stated it or not?"

"I mentioned it. I don't know who I—you know, there were people in the room."

D'Elia asked about the links between Hofmann's room and the computer monitors at the desk outside. "You can sit at that desk in the [intensive care] unit and not be in the room with Mark and not be within earshot of conversation and still monitor all the vital life signs; is that correct?"

"Yes."

The only excuse she could give for staying in the room was, "I didn't feel comfortable leaving the room at that time." In her "best nursing judgment," Hofmann could not have been monitored from outside the room.

But the hearing resolved nothing except a court date for another hearing. Even if Conder reversed his opinion (which he eventually did) and allowed Nurse Loden to be questioned, it was clear by now that Yengich could keep the police away from her for at least another month while he appealed the order, all the way up to the Utah Supreme Court if necessary.

If they wanted to nail Mark Hofmann, they would have to find another way.

If they couldn't get a confession from Hofmann, maybe they could get one from somebody close to him.

Somebody like Lyn Jacobs.

Even his friends wondered how much Jacobs knew. Peggy Fletcher, the editor of Sunstone, remembered how cool Jacobs had been at the news of the bombings—even the one that hit Hofmann. She and the rest of the Sunstone staff had been listening in shock, disbelief, and near panic to the first reports when Jacobs bounced in, unnaturally calm. And why, in the first few days afterward, did he play hide-and-seek with the police?

"When you heard the news, why didn't you run?" Fletcher asked. "Why didn't you run for your life?"

Jacobs told her Dorie had come back from the hospital with good news: Mark was sure a Mormon fanatic had set the bombs.

"All the more reason to run," said Fletcher. Jacobs, after all, had discovered the infamous Salamander Letter.

"Nobody knows my face," he answered.

It wasn't an answer. Who knew Hofmann's face?

Jacobs always had some piece of inside information that proved once and for all that Mark was innocent. The day after the bombings, he came to Fletcher's office and announced, "Mark couldn't be the bomber because the bomber had a letter jacket, and Mark lost his months ago."

How did he know that?

"Dorie told me that when it happened."

Why would Dorie tell him something like that? Fletcher wondered. The next day, the letter jacket was found on the floor of Hofmann's closet.

More and more, Jacobs looked less and less like an innocent bystander. After all, if Hofmann was running a documents scam of some kind, Jacobs, with his command of languages and history and his Harvard credentials, could have been a very useful asset.

When the police finally sat him down in the interview room on the eighth floor of the Hall of Justice, Jacobs started chattering and wouldn't stop. "It was like putting a nickel in the slot," said Ken Farnsworth.

Jacobs began by repeating all of the old lies about how he, not Mark Hofmann, had discovered the Salamander Letter—lies that would haunt him through the early stages of the investigation. Then suddenly, in the midst of the questioning, a name popped up that no one expected to hear, at least not in this room, under these circumstances.

"Did you have an association with the man—with President Hinckley?" Detective Don Bell asked Jacobs.

"Not really."

"Does Mark?"

"Yeah. He's in constant contact with President Hinckley. They've worked together for several years. They're very dear friends as far as I can tell." Later, Jacobs told them that Hinckley "called [Mark] on his birthday and said, Happy birthday, and all that kind of stuff."

"Would it surprise you," asked Detective Bell, "if I told you that I think [Mark]'s the bomber?"

"That's what I've been hearing all day long," said Jacobs, working his way toward indignation. "I don't buy it. I do know he's in debt. But everybody's in debt, it's just a question of how much. . . . I just don't buy it. Not in a million years. Unless he went nuts, just went cracko for some reason. Anybody in this whole world can go cracko tomorrow. But the point is that that is not the Mark I know. I know him as one of the most level-headed, incredibly ingenious people I've ever known, as far as dealing with these documents is concerned."

Bell thought about that for a moment. "Jacobs, I think either your friend has gone crazy or you didn't know him as well as you thought you did."

Jacobs had reached indignation. "What makes you believe this?" he demanded.

"Let me put it this way." Bell spoke slowly and softly for emphasis. "There is evidence that has been obtained during the time you've been sitting in this room which a person just driving around Salt Lake City probably wouldn't have in his possession unless he was an Army ordnance-disposal person or he was a maker of bombs."

"Huh?" Jacobs looked genuinely shocked. Until now, he had never seriously contemplated the possibility that Mark might have actually committed the bombings. He hadn't let himself.

"I mean, it's not like something everybody would have with him on any given Wednesday afternoon as they're driving around town."

"So there is evidence in the car?"

"There's not only evidence there, there's evidence in a whole lot of other places." Jacobs looked so devastated that Bell felt compelled to comfort him. "For fifteen years, I have dealt with these kinds of people, some of whom have gone crazy. Okay? So I've learned that it doesn't matter what they appear like on the outside." Not to worry, he wanted to say, being fooled isn't a crime.

The next day, the 18th, Jacobs was back in the hot seat. Deputy Gaylord Dent, a sandy-haired young officer in the burglary division of the sheriff's office, had some more questions, most of them about the Church.

Jacobs said that Hofmann had told him that the reason the LDS Church was willing to trade the Joseph Smith III blessing to the RLDS Church was, one, the news had already gotten out so there was no longer any point in hiding it, and, two, the LDS Church already had in its vault a similar blessing from the Prophet to his son. Mark also said that he had turned a whole slew of sensitive materials from the same source over to the Church, on the sly.

Dent wanted to know the name of the person he gave them to.

President Gordon Hinckley. "And Hinckley said, 'This will never see the light of day,'" Jacobs told the startled Dent. "That is the first time I know of in which Mark mentioned that they had done a secret deal."

What else had Hofmann secretly sold to Hinckley?

There was Martin Harris's copy of Ethan Smith's book, View of the Hebrews. "It's a fascinating book," said Jacobs, giving an unprompted seminar in Church history. "The book basically provides the Book of Mormon story even though it was written years before the Book of Mor- mon came out. . . . Anyway, nobody's ever been able to prove that Joseph or Martin Harris or his wife or Oliver Cowdery, the four people who worked on the Book of Mormon manuscript, ever had a copy of that thing. And then Mark found Martin Harris's. . . . Isn't this just blowing you out of your mind?"

It was, but in ways Jacobs couldn't guess. Clearly, the Church had far more at stake in Hofmann's business than anyone else.

Jacobs continued his story: "Anyway, the point is, Mark showed it to Hinckley, and Hinckley said, 'Oh, I want it right now. It'll never see the light of day.' That was another one I understood he stashed away and paid Mark a substantial sum for it."

Like the police, Jacobs saw the potential for blackmail and had even mentioned it to Hofmann. "I said, 'Mark, all the stuff you're acquiring, all this juicy stuff you sell to Hinckley. Have you kept a copy of everything as a kind of . . .'" He reached for the word. "' . . . insurance for the future?'"

Dent knew what he meant.

"I said, 'You've got to. You're not that dumb.' . . . And finally, one day, he said, 'I've got some copies of what there needs to be copies of for the future.'"

So, at any point—if he needed money, for example—Hofmann could have tried to blackmail Hinckley by threatening to release what he knew: not just the documents, but the fact that the Church had bought them and stashed them away. Suddenly, the Church's strange determination to prevent Hofmann from talking to the police didn't seem so strange.

"Is [Mark] the kind of person that would consider President Hinckley, uh, two-faced?" asked Dent, trying to put it as delicately as possible. "So much so that it would finally grate on him?"

"I think he was used to it . . . because we had talked about that. As he would tell me about one of these things that Hinckley was doing, I would look at him and say, 'Well, it seems a little strange, doesn't it?'"

"Outlandish," Dent corrected.

"Well, no, I'm just saying, not necessarily from my point of view. Historically, people will justify things to say whatever they have to. I mean, they want to preserve the Church. If Hinckley wants to preserve the Church, he's going to do everything he can to protect the Church."

67

Farnsworth interviewed Shannon Flynn at 7:10 the evening of the 18th. It was almost like a joke at first. Flynn treated it like just another exciting chapter in the continuing adventure of Shannon Flynn, secret agent. He seemed eager to match wits with his interrogators.

It wasn't long before the Church came up again—something that had happened so often in the first days of interviewing that the shock had worn off, or so Farnsworth thought. He was interested that Flynn thought Hofmann was under pressure at the end, the kind of pressure that might have led to violence.

"How do you know that he's been under pressure?" Farnsworth asked. "Do you have some direct evidence?"

It was the Church, said Flynn, putting pressure on Hofmann to come up with the McLellin Collection. "Just, you know, from what he told me. He said, almost quoting, 'You cannot believe how nervous President Hinckley is about this material, and how badly he wants it here.' " There it was again: Gordon Hinckley's name. "And that's the kind of pressure [Mark] doesn't like," Flynn added. "My understanding is that President Hinckley helped arrange the loan for him at First Interstate Bank. I wasn't in the bank for that transaction, though afterwards I did see a copy of the loan agreement."

Farnsworth wanted to explore another possible motive. "Does Hofmann have any problem reputation-wise in the document community?"

"Absolutely not," said Flynn.

"So he wouldn't be suspected of forging documents, or stealing documents?"

Flynn shook his head no.

"Would stolen documents be a more likely thing if someone was dealing in the document trade than fraudulent ones?"

Flynn thought for a moment. "Ummm, I'd say it was an even split. It's difficult to steal material. It's real difficult to steal material. But it's even more difficult to forge it."

"It's a big problem either way?"

"Either way, it's a mess."

Farnsworth changed tack again. "What is your opinion of his innocence or guilt at this time, knowing what you know?"

"I believe that he is innocent."

"Any particular reason?"

"Based mainly on my association with him. I traveled a lot with him. When we went to New York, we would be twenty-four hours a day together. There were times I saw him every day of the week, practically. He's just not that kind of person."

"Okay, would he have any reason that you know of to cause harm to the Sheets family or the Christensens?"

"Absolutely none. I don't think he even knew Gary Sheets."

As usual, the discussion of motive came to a dead stop over Gary Sheets. There was still nothing to tie Hofmann to the Sheets murder. It was quickly turning into one of the imponderables of the case. Farnsworth had learned that every case had one or two.

He turned to the bombs. Did Hofmann ever show any interest in explosives? Farnsworth asked.

Flynn said no, then added, nonchalantly, "At gun shows, it's possible, you know, to pick up a fuse or this or that. In my estimation, that would have been an excellent opportunity to do it, and there was never anything like that."

Farnsworth's eyes lit up. Gun shows?

Flynn realized immediately that he had spilled something—a gaffe unbefitting a secret agent—and tried to backtrack. "When we would go to gun shows, he would almost never buy any guns. . . ." But he only dug himself deeper. Farnsworth was thinking: Hofmann went to gun shows and bought guns? This chubby, nebbishy documents dealer was a gun freak?

Then came another surprise. "I know we were both interested in things that had to do with surveillance. I know that he thought his phones were tapped."

That raised everyone's eyebrows.

"He had constant phone difficulty. They'd break, or sometimes they'd pick up a phone and they could hear somebody talking and then all of a sudden there would be a click, and things like that. So one time, when we were in New York, we went to a company that sells all kinds of defensive and offensive surveillance devices. We got the catalog."

Gun shows and surveillance devices. What next? thought Farnsworth. Flynn obviously reveled in the feeling of power these little revelations gave him. Being interrogated was fun.

But not for long. After a few questions about Hofmann and Steve Christensen, Farnsworth decided it was time to show this baby-faced James Bond that the game was deadly serious. He began by setting Flynn up. "We have already gone over the area—that neither you, nor, so far as you have any knowledge, Mark, ever acquired any items that you could make a bomb with?"

"No," said Flynn.

"Have you ever bought any directions that would help you make a bomb?"

"Not that I recall." Flynn was beginning to catch on, but it was too late.

"Okay, I think you're a liar." The other detective present, Mike Fierro, produced a copy of The Anarchist's Cookbook. "Have you ever seen this book?" he demanded.

"Uh, huh," said Flynn, his face turning red.

"When?"

"Oh, about a month ago."

"What is that book about?"

"A variety of subjects, I mean, you know. . . ."

"Does it include a large section involving how to make bombs?"

"Uh, huh." His face turned even redder, impossibly red.

"When I was questioning you, didn't you think of this document?"

"I didn't remember it."

"And yet this bombing incident is such a major thing in the community and you're tied very closely to a man who is accused of being a bomber?"

"Uh, huh."

"We sit here for the purposes of inquiring from you all of the knowledge that we can, and you casually forget that you in fact have bought a book in the last few weeks which described in large part how to make bombs?"

"Uh, huh."

"I find that a very convenient loss of memory. Can you explain it?"

"Well. . . ."

"You're not a dumb person, I gather?"

Flynn was distraught. "Obviously you have gone in and searched my house without my knowledge."

"How's that?"

Flynn had fallen into the trap. "Well, I haven't been to the house in two days."

"So why do you think the police have been in your house?"

"Well, I don't know how else that would come out of there." In fact, the police hadn't been to Flynn's house. All they had was a tip that he had bought a copy of the book. Now they had confirmation.

"This is not your book," said Farnsworth. "This is a book like one that you bought." He smiled broadly. "Does that make you feel better?"

"Well, not really," said Flynn, furious with himself for being tricked.

"Would you like to back up and start over a little bit?"

"Well, I don't know what to tell you."

"This is a very good time for you to get the record straight about where you fit in with this bombing business. We know Mark Hofmann is the bomber. Maybe one of several people have knowledge about this, maybe helped participate in it, maybe helped deliver bombs. The fact is, we're going to know. . . . And if we acquire any knowledge of your participation, we're talking death penalty for everybody who is involved in this."

If Flynn ever thought being interrogated by the police was a big adventure, another episode in the Walter Mitty life of Shannon Flynn, secret agent and ace documents sleuth, those delusions ended right there and then. Farnsworth could see it on his face. The cockiness disappeared, and the fear set in.

And everything else spilled out. He told them about buying two blasting caps for Hofmann eight months earlier. He had been on an ice-fishing trip near Richfield, Utah, and stopped at a friend's and bought the caps—farmers in the area used them all the time to blow up stumps. He tried to convince them that they were just a spur-of-the-moment gift, one pal to another, but Farnsworth didn't buy it.

Then he told them about the Uzi submachine gun in the storage shed.

The Uzi submachine gun! Bob Swehla, who was representing the ATF at the interrogation, couldn't believe his ears.

Farnsworth thought, first, blasting caps. Now, a submachine gun. These guys had a goddam arsenal.

"It belongs to Mark Hofmann," Flynn hastened to add. "The reason I'm telling you is that I'm trying to tell you anything I can possibly tell you right now before it all comes back and bites me in the ass later."

"Yes," said Swehla, still reeling, "I'll congratulate you for this particular statement. . . . Can you go into that some more?"

"Sure. I bought that for Mark. We then bought the components to convert it to an automatic."

"I take it you're fully aware that that's illegal?"

"You know, it's not the kind of information that I would normally volunteer. I'm not trying to get myself thrown in jail over some firearm violation. But, you know, I don't want to come back here tomorrow and then have you guys kicking the shit out of me, saying, 'We found this machine gun at your house.' "

"What was the purpose of having a fully automatic machine gun?"

"Just the fascination of having an automatic weapon."

"Have either of you shot it?"

"Yeah."

"How long ago?"

"Oh, probably the last time we shot it was maybe two weeks ago."

Actually, the revelation of the Uzi presented Swehla and Farnsworth with a dilemma. Flynn had just confessed to committing a federal crime punishable by ten years in prison and a $10,000 fine. To protect that confession, Swehla would have to read Flynn his Miranda rights before going on. But reading him his rights might give him cold feet about everything else and bring the whole interview to a halt. Whatever Flynn knew about the bombings and Hofmann, whatever he hadn't told, might disappear forever behind the Miranda curtain.

Swehla passed a note to alert Farnsworth—"I'm at the point of Miranda"—and they left the room to talk about it. "Go as far as you can with him regarding what we're talking to him about," Swehla said. "Because once I go back in there and give him the Miranda warning, he may clam up about everything, not just about the gun."

Farnsworth decided to use the time to have one more go at Flynn, to wring him out one last time, just to make sure he wasn't holding anything back.

He began slowly, like a preacher working a guilty congregation.

"Don't you see, Shannon, that if you had come in originally and said, 'This may not be important, but it's probably very critical—I gave him some blasting caps,' that that would have established your credibility as a candid, honest person?"

"Exactly. And I should have done it. I should have done it. I shouldn't have held that back, because now, man, my dick's in the wringer, and I don't know how in the hell I'm going to get it out. You know, if I could give you more information, God, I'd tell you in a second."

"You can't get yourself out." Farnsworth was giving no quarter.

"Well, probably not now," said Flynn, hopelessly.

"You're so deep into this, you don't know which way to turn right now. You're sitting here. You're talking to us. We're not being mean to you, and you know we're sitting here with a ton of information and you don't know what we know, and you'd love to know what we know so that you could work around it."

"Well, can I interrupt you?"

"You can't interrupt me."

"Okay, I'm sorry."

"You can't interrupt me right now. That's one thing you can't do right now. You're sitting here thinking, my life as a paper antiquities expert, my church life, my family life, my parents, you're adding all that up and saying to yourself, 'I don't know how to respond to this thing. I can't sit here and tell these people what I know to be true, I can't sit here and tell them what I have participated in, because all of these things are on the line. . . .'"

Farnsworth stalked the room. "I'm not the kind of guy who likes to lean on the wrong person. But you have put yourself in the fix you're in with us. You lost your credibility an hour ago."

"Yeah." By now, Flynn was a beaten man.

"If anybody listened to the tape of this interview—including yourself, in a while—you'd say, 'Holy Toledo! Am I that bad? I mean, can't I present something better than that to protect myself? Did I underestimate these people and their ability to dig up information?' " Farnsworth let that sink in, then said, gravely, "I think you're in this up to your eyeballs—up to your eyeballs. . . ."

Another long pause. Flynn's shirt was soaking wet.

"I don't know how religious you are. I don't know how much of a believer you are. But if you are a believer, then somebody else is watching who is bigger than you are, and who already knows everything you've done, and everything you know. You may hide it from him," Farnsworth said, pointing to the other detective, "and you may hide it from me, but you ain't hiding it from some superior being." He pointed toward the ceiling in case Flynn missed the point. "So it's only a game for a while, if you choose to be honest and truthful. But later on, it's serious business." If Flynn believed in the Celestial Kingdom, his personal parcel of real estate in the world-to-come was in serious jeopardy. "Two people are dead, two very nice people as far as I can tell. I haven't heard a bad word said about either of the people that are dead."

"No," Flynn agreed meekly.

"It's a major tragedy for them. It's a major tragedy for their families. It's a tragedy for the entire community—and you are part of this tragedy."

This was the moment. The moment in any interview when, if the questioner has done his job, everything is working for him: vulnerability, self-loathing, fear, all the forces that produce a confession. Not a grudging confession, not a word-by-word, question-and-answer confession, but a willing confession—hell, an eager confession, a confession that pours out like vomit from a drunk.

But Flynn just sat there, sweating and quivering and praying for it to be over. Farnsworth was sure. This well was dry.

Bob Swehla returned and read Flynn his rights.

"If you decide to answer questions now without a lawyer present, you will still have the right to stop the questioning at any time. You also have the right to stop the questioning at any time until you talk to a lawyer."

"Uh, huh."

Swehla had a few more questions about the Uzi. He wanted to know why, if it was Hofmann's, Flynn kept it at his house.

"Oh, probably the biggest reason," said Flynn, "is that Mark's wife hated it, when it was there in its semiauto form. She saw it and told him that it was really stinky and he ought to get rid of it. So he just preferred to keep it at my house."

Farnsworth asked what exactly he and Hofmann intended to use the Uzi for.

"We just go out and target-shoot with it."

"It's for fun?" Farnsworth exclaimed with an astonishment that had to have been disingenuous. He himself had spent hundreds of hours shooting pistols for fun. But a machine gun?

"Yeah."

"Shooting a fully automatic weapon?"

"Well, ya know, it's kind of like sex. You hear about it long enough, you want to do it."

Detective Fierro had one more question. He had heard that Hofmann was an atheist and wondered if Flynn knew anything about "the transition that probably took place with Mark" and resulted in his break with the Church.

Flynn seized the question gleefully, like a man coming out of a mine-field and lighting on safe ground. "Oh, I don't know much about the transition. As long as I have known him, that essentially has been his philosophy. A Church authority once said the study of religious history is the quickest way to destroy religious faith. You just can't deal in this stuff very long before you start to see inaccuracies, duplicities, errors in any religion. There hasn't been one founded that hasn't been screwed up somehow."

"From what you said earlier, about talking to people in your ward, and stuff, I was getting the impression that you were active in the faith," Fierro said.

"I'm very active. I like to be active. I want to be a member of the Church. I'm not dumb, though. I know what goes on. When I talked to the General Authorities on Thursday morning, it didn't take long to get the scoop. Ya know, they weren't about to tell me anything. And what I had to tell them, they couldn't do anything about, so they just said, 'Tell the truth and do your best and see ya later.'"

"Shove it under the carpet, in others words," Farnsworth interpreted.

"Well, I realize now, man, they are doing some heavy moving over there—real heavy moving. And they weren't about to let me get in the way. I am such a small fish in the pond."

"What do you think their goal is right now?" Farnsworth asked.

"The same as it has always been—the maintenance of the Church. To have the Church continue."

It was one the next morning by the time they were finished. But Flynn had one last surprise for them. As they were booking him on the unlawful-firearms charge, they found a Philippine butterfly knife in his pocket. Secret agent, Uzi-owner, Shannon Flynn had been carrying this lethal piece of hardware throughout the interview.

Ken Farnsworth wondered, not for the first time, what the world was coming to, when a Pillsbury Doughboy like Shannon Flynn packs a jungle knife on the streets of Salt Lake City. It was getting so you couldn't tell the bad guys from the good guys anymore.

68 A search of Flynn's house at 7:30 the next morning turned up a lot more than just an Uzi in the washbasin. Scattered among the well-thumbed copies of Soldier of Fortune were a .357 Magnum revolver and a Mini-14 Ruger rifle with a black nylon stock, plus reloading hardware and enough ammo to start a respectable revolution. Plus combat gear.

Next to the hardware, Flynn's copy of Charles Hamilton's Great Forgers and Famous Fakes looked harmless enough.

The next morning, Farnsworth and David Biggs from the county attorney's office drove to Richfield, where Flynn said he had bought the blasting caps. It was the opening day of the deer hunt, and everyone was out with rifle in hand, a sight that put Shannon Flynn's peculiarities in perspective.

The night before, thousands of men had gone out and gotten crocked. This morning, at the crack of dawn, they were out, guns in hand, shooting deer, and, if this year was like past years, at least a couple of their fellow hunters. Just the previous year, a hunter had claimed he thought he was shooting at a deer when he downed a horse and rider. So many cows, sheep and house pets were killed each season that one exasperated farmer had been reduced to painting the words COW and SHEEP in big letters on the sides of his animals to help hunters recognize them.

Despite the deadly carnival, Farnsworth and Biggs located the man who had sold Flynn the caps. He remembered the transaction, but, according to him, Flynn knew exactly why he was buying them. "I need these blasting caps for this guy I know," he remembered Flynn saying. "He likes to blow things up."

Meanwhile, Jim Bell led a phalanx of cops through Hofmann's house for the second time in two days. They came looking for the McLellin Collection. Interviews with Jacobs, Flynn, and others, as well as the contents of Hofmann's car, had made it clear that documents, in one form or another, were at the heart of the case. This time, the warrant allowed them to take "documents, papers, pictures that relate to the Martin Harris letter, McLellin letters, diaries or any other antique or ancient documents relating to Mormon history. Also any other diaries of ancient or antique nature along with any devices, tools or machines for the alteration or production of documents."

In the southeast basement bedroom, Bell found a box filled with documents on Mormon history and religion, as well as books and some information on the care and preservation of paper. Sitting on top of the box was an envelope with the name facing up. The name was Mike Hansen.

At ten that night, back at the department, while Chief Willoughby conducted yet another news conference in the next room, Jerry Taylor was drawing a picture for Jim Bell.

It was a picture of a bomb. The basic device was diabolically simple: a length of pipe nipple (a piece of pipe threaded at both ends) filled with smokeless powder, two battery packs (four C-size batteries apiece) purchased at Radio Shack, and a mercury switch. Taylor explained how the bomber had screwed metal end caps on both ends of the pipe, drilled a hole in one of the end caps, inserted a rocket igniter, then led wires from the igniter to the mercury switch and from the mercury switch to the two battery packs to create a simple circuit. When the victim tilted the bomb, the globule of mercury moved to the other end of the switch, completing the circuit and sparking the igniter, which in turn ignited the powder, and boom.

The bombs had been placed in cardboard boxes approximately six by twelve by twelve inches. (Taylor had recovered one of the pieces of cardboard from the site.) There were some differences between the three devices. The Christensen bomb was the only one that had been packed with nails. There wasn't as much powder in the other two bombs. And the pipes used were slightly different in size. But these were distinctions without a difference, Taylor emphasized. From over sixty similar investigations, he could say without any reservations—which was the way he said everything—that the three bombs were essentially identical, meaning that they were dealing with a single bomber. Also, the person who made the bombs was the person who set them. If two different people had been involved, there would have been some safety mechanisms. There weren't.

In Taylor's judgment, Mark Hofmann manufactured and set all three bombs.

On the basis of Taylor's description, a local ATF agent, Ray Dalling, built a replica of the bomb. Then Bell borrowed a Toyota MR2 from a local Toyota dealership and drove to the exact spot on North Main where the third bomb had gone off. As Taylor had suspected, the bomb wouldn't sit on the console, the gearshift got in the way. That meant that Hofmann had to arm it while it was still in the back area, behind the seats—an awkward operation at best.

It was in bringing the bomb package forward between the seats and turning to get out of the car that he must have dropped it. That explained why his right hand, with which he must have reached for the package, had the fingertips blown off, while the left hand, which may have been reaching to open the door, was virtually unscathed. He had been holding it with his right hand when it slipped, and Bang! With a mercury switch, it took only milliseconds for ignition, according to Taylor. It had been practically instantaneous.

A few days later, around midnight, as Bell and Farnsworth slowly made their way through Hofmann's papers in the third-floor evidence room, they found a check made out to Radio Shack.

* * *

On October 19, Sergeant Sid Elliott of the sheriff's office in Cottonwood filed a report that included an interview with a young neighbor of Kathy Sheets's who had seen a suspicious van cruising the driveway in front of the Sheets house the night before the bombing. A few days later, Elliott's report arrived on Jim Bell's desk, together with a note that Mark Hofmann owned a van of similar description.

The neighbor turned out to be Aaron Teplick, a thirteen-year-old boy who lived not just near the Sheetsses, but right next door, on the same tiny cul-de-sac off Naniloa Drive. Like most cops, Bell was skeptical of child witnesses—not because they weren't observant but because they were notoriously vulnerable in court. But he had Teplick brought to the Hall of Justice for an interview anyway, just in case.

It was a setting as intimidating as any courtroom. Teplick's parents didn't accompany him. The only other people in the room were five officers: Sid Elliott, the sheriff's deputy who had interviewed him first; Bob Swehla and Jerry Miller from ATF; Jim Bell; and Ken Farnsworth. But Teplick proved a trouper. In a calm, sure voice, he repeated his story that he had seen a strange van drive through the cul-de-sac the night before the bombing.

"I felt ill that night. It was really late. I woke up and was just getting up to get an aspirin and then I saw that Toyota van come down our street."

"What time was this, do you remember?"

"It was about 11:30 or twelve."

"How do you remember that?"

"'Cause there's a clock in our kitchen and I looked." If only their adult witnesses were this observant, thought Bell.

"Okay, you went to the kitchen and got an aspirin and then you looked out the kitchen window?"

"It was our hall window. I just heard a car down there and just wanted to see who it was. . . . We have a little private driveway with three houses down there."

"Okay, describe what you saw, Aaron."

"Well, first I saw a light come down our driveway and then it kind of pulled in front of our house, and I looked out and it was just a gold Toyota Wonder Wagon. It was there for a couple of minutes. . . . Then it turned in the Bridges' driveway, which is the other next-door neighbors, and went back up our hill."

"You mention a Toyota. How do you know that it was a Toyota?"

"Well, that particular car is a pretty obvious car—it was one of those new kinds of vans." And then Teplick proceeded to give the cops a complete lesson on recent changes in automotive design. The kid knew what he was talking about.

They had him draw a picture of the van as he described it. Then they showed him a series of Polaroids of various similar vans, including Hofmann's.

He pointed out what was wrong with each of the photos until he landed on Mark's. "That's it," he said—very calm, very decisive.

Farnsworth called it a "class act" (his highest accolade) and after it was over, Bell joked, "You'd think he was raised in L.A."

But it wasn't enough.

On Tuesday, October 29, two weeks after the bombings, the hospital announced that Mark Hofmann would be released the following Thursday. And still no charges had been filed: not for the murders, not for the bombings, not for fraud, not even for the traffic ticket the computer had spit out the moment he became a suspect.

At 2:30 that afternoon, Bell and Farnsworth and the other investigators met with the county attorney, Ted Cannon, and the U.S. attorney, Brent Ward, in a last-ditch effort to persuade them to file charges—some charges, any charges—to prevent Hofmann from walking out of the hospital a free man.

One face conspicuously missing from the meeting was Sheriff Pete Hayward's. He had already dismissed the Hofmann case, not because he believed Hofmann wasn't guilty, but because, in Sheriff Hayward's mind, the case was already wrapped up. Hayward, an amiable bulldog of a man, didn't believe in all this scientific investigation crapola. His heart (as well as his crime-solving technique) was still firmly rooted in the nineteenth century, when Utah was the Wild West and Wyatt Earp was marshal. His idea of solving a crime was jumping in his car, turning on the siren, racing to the scene, and collaring the bad guy. His idea of investigation was driving around and looking for anything suspicious. As for interviews, he could look a man in the eye and tell if he was lying.

His tactics gave bleeding-heart liberals heart failure, but the people loved him. He was the kind of cop they liked to watch on TV—no boring details, no drudgery, no paperwork, just action. In fact, they had watched him on TV, on the 5 o'clock news, confronting a crazed gunman in a 7-Eleven store, all alone, unarmed. The television cameras had recorded every thrilling moment as Hayward, steady as a rock, waited for his opening, and, when the man's look was averted, grabbed the shotgun from his hand. The sheer bravery of it was awesome. This was how lawmen were supposed to do their job.

And remarkably often, it worked.

Unfortunately, his department operated by the same seat-of-the-pants rules. While Jim Bell was mapping out the Christensen bomb site and collecting bits of evidence on his knees with a pair of tweezers, Sheriff Hayward's deputies were blowing through the Sheets crime scene like a twister, throwing everything they could find into a big green garbage bag. No grids, no diagrams, no tweezers, no magnifying glasses. As a result, the sheriff's men had missed several key pieces of evidence, including major bomb parts at the Sheets house. (The ATF's Jerry Taylor found them on a follow-up search days later.)

In the weeks following, interviews with important witnesses were mishandled and then, even worse, mislaid. When Bell called to get them, he was told they didn't exist. "But we have witnesses who said they were interviewed by the sheriff's department," he insisted. "They must have been talking to reporters," cracked one of the sheriff's shoot-from-the-hip deputies.

One day, weeks after the bombings, Jerry Thompson of the sheriff's office appeared on the eighth floor of the Hall of Justice and handed Bell a file. "Here is something we found pushed back behind a file cabinet," he said. "Do you want them?" They were the missing interviews, along with the evidence of Hofmann's travel schedule. Not only had the police been forced to reinterview the same witnesses—a considerable embarrassment—but the chain of custody on the travel evidence had been broken. Bell knew that a good defense attorney could "blow them out of the water" if he found out about the foul-up.

But none of that seemed to make any difference to Sheriff Pete Hayward. His business was solving crimes—let the lawyers worry about the technicalities.

Needless to say, that attitude had earned Hayward a number of enemies among the prosecutors of Salt Lake County, but none so virulent or implacable as the head prosecutor, County Attorney Ted Cannon. It was an enmity that went far beyond political differences (Hayward was a Democrat, Cannon a Republican) or working styles. The two men just plain didn't like each other. Despite having to work together on hundreds of cases a year, they weren't even on speaking terms. When absolutely necessary, they communicated through intermediaries: one man's deputy would speak to the other man's deputy.

So when Cannon said he needed more evidence from the sheriff's office to indict Hofmann on the Sheets murder, Hayward ostentatiously washed his hands of the whole matter. As far as he was concerned, the case was over. His office had done its job by fingering Hofmann. If the county attorney's office was too obstinate or obtuse to file charges, that was their problem. He wasn't about to waste any more of his men's time or the taxpayers' money just to make Ted Cannon's job a little easier. And that's exactly what he told the press.

So the meeting on the 29th went on without Sheriff Hayward.

Jim Bell began with an impassioned plea. "We've got to arrest the guy. We can't just let him go home. It was a double murder. He shouldn't be going home; he should be going to jail. He doesn't deserve any free time, even if he is injured."

Ted Cannon, for one, wasn't convinced. He didn't want to charge the Christensen murder without charging the Sheets murder—and he couldn't charge the Sheets murder because the sheriff's office hadn't done its job. It wasn't clear if Cannon was more interested in scoring points against his nemesis Hayward or in arresting Mark Hofmann. As an elected official himself, Cannon also knew that if he indicted on Christensen and not on Sheets, the press would rally to the cause of Kathy Sheets. Cannon put the best face he could on an impossible situation. "If we did arrest him," he told Bell, "his lawyers would come right over and get him out."

So Hayward was out and Cannon was out.

That left Brent Ward, U.S. attorney. Would he file on the federal bomb charges? All eyes turned to the young man in the bow tie at the end of the table.

70

Bell and Farnsworth weren't hopeful. They remembered how much trouble Ward had given them when they tried to get a warrant to search Shannon Flynn's house. Right after the Flynn interview, Farnsworth had called Bruce Lubeck, Ward's assistant on the case. Because the Uzi possession was a federal violation, they needed the U.S. Attorney's Office to sign off on it.

Lubeck told them to call Brent Ward. Right then, Farnsworth knew something was wrong. Why would the top man take such a personal interest in the details of the case?

Then Ward wouldn't give them an answer. He told them to stay off Lubeck's line for at least fifteen minutes while he discussed the case with him. Fifteen minutes later, Lubeck's line was still busy. Farnsworth wondered what the hell could be taking so long. This was a simple, straightforward warrant based not on a tip but on a confession. Something was up.

When they finally talked to Lubeck again, another surprise: "I think you ought to try to arrange a consent search." That meant going back to Flynn and getting him to say, "Okay, you can search my house." This at the very same time they were arresting him and putting him in jail. Farnsworth was mystified. Why were they resisting a warrant? Surely they knew it was, in fact, better to get a formal warrant than to rely on a consent search that might later be challenged in court. ("My client was in the jailhouse, intimidated by police officers, placed under arrest, and under extreme duress, Your Honor. His consent wasn't voluntary!") What was Ward afraid of?

Farnsworth decided to think about it later. Right then, he wanted the warrant. "That's stupid," he told Lubeck. "Let's get the warrant. That way there will be a legal stamp on this thing, and that way we won't lose the evidence."

But Lubeck still resisted. He—and Ward, obviously—still wanted a consent search. Farnsworth finally pushed him into it, and at four in the morning, he went down to the police station and filled out the necessary paperwork. But the episode left a lot of unanswered questions in Ken Farnsworth's mind.

If Pete Hayward was the frontier sheriff, Brent Ward was the yuppie lawyer. With his red suspenders, bow tie, and horn-rimmed glasses, he could have been the rising star of some big corporate law firm on the fast track to the top. Which is exactly what he was before December 1981, when Orrin Hatch, Utah senator and Mormon elder, picked him, at the age of thirty-six, for the U.S. attorney's job.

They may have come from different centuries, but Sheriff Hayward and Brent Ward had one thing in common: political instincts. At the very least, Ward was in line for a federal judgeship if he chose that direction. At his age, that would put him in the running, if Senator Hatch's conservative star continued to rise, for an appeals court, or even, some day, the Supreme Court. It was no secret that one of the Church's most fervent wishes was to seat a Mormon justice on the nation's highest court.

That was the other bottom-line feature of Brent Ward: the Church. More than just a devout Mormon, Ward was an ambitious one. Of course, in Utah, political ambition and religious ambition were always closely allied. It was difficult to rise to prominent public office without the Church's backing. It was virtually impossible to do so against the Church's opposition. That was a fact of life in Utah that any good politician understood, and Brent Ward was a very good politician.

In his four years as U.S. attorney, Ward had concentrated his activities on popular causes like pornography and child abuse—causes, not coincidentally, that the Church cared about. When the Hofmann story began to break, more than a few people wondered how the ambitious young U.S. attorney would handle himself in a case that the Church wanted to avoid at all costs.

Like Farnsworth, they soon found out.

Ward's first action was to help arrange to have a key piece of evidence shipped out of state. By the time the police department knew enough to ask the Church for the so-called Salamander Letter, it was already gone—off to the FBI's laboratories in Washington, D.C., for a long and very confidential analysis. When the county attorney's office requested other Hofmann documents, the Church refused to hand them over. Why would they push one sensitive document into the FBI's hands almost immediately after the bombing and fight to keep other documents out of police hands for weeks? Church spokesmen said they didn't trust local law enforcement.

But they could trust the heavily Mormon FBI, which worked hand-in-glove with Brent Ward.

It was Ward's FBI agents who had swooped down on all the major figures in the case in the first few days and taken statements. By the third day, however, as soon as it became clear that the Church was involved somehow, the FBI stopped sharing its information. Its agents wouldn't give local police the names of the people they had interviewed. Bell's detectives would arrive only to be told by a beleaguered witness, "What are you doing here? The FBI was here yesterday, asking the same questions. Don't you people talk to each other? Aren't you all law enforcement?" By the end of the first week, some detectives themselves were beginning to wonder.

The police asked if they could go along on FBI interviews. The FBI refused. The police asked to see the FBI interviews, a courtesy routinely extended to local law enforcement agencies on a confidential basis. The FBI refused.

At one point, Farnsworth, Bell, and others from the police department and the county attorney's office were invited to Ward's office. The purpose of the meeting, according to Ward, was to "share information." At last, thought Farnsworth, they're going to let us see what they've got. But it turned out that by "sharing information," Ward meant that the local agents should share their information with the federal agents, not the other way around.

The police weren't the only ones who began to wonder whom exactly Brent Ward was collecting this information for. Confidential FBI files were known to have wound up on certain desks in the Church Office Building. Was Ward running a damage-control operation for the Church, sending FBI men out ahead of local police to find out just what the Church's exposure was?

That might explain his bizarre insistence on getting a statement from Hofmann. At a meeting on the afternoon of October 24, Ward's assistant, Bruce Lubeck, demanded a "statement from Hofmann for the files." Bell and Farnsworth and Gerry D'Elia couldn't believe it. They were in the middle of a furious legal battle to compel Nurse Loden to reveal what she had heard in Hofmann's hospital room, and Ward thought that Yengich was going to let Hofmann talk to the cops directly? After the meeting, Bell turned to Farnsworth in disgust. "That's typical. If you don't go down and talk to the suspect so he can tell you to get screwed, they don't feel you've done a complete investigation." Obviously, Ward was reaching—stretching—for excuses not to act.

One thing was obvious from the moment the Church got involved in the case: Brent Ward had no intention of prosecuting anybody for anything related to the bombings. Hofmann was indicted along with Shannon Flynn for possession of the altered Uzi, but a judge quickly set aside that charge pending the outcome of the state's case. Only a few days after the bombings, ATF agents presented their evidence to Ward. They felt confident they had a federal case against Hofmann, at least for possession of a destructive device, a felony that carried a sentence of ten years in prison. They had the physical evidence, they had the letter jacket, they had the witnesses at the Judge Building. Hell, they had more than they had in most possession cases.

But Brent Ward wouldn't touch it.

And the ATF men thought they knew why. "There was too much at stake," one of them said later. "His political career was at stake. Whether he wanted to secure his political base in Utah or to further strengthen his bond with Mormon Senator Hatch—either way, it would not be helpful to put himself in a position where he had to subpoena Gordon B. Hinckley and the other Church officials, or to expose the Church's transactions with Mark Hofmann to the full light of day."

If the Church didn't want the truth out, then neither, it appeared, did Brent Ward. If the Church didn't want this case in the headlines, didn't want to get itself involved in the legal process, who was Brent Ward to put it there? As for his sworn duty to uphold the law, well, there were laws and there were laws. As one investigator on the case saw it: "Brent Ward's got motives above and beyond the law. Do you think a good Mormon in the U.S. Attorney's Office is going to hesitate for one minute deciding to do what's correct for the law or what's best for the Church? This guy was on his way to being a god. Next to that, U.S. attorney looks pretty insignificant."

All Ward would say, when asked about the case, was, "My gut tells me Hofmann didn't do it."

For a while, Ward even refused to convene a grand jury to consider if there was sufficient evidence to indict Hofmann. When finally, under pressure, he did call a grand jury, he kept it on a short leash. Police and prosecutors were excluded from its sessions. Eventually, local officials pressured him into agreeing to allow a prosecutor from the county attorney's office to sit in, but before he could attend his first session, he was informed that "a call had been placed to Washington, and Washington says, 'You can't do that.'"

In fact, he wasn't missing much. Of the more than two hundred people interviewed in connection with the case, only a dozen or so were called before the grand jury. And of those, most were questioned in what would have been considered, in any other federal grand jury room, an unusual way.

"Are you a Mormon?" Al Rust was asked during his session before the grand jury.

"Yes."

"How would you rate yourself as a Mormon between one and ten?"

"I'd like to put it at a nine or a ten, but I'm probably a five or a six."

"Have you been a Mormon bishop?"

"Yes, I have."

Even Rust wondered, "Isn't it kind of strange that religion would be a part of the questioning? What difference should it make?"

Even stranger was the determination of which witnesses would testify before the grand jury.

Despite their centrality to the case, no Church officials were called to testify. When people complained, Ward insisted that there was no need to subpoena them to appear. Instead, he would simply request an appointment at the Church Office Building and interview the officials himself, alone, one on one. No need for grand jury members or oaths or court reporters. And then he, Brent Ward, would decide what parts of the interview were relevant.

Terri Christensen wasn't the only one who suspected that Ward was running interference for the Church. "If you want results from the grand jury," she told him one day, "go subpoena Gordon Hinckley instead of just going along the sidelines and making a show of it. Then you might just find something."

When she stalked out of the room, Ward turned to one of the federal agents and broke into a patronizing smile. "She's a very nice-looking lady," he confided, "but she doesn't seem like a deep thinker."

At the meeting on October 29, no one was surprised when Brent Ward said he wasn't ready to charge Hofmann.

So Hayward was out, Cannon was out, and Ward was out. That meant Hofmann would remain a free man.

Two days later, at seven in the morning, Bell and Farnsworth arrived at the LDS Hospital to escort Mark Hofmann home. His attorney had requested security. After all, there was still a crazed, homicidal Mormon fanatic out there who wanted to kill him.

News of the release had been kept from the press, so Hofmann's Toyota van—the one that Aaron Teplick had picked out of a photo lineup—sat alone in front of the hospital when they arrived. Mark came out in a wheelchair, helped by Bill and Lu Hofmann and Dorie. When they arrived at the house on Marie Avenue, Bell and Farnsworth carried him into the house.

For just a split second, Ken Farnsworth fantasized that he was carrying Hofmann into the state penitentiary at Point of the Mountain—where he belonged. But by now it was clear that if he and Bell were ever going to see that day, they would have to make it happen without help from anyone.

71 Al Rust couldn't believe Mark Hofmann would do anything so terrible. Not that he was perfect, God knows. Certainly no one had more right to complain than Al Rust. He was paying $1,500 a month interest on the $150,000 he had borrowed to invest with Hofmann. He couldn't sell off pieces from his precious Mormon collection because most of that was tied up in the investigation. Besides, the market for Mormonabilia had fallen apart since the bombings. He even had to face the possibility that he would have to sell his house to pay off his debts. Mark's debts.

But bombings? forgeries? Rust just couldn't believe it. "He's not a drunkard," he told himself. "He's not a dope addict. He's not a gambler. He's not a womanizer. None of those things." The police may have already tried and convicted him. But not Al Rust. As a good Christian and a good Mormon, he was going to give his friend the benefit of the doubt.

In fact, he was going to go to the hospital and wish him well—only, when he got there, Mark wasn't receiving visitors.

So, after they released Mark from the hospital, he decided to drop by the house. He called Dorie first.

"Well, how's he doing?" Rust asked, regretting the times he had lost his temper and exploded at Dorie.

"Pretty good," she said.

"Will he have visitors?"

"Yeah. I think he'd like to see you." Rust was pleased that she didn't seem to hold a grudge. Boy, this must be a hard time for her, he thought.

"Why don't you ask him?" he suggested gently.

While she was away from the phone, Rust thought again how wrong they were to suspect Mark of committing those bombings. A moment later she returned. "Yeah, he said he'd like to see you."

So Rust went home and carefully chose a book from his library, one that he felt sure Mark hadn't read, and took it to him.

As soon as he got there, he looked Mark straight in the eyes, and asked him point-blank: "Mark, did you commit these murders?"

"No. I didn't."

Even though he had never believed it, Rust felt a great weight lifted from his shoulders. "Do you know who did?"

"No."

Rust believed that too, but he was still mindful of Mark's shortcomings. "And what about all these lies on the McLellin papers?" he asked.

"Well, right now, I'm confused on the McLellin papers," said Hofmann. "I don't know just how to handle this. But right now I can't talk about the McLellin papers. My lawyer won't let me."

Rust didn't want to let it drop. He wanted to clear the air between them. "Word is that you and I were to deliver them there that day, and you know I haven't seen them, and I don't have them in my safe-deposit box, which is where you told them the papers are."

"I can't talk about that."

"Mark. You know my financial position. Shoot, I had to borrow that hundred and fifty thousand, and we kind of made an agreement that I would get it back within thirty days. It's six months now, and I'm paying fifteen hundred a month interest. I need to recover it."

"No problem," said Hofmann, fidgeting in his wheelchair. "I'm working with my attorney to go back to New York and sell some things."

Rust thought that sounded suspiciously like another Hofmann story. After all this, were they just back to square one? He refused to believe that the pain and suffering Mark had been through hadn't taught him something. Besides, given the condition he was in now, it was wrong to press him on it.

But he did see Mark's civil attorney, Robert Schumacher.

Schumacher told him that there was no plan to go to New York, no plan to sell anything. Mark had lied to him again. "Something's sure wrong here," Rust concluded. "I just keep getting stories." So he filed a lawsuit, a process that produced nothing except the distressing news that Hofmann didn't have a nickel to his name.

Rust visited Hofmann twice more at home, once by himself and once with Mark's attorney. Both times, Mark sat impassively in his La-Z-Boy recliner and listened. Except every once in a while, when Rust caught Mark off guard out of the corner of his eye, he had the most offensive smirk on his face.

But he still didn't believe that Mark was capable of murder.

The day after the third bombing, The Word came down from the offices of the First Presidency.

It was quick, but not quite quick enough. The day of the Hofmann bombing—before the edict filtered down through the Church hierarchy—Detective John Foster, a soft-spoken, self-effacing man with a dry sense of humor, visited Martell Bird in the Church Office Building. He was following up on Hofmann's statement, given almost as soon as he regained consciousness, that he was being tailed by Church Security in a tan pickup truck. Foster told Bird, "Some allegations have been made that Mark had been followed by Church Security."

Bird denied the story adamantly. And he was willing to cooperate with the police in any way necessary to clear himself and his colleagues.

When Foster brought him a list of all the owners of trucks resembling Hofmann's description, Bird pulled out the Church employee records and cross-checked them with Foster's list. They found one "kid," who worked for Church Security, with the same last name as one of the owners on the list. The lead turned out to be a dry hole, but Foster was impressed with Bird's cooperativeness.

Like the way he offered the information about President Hinckley's meeting with Mark Hofmann, a meeting that took place at the unlikely hour of 7:00 A.M. on October 4, less than two weeks before the bombings. Foster didn't have to ask about it. Bird just volunteered it, strangely enough, while emphasizing how little involvement there was between Hofmann and the Church. He considered the meeting "insignificant."

Foster didn't. Despite his laconic humor and easygoing manner, Foster was a good cop, and, like all good cops, suspicious. He found it strange that a man who supposedly had no real involvement with the Church would be visiting its President at seven in the morning—and even stranger that Martell Bird would “blow it off” as insignificant.

“I was curious about it myself,” Bird admitted when Foster pressed him. “So I went and asked President Hinckley about it. President Hinckley told me it was a guy named Mark Hofmann. ‘He came to tell me about some people who had transcripts of the conference agenda,’ he said.” The semiannual Church conference was scheduled for the second week in October. Before each conference, transcripts of the talks to be given by Church officials are prepared and translated into various languages so they will be available at the time of the conference. But they are supposed to remain secret until officially released.

Bird continued: “Hofmann was here to tell President Hinckley that somebody had copies of the transcripts and was about to let them out.” Bird said he had checked the Church Administration Building log and that Mark Hofmann had indeed paid a visit to President Hinckley at the unusually early hour of seven.

When Foster told him about it, Ken Farnsworth was astonished that nobody had bothered to inform the police about the meeting—a meeting that might be crucial to understanding the pressures on Hofmann prior to the bombings. But at the same time, he was encouraged that Martell Bird, apparently, wanted to cooperate. Given the way everybody else was balking, he certainly welcomed the openness.

The next day, The Word came down.

Foster found that out when he officially requested copies of the Church Administration Building log—the log from the First Presidency guard station, not Hinckley’s personal log book. “I’d like to get a copy of that sign-in sheet,” he said, “to show that Mark was there on that day.”

Martell Bird called back a few minutes later. “It wasn’t that day. I was mistaken about the day.” He said it was the latter part of September. He offered to provide a photocopy of the sign-in sheet for the right day.

But when Foster went to pick up the photocopy, every entry except the one relating to Hofmann had been whited out. The day-timer had been copied, then expurgated, then copied again, giving the police no way to determine if relevant entries had been whited out along with irrelevant ones.

When he asked for a photocopy of the sheet for October 4, the date originally mentioned, Bird refused. His attitude had completely changed. Instead of eager and cooperative, he had become cool, suspicious, and recalcitrant. Foster recognized the signs. “Somebody’s told him to shut up, or told him that he shouldn't have ever said anything about it in the first place."

On the same day, Nurse Nancy Loden walked into the county attorney's office with a Church lawyer. The Word, apparently, had also been passed from the boardroom on Temple Square to the boardroom of LDS Hospital. Jim Bell heard from friends on the nursing staff that the higher-ups had been very explicit: "Don't talk to the cops, no matter what happens."

Just how much things had changed didn't hit them until they went to the hospital to serve an investigative subpoena on Hofmann to obtain new fingerprints and photos of his injuries. At the security desk, they were told they would have to explain their business both to the security team and to the hospital administration. Both groups would need to see the paperwork and hear what they needed.

"Is it okay if I call the defense attorneys?" asked the hospital director.

"Okay," said Bell. "You can give them a call, but we're here, and we'd like to do it and get it done and get on with our own work. We've got things to do." Hell, they weren't going to ask him any questions, they just wanted his fingerprints.

But it was another fifteen minutes before the security officer found the time to take them to the area where Hofmann was being kept. And when they arrived, a staff member rushed in front of them with a portable X-ray machine. "Oh, looks like they've got to do some X rays first before we can go in there," said the security guard, like a bit player in a high school drama. "We'll have to wait." They waited, coincidentally, until Yengich's associate, Brad Rich, arrived.

By the time Bell and Farnsworth talked to Hugh Pinnock on December 2, the relationship between the Church and the police had turned from chilly to ice cold. Pinnock seemed to understand that: he shook throughout the meeting. In his fourteen years of police work, Farnsworth had never seen anybody more nervous. In a relatively short fifteen-minute exchange—the primary purpose of which was only to reassure him that they were not "out to get him"—Pinnock drank what seemed like an entire pitcher of water. Bell wondered how he would handle the real interview the following Friday.

In fact, he was a basket case. With Dallin Oaks and the Church lawyer, Oscar McConkie, looking on in dismay, Pinnock led Farnsworth and questioners from the county attorney's office and the FBI on a wild three-hour ride through the last five months of his life.

His chronology was a mess: July, October, August, July, September, August, October. Farnsworth, who had prepared carefully, hardly had a chance to ask a question. He rarely knew what Pinnock was saying. It wasn't until afterward, when he deciphered his notes, that he began to see the gaping holes and inconsistencies.

It wasn't that Pinnock hadn't kept a record. In fact, he had kept a meticulous record, a journal of every phone call, every meeting, with the names of everyone in attendance. He used a personal shorthand, with initials for names, to keep the entries brief, but they were complete—"down to the last sneeze" according to Farnsworth.

So why was the presentation so incoherent?

Because Pinnock didn't have the journal with him.

Farnsworth couldn't believe it. Instead of reading from his journal, Pinnock had copied onto separate sheets of paper all the "relevant" entries. He even positioned them on the paper so they corresponded to the entries in the journal. The result was an incoherent patchwork of secondhand notes. Whenever somebody expressed confusion, Pinnock would simply say, "This is how it's written in my journal, but I don't have the journal here."

Why didn't he have his journal?

"I don't want to show you all those personal things having to do with the Church," he said, shaking just as he had at their last meeting. "I could read from that if I wanted to," he added defensively. "I could do that."

But he never did. He just returned to the cryptic entries and read verbatim, without expression. And if anyone asked him to elaborate, he simply said, "I can't remember."

Not surprisingly, the interview produced few surprises.

In retelling the events immediately following the bombings, Pinnock did seem genuinely touched. Farnsworth noted, "When he's talking with us, he's crying. He was just devastated by this. He wasn't concerned for his own personal safety—he was worried about his wife and kids. You can see him reliving his whole emotions. Talk about confusion, everybody was dying all around him. He didn't know what was going on. It was a hard time for him."

On October 25, Pinnock said, he had paid off Hofmann's loan from First Interstate Bank—$171,243.76. Doing so had wiped out his liquidity. But, he said, "If I hadn't made the referral, the loan wouldn't have been made. It's mine and mine alone."

The Word had finally gotten through to Pinnock: protect the Church.

Farnsworth came out of the interview believing Pinnock's pain was genuine, but little else. "Just not telling all," he wrote in his notes.

The next day, December 7, was Mark Hofmann's thirty-first birthday. Farnsworth, who felt an obligation to keep the victims' families informed, reported the conversation with Pinnock to Terri Christensen, now eight months pregnant. He wasn't surprised by her reaction.

"I am going to go to that man and talk to him myself," she fumed. "I'm tired of all this . . ."—Farnsworth supplied the word crap—" . . . that I'm hearing."

But he talked her out of it. Confronting Pinnock now couldn't do any good, he argued. Even worse, it might put other Church leaders on their guard.

On December 9, Farnsworth interviewed Gordon B. Hinckley.

It had been almost two months since the bombings, two months since Hinckley's name first surfaced in connection with Mark Hofmann's, two months since he became a key figure in a major police investigation. If he had been anybody else, the police would have paid him a visit long ago, before his memory faded, before he had a chance to revise his story to fit with the other stories appearing every day in the newspapers. But Hinckley wasn't just anybody else.

Even without the police badgering him, it hadn't been an easy two months for Gordon Hinckley. Right-wingers in the Council of the Seventy were already meeting and talking in low, frustrated voices about how President Hinckley had mishandled the case. Mark Hofmann had fooled him. Where was his inspiration? Some were already calling him a "fallen leader." Hinckley fired back by circulating a statement within the General Authorities casting himself as a warrior fighting a stupendous, mortal battle against all the forces of Satan (a.k.a. Mark Hofmann) arrayed against him. How lucky the Church was to have escaped with only a little allegation of fraud.

But the militants weren't fooled. They had already begun a whispering campaign: "Hinckley isn't inspired. The Church needs a spiritual cleansing. He should step down."

The last thing he needed now was a police interrogation.

Duffy Diamond, the sergeant of Homicide, wasn't about to send just any detective to do the job. Although not a Mormon, Diamond had enough Irish savvy to know when to take his hat off. He knew the first question out of Hinckley's mouth would be, "Are you a member of the Church?" quickly followed by, "In good standing?" The third question would be, "Where did you do your mission?" It was their standard way of asserting their claim—a claim that transcended anything so temporal as a job.

That's why Diamond picked Ken Farnsworth for the job. He was, to all appearances, a good Mormon, even if he wasn't married. The county attorney's office sent Mike George, one of its investigators, to join him, and an FBI man tagged along. As a Catholic, George didn't think the pomp and circumstance would cow him, but he was wrong. Passing the big Corinthian columns and being led through the hushed, paneled halls, he felt as if he was having an audience with the Pope.

This Pope wasn't above playing power games. Hinckley let them cool their heels in his outer office for half an hour before instructing his secretary to usher them into his presence. His desk was artfully elevated on a platform to make him appear taller. During the interview, he took full advantage of the boost, looking down on his questioners through his cat-eye glasses.

Even Popes, however, need legal counsel. So Hinckley had invited the Church's lawyer, Wilford Kirton, to join them.

The lighting was so subdued, thought Mike George, it could have been a funeral parlor.

Curiously, Hinckley singled out Mike George, the Catholic, for his standard opener: "Are you a member of the Church?" George had to wonder if the Church didn't already have a readout on the religious affiliations of all the key investigators in the Hofmann case.

From the first question, Hinckley never relinquished control of the meeting. Normally, George would have seized the offensive by stalking the room, leaning over the witness's desk, or even sitting on it. But somehow he didn't feel right just getting up and sitting on the desk of the man who ran the Mormon Church—even if it was almost bare.

Not surprisingly, the interview produced no revelations. Hinckley's memory had not improved one jot since the press conference in October.

If anything, the controversy had driven details right out of his head. So many truly important things to worry about. He did have one addition to make to the record. "If you read the transcript of the press conference," he said, "you will see that I said I dealt with two documents with Mark Hofmann, and I couldn't remember the second one. The first was the Josiah Stowell letter. The second one was the David Whitmer letter." (That was a brief document that confirmed the testimony of a witness to the Book of Mormon.) Then he added the real point. "Actually, the Church bought them, and I simply handled the transactions."

Hinckley went on to review his contacts with Hofmann, from the Anthon Transcript to the Kinderhook plates. And, oh, yes, there was something called the McLellin Collection, but he had told Hofmann to take care of Al Rust before he would talk about it. That was the last he could remember hearing about it.

And what about Steve Christensen?

After the press conference at which Hinckley had said he hardly knew Christensen, the police and prosecutors had been flooded with calls from Steve's friends—good, upstanding members of the Church, even a bishop—who said that wasn't true. They were confused and angry. Someone like Hofmann might have exaggerated his relationship with Hinckley, but not Christensen.

Hinckley sighed, clearly signaling his exasperation with answering the same questions again and again. He had met with Steve Christensen one time only, on April 12, 1985, when Mr. Christensen donated the Martin Harris letter to the Church. In other words, for the third time, "I don't know him."

Farnsworth asked if there had been any special blessing conferred on Christensen or if the Church had made any special business agreement with him. Both his wife and his business partner had told Farnsworth about such an agreement. Kirton broke in. "A lot of people have egos and feed off of that stuff. They like to feel that they're very important people."

Farnsworth wanted to say, "Who the hell do you think you are lecturing me, with my job, about human nature?" but said instead, as politely as possible, "Steve was different. Steve wasn't that way. That wasn't his nature, from what I know." He decided to hang them with their own rope. "And he was a bishop. I grew up in the Mormon Church. All of my bishops were honorable people. I had the highest respect for all of them, each and every one. A carpenter, a lawyer, you name it, they were the tops, in my opinion. They always conducted themselves properly, they were always sagacious people."

Kirton sighed. "Ah. We have ten thousand bishops, and they have problems just like everybody else."

Farnsworth said to himself, "I get the picture you're trying to paint here. Steve was just another person. This didn't all happen, and there's no way we're gonna tell you anything about it even if it did."

President Hinckley said he had no further information relevant to the investigation.

When they came out of the building, one of the investigators said under his breath, "Why, that lying son of a bitch." Without blinking, Farnsworth and the FBI man nodded their heads in agreement. George was startled. He was the non-Mormon.

Down at the department, Farnsworth recapped the interview and repeated their assessment of Hinckley. Duffy Diamond agreed. "Those guys think they're dealing with a bunch of dumbbells," he fulminated. "A bunch of dopes. Well, I've got news for them. We ain't no dummies over here."

74 Everyone agreed that it was a good thing Fred Harmon wasn't there to hear Farnsworth's account.

Harmon, a solid family man from Sacramento, California, joined the Hofmann case soon after the bombings. He was the ATF's operations officer, the man who kept track of all the information and gave out assignments. Like Jim Bell, he saw everything.

He arrived a devout Mormon.

Fifteen years before, Harmon had turned to the LDS Church after the crib death of his eight-month-old daughter. With their firm belief in the afterlife and in the reunion of families in the Celestial Kingdom, the Mormons offered Harmon hope and he grasped at it. "If it looks bad," they explained to him in his grief, "it's because you're not seeing the whole picture. If you just have total faith, everything will eventually be made clear."

That lesson had gotten him through his personal tragedy, and in gratitude Harmon had surrendered himself to the Church: studying the gospels—including those of Joseph Smith—raising his children in a devout Mormon household, and living a rigorously Mormon life-style—not an easy thing for an adult convert outside Utah.

Then he began to read the reports.

It was the interviews with Church officials that first made him wonder. What were they covering up? If they were really the victims of a fraud and not the perpetrators, why were they afraid of the truth? But he told himself there had to be an answer. He just couldn't see the whole picture. He just needed to have total faith, and eventually everything would be made clear.

Then he listened to the press conference. He listened closely, hoping he might finally hear from the leaders of his Church the explanations that would make everything right again. Instead, he heard "lie after lie." Dallin Oaks he pegged for an unwitting accomplice. The others had lied to him, Harmon figured. Pinnock was just ambitious. Like a functionary in any organization, he realized that pleasing Hinckley, handling his unpleasant little jobs, was the key to advancement. Pinnock, at least, looked chastened at the press conference. To Harmon, he acted like a man who knew he had erred. He had the grace to look chagrined.

To Fred Harmon, devout Mormon, the real villain was President Gordon B. Hinckley. He saw no chagrin on Hinckley's broad, implacable face. No repentance. No apologies. No admission of wrongdoing. Just arrogance—plain, unbridled arrogance. As far as he was concerned, Hinckley had fallen for Mark Hofmann's blackmail, bought up damaging documents and hidden them away in his private vault, and in so doing, indirectly contributed to the deaths of two innocent people.

And then lied about it. As Harmon saw it, Hinckley had lied outright by saying he had met with Mark Hofmann only casually and with Steve Christensen only once; he had lied indirectly by allowing Church spokesmen to deny that the Church owned documents he had bought. And where did the money come from? If it was the Church's money, what kind of accounting procedures were involved? To whom did Hinckley account, if anybody? Or did Hinckley consider himself answerable only to God?

Fred Harmon, gentle man, loving father, faithful husband, devout Mormon, couldn't contain his anger.

He knew his religion well. Facing temptations and overcoming them were the essence of a religious life. Who was Gordon Hinckley to decide what the members of the Church could or could not know about the Church's history? Who was he to decide what temptations were too tempting?

Hinckley, he concluded, was no different from any other powerful man.

If absolute power corrupts absolutely, surely spiritual power corrupts spiritually.

And what did it say about the Church? If the Church was run by men who told lies, was the Church itself a lie? Harmon refused to believe it. "If it looks bad," he repeated to himself over and over, "it's because I'm not seeing the whole picture. If I just have total faith, everything will eventually be made clear."

But it wasn't. In fact, the more deeply he became immersed in the case, the more interviews he did, the worse the whole picture looked. He could feel his faith slipping away. He began to hate Gordon Hinckley, not just for the arrogance, not just for the lying, but for coming between him and his religion.

Harmon heard that Terri Christensen shared his anger at the leaders of the Church and wanted to talk to her. "My wife is not the type to bite her tongue or keep her silence," Harmon told Ken Farnsworth, "but if I had been in Steve Christensen's place, she would be standing on top of the state capitol building with a megaphone screaming to the world what had been done to me and yelling about the lies that were being told and demanding justice."

But the meeting never took place. Around Thanksgiving, a fellow officer saw Fred Harmon sitting in his car outside the Hall of Justice, alone, sobbing. Soon afterward, he went home.

Back in Sacramento, he met with his stake president and related his ordeal in detail. He didn't have to describe the agony he had been through; it was written all over his face. The stake president listened sympathetically, then said, "There must be something missing. There has to be an explanation. There probably are a lot of things wrong with the administration of the Church, but still there must be an ultimate answer somewhere. You must have more faith."

Poor Fred still lacked total faith.

The Word came down to KSL-TV.

In the lobby of the station's plush new offices on the first floor of the Triad Center, opposite the huge Palladian window, under the massive, brass-studded barrel vault, hung a picture of the chairman of the board of the Bonneville International Corp., the parent company of KSL. It was a picture of Gordon B. Hinckley.

This wasn't the first time The Word had come down to the station. In the 1970s, it had been rocked by a series of scandals over Church intervention in news decisions. Programs considered by Church leaders to be "not in the interests of the faith," programs like "Mormon Women and Depression," had been summarily canceled. Other news stories were axed or modified either directly as a result of pressures from Church officials or because KSL management feared offending them. Scathing memos shot back and forth, journalists accusing the station of "handling stories sensitive to the Church in an arbitrary manner," and devout Mormons on the staff accusing the journalists of Mormon bashing.

Spence Kinard, KSL's news director, remembered it well. Although a devout Mormon himself and an occasional spokesman for the Church, he had resigned over the flap. He even went public with his grievance, telling an AP reporter that he had been under "longtime constant pressure in the news director post" from both the Church and from the station, "concerned about the impact of news stories on its business and ideological concerns."

Since that brouhaha and fearing FCC intervention, the station had tried hard to re-establish its credibility as an independent news source, even luring back Spence Kinard as news director. Reluctantly, the Church accepted the fact that if KSL was going to compete successfully with the two non-Church stations in Salt Lake City, and not run into FCC problems, it would have to be able to report on the state's paramount institution with at least the appearance of objectivity.

But the reality remained largely unchanged. Whenever a reporter forgot to call a Church leader by his title, referring to "Gordon B. Hinckley" rather than "President Gordon B. Hinckley," angry memos would blanket the station like snowflakes on the nearby ski slopes. When KSL reported that a young man who had hijacked a plane out of Salt Lake and demanded a $500,000 ransom was “a former B.Y.U. student,” the Church raised a hue and cry. They didn’t want to have the name of the Church’s university associated with a common criminal.

If such flare-ups were rare, it wasn’t because independent journalism had finally triumphed. If Church officials weren’t jerking KSL’s leash very often, it was because KSL, like every other television station and newspaper in Utah, mindful of its Mormon audience, rarely tested the limits. Stories that cast a negative light on the Church were routinely downplayed.

If anything, the appearance of undue influence at KSL was greater than it had been in the seventies. Gordon Hinckley wasn’t the only key figure with one foot in the KSL newsroom and the other in the Church Office Building. Bruce Lindsay, KSL’s anchorman, although an ardent advocate of journalistic independence, was also the son of Richard Lindsay, chief Church spokesman; and one of the station’s investigative reporters, Lynn Packer, was a nephew to Apostle Boyd Packer. But no one was more intimately tied to the Church than Kinard himself, who delivered “The Spoken Word” for the Church, often introduced the Tabernacle Choir, and sometimes traveled with Church leaders and acted as their spokesman. In addition, everyone suspected that there were two or three “moles” on the news staff who alerted Church officials to anything in the works that might conceivably meet their disapproval.

And nothing met their disapproval like the Hofmann story. After years of a virtual blackout on negative reporting about the Church, it represented what one reporter called “open season on the Mormon Church.” Suddenly, reporters were doing dozens of stories on Church-related issues, sensitive Church-related issues.

And the Church wanted it stopped.

As much as Gordon Hinckley hated the story, Lynn Packer loved it. Tall and dark, with the chiseled good looks of a TV newscaster, Packer, a part-time KSL reporter, rushed into the Hofmann story with full-time abandon. If ever there was a story to investigate, this was it. That he was a Mormon, that his uncle was an Apostle—an ultraconservative one to boot—that he would be, in essence, investigating his own company, all those things only made the story more irresistible. By Utah standards, it was a shocking attitude, but hardly surprising for a reporter who had come of age in the journalistic hothouse of Vietnam as a cub reporter for the military’s internal news operation.

Like any eager reporter, Packer occasionally went beyond the bounds. One Saturday, he called the newsroom from inside the county attorney's office, a place that had been officially declared off limits after reporters were discovered sifting through the office garbage in search of leads.

Eventually, Packer's aggressive reporting helped put KSL in the uncomfortable position of providing some of the most extensive, most in-depth coverage of the Hofmann case. Not because the Church allowed it, not because Spence Kinard approved of it, but simply because KSL couldn't stay away from it. From the standpoint of local TV news, the story had everything: murder, mystery, big money, local characters—everything but sex. It was a certainty that the other two stations in town, both aggressive competitors for market share, would go after the story with everything they had. With November sweeps looming, KSL couldn't afford to concede the story of the decade to the competition just because it made the Church uneasy. Subordinating journalistic ethics to the needs of the Church was one thing; sacrificing market share and advertising revenues was something else entirely.

But there were still limits.

In November, Packer prepared a story that went way beyond those limits. On the basis of extracts from Steve Christensen's letters and journals that had been leaking piecemeal to the press, as well as other sources, Packer put together a report on the relationship between Christensen and Hinckley. Although carefully worded, the story clearly contradicted the version of events that Hinckley had presented at the press conference, particularly the fiction, carefully nurtured by the Church, that Hinckley and Christensen had met only once and remained virtual strangers.

On a morning in November, Packer met with his allies in the newsroom and circulated a draft of the Hinckley piece. It included part of an interview in which Shannon Flynn said he had sat in Hofmann's Toyota MR2 a couple of times when Hofmann was meeting with Hinckley and that, another time, Hofmann carried on a cozy conversation with Hinckley on his car phone while Flynn listened. Everyone agreed it was an important story, but no one was optimistic about its seeing the light of day. "There's no use trying to get it on the air," said Ernie Ford, the assistant news director and managing editor. The problem, everyone agreed, was Kinard, whose approval was needed.

Someone suggested that if they could put their hands on Christensen's journals and letters—the hard evidence—then the station couldn't sit on the story. Embarrassment or not, they would have to air it.

Packer knew that if he tried to push it through now, he would have to reveal his source for Christensen's papers, and within fifteen minutes that information would be on Gordon Hinckley's desk. Hinckley would make a few phone calls, the heat would come down on the source, and they would never see copies of the actual letters and journals.

It had happened before. The day before the Church's press conference, they had prepared a story about a cop who claimed that the Church wasn't cooperating in the investigation and the police were considering subpoenaing documents from the Church. Someone had leaked that to Church officials, who had turned around and put pressure on the station's senior management to kill the story.

They agreed that, for now, the best course was to run only the part of the story relating to Christensen's departure from CFS and to leave the bombshell about Hinckley until more information came out. When word of the story leaked within the newsroom, Packer was approached by another reporter, known to be in regular contact with Church officials.

"Doing such stories would be unwise," he cautioned gravely. "And we shouldn't do them."

"That's why I'm checking it out further," Packer said.

The voice lowered to an ominous whisper. "Care should be taken in making such inquiries."

To Packer, it all sounded familiar.

He had been working for AFVN, the television network for American forces in Vietnam, on the night in 1970 when the military police surrounded a TV station in Saigon and arrested a newscaster. His crime: he had announced, on the air, "All the news you're getting here about the war is censored."

The military didn't officially permit censorship. But the men in charge had other ways of spreading The Word that certain stories were better left unreported. Packer, like the newscaster in Saigon, was among a small group of journalists who weren't playing by the informal rules. For example, the rules said you didn't report incidents of unprovoked hostility against local civilians. It didn't make the American Army look good. So the story of the My Lai massacre broke in the United States two or three days before it broke in Vietnam.

And Lynn Packer was the reporter who broke it.

The army threatened to court-martial him, but after a series of congressional hearings on military censorship, he became part of a compromise deal. The military kicked him and four other men off the network, but they didn't prosecute them for disobeying orders.

So Packer knew how big institutions worked in little ways, mostly painless, invisible ways, to cover their big crimes.

The Hinckley story never ran.

Packer also did a story about Hugh Pinnock and the loan at First Interstate. Kinard viewed the tape and said it didn't add up to much. And he didn't trust Packer's source.

Packer argued that the same journalistic suspicion should be directed at the General Authorities. "That's the role of a journalist—to treat information skeptically and check it out no matter who said it, whether it's Hinckley or Hofmann."

The argument was lost on Kinard. As far as he was concerned, it was only further proof of what he had suspected all along, that Packer was out to get the Church.

Ernie Ford called Packer in to let him know what kind of havoc his stories were causing. "You're getting us all in trouble." Surely he remembered Kinard's tantrum when another reporter, Con Psarras, did one Hofmann story too many. "Goddam it, you guys are trying to cost me my job," he yelled in the middle of the newsroom. "You are out to attack the Church!"

Packer suddenly realized that the heat on the station management from the Church was far worse than he had imagined.

Don Gale, the vice president for news of Bonneville International Corp., took the opportunity to express his view that Pinnock had acted alone in helping to arrange the First Interstate loan, perhaps even against the feelings of the more senior General Authorities on how the matter should be handled.

The Pinnock story never ran.

Finally, Kinard and the station's senior management tried a more general deterrent. They decided that the station had been running too many Hofmann stories. One day, Kinard looked at the calendar of proposed Hofmann stories and said, "That's ridiculous!" Soon afterward, the station officially limited the number of stories it would do. "The public doesn't understand the difference between the documents story and the murder story," said Don Gale in an effort to explain the move. From now on, Kinard would personally review all stories relating to the Hofmann case.

Eventually, word leaked out to other news organizations that the reporters at KSL were complaining that their stories weren't getting on the air.

One reporter called a KSL staffer and offered to act as an intermediary. "I hear KSL has a hell of a lot of information they won't let you use," he said. "Our station could take the information and put it on the air without saying where it came from."

"I'm unhappy," the reporter admitted, "but we still hope the story will get on the air."

At the first inconspicuous opportunity, Lynn Packer was fired.

76 When November came and went and still no charges were filed—against Hofmann or anybody else—Bell and Farnsworth could feel the public turn against them.

The press was having a field day. Bored with the Hofmann angle, they had made it into a story of police incompetence, of bewildered and desperate investigators grabbing at straws, manufacturing evidence, and hounding innocent citizens. An article in the January Utah Holiday recounted, inaccurately, Farnsworth's encounter with the nurse at Hofmann's bedside that first night. It quoted an unnamed policeman as telling Mark directly, "You son of a bitch. This is what you deserve, and we're looking forward to getting you out of here so you can be executed."

Another issue of the same magazine accused the police of not running a "thorough investigation." It also reminded them that vast numbers in the community doubted whether Hofmann was guilty at all. "As Utah Holiday went to press in December with the article," it pointed out, "Mark Hofmann had not been charged with murder, and police sources said that investigators are still scrambling for enough solid evidence to make charges stick. Friends and associates of Hofmann claim it is ludicrous to believe that a man of Hofmann's impeccable credentials—religious and professional—could bomb his former associates. Some people close to Hofmann believe he was 'set up' as a suspect."

Picking holes in the police case had become a kind of local pastime. The eyewitness had said the suspect was wearing a jacket with brown sleeves, and Hofmann's jacket had gray sleeves. The witness said he had a mustache, but Mark was clean-shaven. One witness said he wasn't wearing glasses, but Mark always wore glasses, and on and on.

Over at the Tribune, Mike Carter, a friend of Ron Yengich's, had a field day with the biggest hole of all: motivation. "Sources close to the investigation say detectives have not yet come up with a scenario that would explain the second bomb that claimed the life of Mrs. Sheets," Carter wrote on October 26, "or a third device that exploded and critically injured Mr. Hofmann a day after the killings."

Carter didn't think much of the police explanation that Christensen was killed because he had uncovered evidence of Hofmann's double-dealing or of the McLellin Collection scam (by now, it was generally accepted that the Collection never existed), or the even more incredible theory that the Sheets bomb was intended merely as a diversion, to make the killings look CFS-related. "If that is the case," wrote Carter, "they are left with no viable explanation as to the target of the third bomb that exploded in Mr. Hofmann's car."

When the police composite leaked to the press, there were howls of derision. No one thought it looked like Hofmann. Bell and Farnsworth knew the problem: the public watched too much television. They were used to the portrait composites they had seen on police dramas. By real police standards, John Johnson's composite was pretty damn good, they thought. It had Hofmann's chin. Besides, the purpose of a composite wasn't to make a positive I.D., it was to exclude false suspects. But that distinction was lost on a press and public raised on "Dragnet" and "The Rockford Files."

Meanwhile, Mark's neighbors eagerly fanned the flames of public outrage over police incompetence. One told a sheriff's deputy that Mark was at home at the time of the bombing. "It doesn't matter if he was there or not," she went on to say, "because you've got the wrong guy. You're crucifying him. I'll go into court and lie for him if I have to."

Even some cops were beginning to have their doubts. It was a well-known maxim in the department that if you didn't nail a suspect in the first month of an investigation, you weren't going to nail him. And they had passed that deadline weeks ago. Hundreds of detectives had spent thousands of hours and hundreds of thousands of dollars, and they didn't have a whole lot more on him than they did only three days into the case.

The police knew the case was in trouble when they saw their hard-nosed chief, Bud Willoughby, walking through the office with a piece of string wound around his finger, holding it up in different directions trying to pick up “vibrations.” Apparently, Gwen Wilcox, a psychic Willoughby consulted occasionally, had told him that this procedure might turn up some missing clues in the Hofmann case.

If anybody still doubted that the police were hounding an innocent man, Hofmann’s attorney, Ron Yengich, was always there to drive the point home.

Every time Bell and Farnsworth went to search the Hofmann house, Yengich and the press showed up soon thereafter. At a search on Sunday, November 3, the police offered to stay in their cars until Dorie could arrange for someone to take care of the children. When Yengich arrived, Farnsworth gave him a receipt for the search warrant.

“What’s up, Ken?” Yengich asked informally.

“We found some more information in the laboratory, and we need to do another search. Here’s your warrant.” It listed the specific items they were looking for. “This is what it’s all about. Any questions?” Yengich said no.

Later, while the police were still searching, a reporter asked Farnsworth for an interview.

“We don’t have anything to say,” Farnsworth said firmly.

But Yengich did. That night, Farnsworth saw him with the same reporter on the evening news. He was complaining that the police have been here twice before and they’re here again. They can’t get it right. They just keep coming back. I don’t know what they’re after this time. Beats me.

Farnsworth hit the ceiling. He had shown Yengich the warrant. Yengich knew exactly what they were after. It was all simply a play for sympathy, an attempt to make people believe that the police were pestering the Hofmanns, that they didn’t have a case so they were digging for something that wasn’t there.

And, worst of all, it worked.

A few days later, Bell and Farnsworth saw Bill Hofmann on TV telling reporters that the police were fabricating evidence to make the case against his son: that no matter how hard they searched, they couldn’t find the evidence, because it didn’t exist, so they were making it up.

And if that wasn’t enough, Bill Hofmann then had a revelation from God that his son was innocent.

Soon afterward, Dorie Hofmann called Brent Ashworth’s wife, Charlene, and told her Mark had been on a mission to locate Mormon documents and that the Devil was bringing him down. She swore that Mark had been with her the entire night before the first bombings and couldn't possibly have been the bomber. He was on a mission, and the forces of evil were combining against him.

When he heard the story, Farnsworth decided that, by the forces of evil, Dorie must have meant him and Jim Bell.

In mid-November, Yengich called David Raskin at the University of Utah. Raskin was the dean of American polygraphers, or, as he preferred to call them, "human psychophysicologists." He had done the polygraphs for Patty Hearst and John De Lorean, as well as a host of defendants whose results on the test had not been revealed to the public.

Yengich wanted him to perform a test on Mark Hofmann.

Raskin, a full-bearded, academic looking man, may have wondered if it was appropriate for Yengich to be doing business with him at that moment, because Yengich was also representing him in a civil suit. But that would have meant questioning one of the most prominent defense attorneys in town, and the bulk of his business came from defense attorneys.

They agreed that the test would be performed in Yengich's office by Raskin's associate, Charles Honts. Everything was done with the utmost confidentiality, of course. Everyone knew the drill. If the defendant passed the test, the defense attorney would call a press conference, shout the results, and heap praise on the test and the examiner. If the defendant failed, the test would never see the light of day. For obvious reasons, even the fact that he had taken a test would be kept secret. That was what happened when he tested Ted Bundy—and dozens of other defendants. One of the reasons for the polygraph's bad rap, Raskin often said, was that the public only heard about it when a defendant passed the test. Yet in the vast majority of cases, he didn't.

On November 13, Honts showed up at Yengich's office. He was a huge man, six feet, four inches tall, well past two hundred pounds, huge face, huge belly, and a corona of sandy-colored hair and beard, looking like a cross between a mountain man and an absent-minded professor. Hofmann was already there. Honts began with the usual pretest interview in which he asked about the events surrounding the three bombings a month before. Hofmann denied any direct involvement in the bombings except for being a victim of one of the blasts.

Then Honts hooked Mark up to a four-channel Lafayette Polygraph machine, Model 76163, which recorded on a single strip chart Mark's finger-pulse amplitude (flow of blood through the fingers), relative blood pressure, thoracic respiration (breath rate), and skin resistance (sweating on his hands—usually the most telling indicator).

The test itself was divided into three groups of questions: control questions, filler questions, and relevant questions. The control questions were designed to elicit a “violent” response even from innocent subjects, questions like “Have you ever broken the law?” or “Have you cheated on your income taxes?” These questions, supposedly, established a standard for “guilty” responses. The filler questions were innocuous inquiries designed to elicit a passive response, even from guilty subjects. They established the standard for “innocent” responses.

The relevant questions were the real test. Honts had already gone over them with Hofmann during the pretest interview, but there was still palpable tension in the room when he began to ask them with the machine humming and scratching.

“Before it exploded, did you know there was a bomb in your car?”

“No.”

“Did you plant either of the bombs that exploded on October 15?”

“No.”

“Did you, yourself, cause any of the bombings of October 15 and 16?”

“No.”

Through it all, Hofmann remained completely calm.

In accordance with Utah state law, Honts went through the three sets of questions—control, filler, and relevant—three times.

After the third round, Honts stroked his wild beard. Hofmann’s results were inconclusive. Something about the scores bothered Honts. There were too many inconsistencies. He wanted to go through the questions a fourth time. From the psychological profile, he knew Hofmann was clever. And he was holding his legs together in a strange, awkward way. Could he have read David Lykken’s book, A Tremor in the Blood, that explains how to fool a polygraph? Or was Honts just imagining things?

Could Hofmann be a pathological liar? There was evidence that psychopaths and sociopaths could beat the test, but Honts dismissed it. He felt that psychopaths take so much pride in their lying and get so much pleasure from it, that their physiological pleasure responses are almost identical to the “healthy” defendant’s guilty responses. He and Raskin had done some studies on the accuracy of polygraphs on psychopathic subjects and determined, not surprisingly, that they were in fact quite accurate. After all, Ted Bundy had failed the test.

But the fourth time around, all Honts’s doubts were cleared up.

Hofmann was telling the truth.

When Honts announced the good news, Yengich couldn't wait to share it with the world.

At 5:15 the same day, John Harrington, a reporter for KTVX, Channel 4, received a call from Yengich's associate, Brad Rich. "I'm gonna tell you something, but it's embargoed until after six," he said, "because we promised it to Channel 2 first. We want them to have it first, because we promised, but you should be aware that Mark took a lie detector test and passed it with flying colors."

"Why are you telling me this at 5:15?" asked Harrington.

"Well, I just thought you needed to know."

Harrington hung up. He was steaming mad. What kind of reporter did Yengich and Rich think he was? Did they really think they could call up with a story fifteen minutes before the early evening news went on the air and he would not run it? Did they think Harrington would sit on it until after six?

Harrington immediately typed up a story to the effect that the defense had secretly announced that Mark Hofmann had passed a lie-detector examination and had leaked it to another news station on an exclusive basis. In the report, he quoted Rich saying that the story was confidential and off the record. "This is just something you need to know," he quoted Rich. "But we're embargoing it."

And they ran it on the next news program as a hot flash.

The next day Rich pretended to be piqued, but Harrington already knew he had been tricked. If Yengich and Rich hadn't intended for him to use the story, Rich wouldn't have given him the story. By making it the subject of a rivalry between the stations, he had turned it into big news.

And it was big news. Honts went on television and said it right out: Mark passed his polygraph. He was telling the truth when he denied knowing a bomb was in his car and denied planting the bombs that exploded on October 15. Then Rich went on. Hofmann is innocent, he said. Go look for somebody else. Then Bill Hofmann went on. My son didn't do it, he insisted again, more plausibly this time. I asked him, and he said he didn't. And look, he passed the polygraph. So he isn't lying.

At the police department, the switchboard lit up. Every police witness, and every member of the victims' families, every reporter called demanding an explanation: If Mark was guilty, how had he passed the test?

Jim Bell, who had taken a polygraph test as part of his police training and failed repeatedly, explained that there were ways to fool a polygraph, like putting something between your toes and pressing on it. Or simply focusing your mind on some irrelevant thought. Ken Farnsworth explained to Terri Christensen that Hofmann's medical condition could have interfered with the test. "With major damage to his leg, he might be on medication that could alter the results. Besides which, from the best we can tell, Mark is a sociopathic liar. He could probably walk right through a test because he has no fear of it. And if there's no fear, there's no test." Terri was easier to reassure than the others. She knew Mark Hofmann was guilty. Her only question was how a guilty man could pass the test.

At the county attorney's office, Gerry D'Elia railed against polygraphers. "They're so full of shit it comes out of their ears." "Give us the charts," he yelled at Rich. "Let us read them. You've administered the test. We don't care what the test shows, just let us interpret it. Let's see what the control questions are." But Yengich never released them.

The next day, D'Elia said to Brad Rich, "I bet the results surprised you a lot more than they surprised me."

The next week, Dorie Hofmann took the test in the conference room of Yengich's offices. Unlike her husband, she was terrified. Honts asked her if Mark had been with her the entire night before the bombings. She said yes.

She, too, passed the test.

When Carl Lundquist heard the news about his old friend Mark Hofmann, he remembered a conversation they had had one night many years ago after stopping at the Safeway to buy some doughnuts and a Coke. It was another of their stimulating, free-ranging talks about everything from religion to nuclear war.

"Do you think you could trick a lie-detector test?" Mark asked.

"I don't know," said Lundquist.

"Well, I think I could. I know how they work, and to trick one, all you'd have to do is train your brain and your thinking to do what you want it to. If you're ultimately in control of yourself, you could tell the lie detector anything, and it would register as a truth."

77

Duck-hunting season came and went, and Jim Bell missed it. He couldn't even find time for jogging. Instead, he hibernated in the Hofmann "war room," developed a passion for Crackerjack, and put on weight. So did Ken Farnsworth, who hadn't been out to the department shooting range since the day of the bombings. The paranoia and night sweats returned, for the first time since his undercover days. He started leaving his gun on the nightstand next to his bed again, a habit that had taken him six months to break after the sting operation. It wasn't the physical danger, it was the anxiety.

He didn't get to play much basketball either. The one time he did, it was a pickup game, one-on-one with Ron Yengich in the department basketball court next to the evidence rooms.

They couldn't get away from the case.

But they couldn't talk about it either. There had been so many leaks from the department, from the sheriff's office, from the county attorney's office, from the defense counsel, that Bell and Farnsworth barely spoke to each other anymore.

Hell, they couldn't even talk to Chief Willoughby about it. In the first weeks of the investigation, Bell had briefed Willoughby almost every day, sometimes two or three times a day. "You don't talk to your lieutenant, you don't talk to your captain," the chief had told him. "You just come and talk to me." The discussions had been outrageously frank, Willoughby not being the kind of man to stand on rank.

But one day Willoughby called him in to say he didn't want to know what was going on anymore. He didn't want anyone to be able to accuse him of leaking information to the press. "I don't want you and Ken to be neutered by the people across the street," Willoughby said, referring to the county attorney's office. "I don't want them to say, 'We can't share information with you because you've got to tell the chief, and we think he's telling everybody.' " Their daily meetings stopped. That's how paranoid everybody was.

Bell couldn't even go home and talk to his wife, Patti. Even if he could, his thoughts were so deep into the minutiae of the case, she wouldn't begin to understand. It got to the point where he broke into a sweat if he thought she was going to ask him a question about it. He knew he would either say nothing or go on for five hours. Either disappear or explode. He would come home, always late, and just stare at the wall. He would go to bed and not sleep.

The entire case was in his head. In the beginning, they tried a computer program to organize all the information, all the leads and rumors and possibilities, but it proved woefully inadequate to the task. So Bell's head remained the computer. At times, he was afraid that if he broke his concentration even for a minute, the whole case would disintegrate. No wonder he couldn't sleep.

Or he would wake up in the middle of the night with a thought that he had to write down, one more memorandum to assign, one more question for one more cop to ask one more witness. And when he couldn't get back to sleep, he would dress and drive down to the Hall of Justice to join the graveyard shift of rookies, sifting through the mountains of evidence.

When Farnsworth stole a day to attend a family get-together, he couldn't sit down to dinner without his mother or his sister or his brother or his niece or someone asking him something he couldn't tell them about the Hofmann case. Or, even worse, volunteering advice: "You've got the wrong guy. I watch TV, and your case against Hofmann doesn't look good."

Around the eighth floor war room, the humor only came in black. Kyle Jones brought in some fortune cookies in the shape of white salamanders, each one labeled with the name of one of the cops working the case. Inside were fortunes from FU-LING-YU: "Office space available in Judge Building, real cheap."

It was a sign of the times that the only diverting moments were provided by another murder case, the first to come their way since the night of October 15. In the middle of a jealous spat, a twenty-nine-year-old Mexican woman accidentally killed her sixty-two-year-old lover by beating him to death with a pair of Sears binoculars.

But the next day, it was back to overtime in the war room, back to what Bell had dubbed "the royal pain in the butt": Mark Hofmann.

It didn't take a close friend to notice that the case was taking its toll on Jim Bell. Old "Stretch" just wasn't the congenial guy he used to be. He yelled at friends, snapped at subordinates, ate nothing but junk food, and looked like hell.

They could only imagine what was happening at home.

In fact, it was worse than they imagined. Patti tried to maintain her own grueling schedule as an emergency-room nurse while assuming full responsibility for keeping the family and the household going. Even under the best of circumstances, it would have been trying. But the Bells had recently sold a video rental shop, and there was still a drawerful of paperwork to be taken care of. And there was Steven, their second child. The doctors suspected that he had cystic fibrosis. More than once, he became so short of breath that Patti had to rush him to the hospital in the middle of the night. Where was Jim at these moments of crisis? Where he always was, down at the Hall of Justice, working late on the Hofmann case.

Patti was a strong, self-reliant woman, but there was a point beyond which even she couldn't bend. One day she called Ken Farnsworth, desperate and sobbing. "When is this going to be over?" she cried. "I can't take it anymore. I never see him. He doesn't know his kids. When is this going to be over?"

78 But they kept working. The city stopped paying overtime, ATF cut its contingent by half, the sheriff's office wouldn't show up for meetings, the U.S. attorney wouldn't share information with them, the press ridiculed them, Ron Yengich reviled them, and Bill Hofmann seemed to be accusing them of conspiring with the Devil, but they kept working, clinging to the hope that maybe the next search, the next interview, the next lead, would convince somebody to charge Hofmann with something.

Ever since Jerry Taylor told them that the bomb had been made with C-cell-battery packs from Radio Shack, they had been trying to track down the clerk who sold them to Hofmann. There were nineteen Radio Shack stores in Salt Lake City alone, and each of those had thousands of receipts for September and October. And maybe Hofmann used an alias, so they had to try for every possible variation on Mark Hofmann, including any name with the initials M. H. And maybe someone else, an accomplice, bought the stuff for him, so they had to check for Brent Metcalfe, Shannon Flynn, and Lyn Jacobs, and possible variations on those names.

At first, they hoped they might find a shortcut through the huge sea of paperwork. Bell called the parent company in Dallas, Texas, and discovered that all the receipts were computerized. Theoretically, anyone who bought anything at Radio Shack had his or her name added to a computer mailing list. In reality, however, it wasn't that easy. When they ran the names Bell gave them through the computer, they came up empty. Sometimes, a name doesn't make it onto the list, they explained. A clerk forgets to write it in.

So they went back to the stores.

At the very first one they visited, the Cottonwood Mall branch, an ATF officer found a receipt for a battery pack and a mercury switch. The name on the receipt: Mike Hansen—the same name Bell had found in Hofmann's papers. The customer had given a false Salt Lake City address—a vacant lot. The lot was about a mile and a half from Hofmann's home. The next day, at the same store, they found a second receipt, also made out to Mike Hansen, with a different address, also false.

For a few days, the results looked encouraging.

Then they found a clerk who routinely made up names to avoid his boss's wrath when he forgot to enter the customer's real name on the receipt. One of the names he used most often: Mike Hansen.

They tried the search in reverse, pulling out all the receipts for mercury switches and tracking down all the buyers. From September 1 to October 15, thirty-seven mercury switches had been sold between the Idaho border and Spanish Fork, Utah, between Nevada and Wyoming. They tracked down and cleared as many as they could, thirty-two. Of the remaining five, three were eliminated for other reasons, one was sold with a D-cell-battery pack to an M. Hansen, and one with two C-cell-battery packs to their old friend, Mike Hansen.

But how could they prove Mike Hansen was really Mark Hofmann?

The first step was to prove that he wasn't anybody else. To do that, they had to contact every Mike Hansen in the state of Utah to see, first, if one of them had made the Radio Shack purchases, and second, if he matched the description of the man seen carrying the bomb into the Judge Building the morning of Steve Christensen's killing. Using the telephone book, drivers' license directories, and Polk consumer directories, they had made a list of fifty people in the Salt Lake City area alone. It was a long, slow process—they always seemed to be about three addresses behind—and it had only just begun.

While still in the hospital, Hofmann had said that he left his car door locked the day he returned to find the bomb on the seat. So if Hofmann was telling the truth, the bomber must have broken in.

But what if that particular car was jimmy-proof? It wouldn't prove Hofmann was the bomber, but it would shoot another hole in his story.

The Wagstaff Toyota dealership could not have been more helpful. The manager gave them the pick of his cars, and they put their best lock man on the job—a man who popped cars every day of the week with slim-jims. With a video camera rolling, he went to work, scratching and banging at the lock until the car was a mess. But the door wouldn't open. He finally had to take the entire door panel off and study the lock mechanism before he could get into the vehicle.

They offered to pay the Toyota man for the damage but he said not to worry, he would take care of it.

When they got back to the department, they discovered that Hofmann's MR2 was a 1984 model. They had been working on a 1985. So they went back to the Toyota man for another car. But the result was the same: one more frustrated locksmith, one more torn-up car, and one more Hofmann lie.

Toyota also provided a list of six hundred people in Utah who owned vans like Hofmann's. Bell was determined to interview all six hundred, but that would take all winter.

Hofmann had also said that he was driving around in Emigration Canyon on the morning of October 16, before the third bombing. Then Shannon Flynn confessed that he and Hofmann had shot their Uzi up in Emigration Canyon. Then they discovered that Mark had been looking at a house in Pinecrest Canyon, an offshoot of Emigration Canyon. Maybe he had done other things up there. Like build bombs.

On November 23, Farnsworth and a team of detectives canvassed Pinecrest Canyon, which was dotted with rustic cabins and isolated estates. There was only one way to do it: knock on every door up and down the two-mile canyon.

They found a sixteen-year-old girl who had been riding home on a school bus when she saw a car just like Hofmann's MR2 parked in front of a shed near a Swiss chalet-style house—the house Hofmann had considered buying. Later, at the Hall of Justice, she repeated the story to the police. Both she and her mother knew of the Hofmann investigation and were terrified at being dragged into it, but felt duty-bound to help however they could. Farnsworth found that a refreshing attitude.

The girl also led them to another student, a ninth-grade boy, who had been sitting on the right side of the bus and saw the open shed. When they talked to him, he said he noticed it because every other day when the bus drove past, the shed had been closed. He, too, was nervous about being a part of the Hofmann investigation.

Like the girl, he told them they should talk to the bus driver.

The bus driver had actually seen Mark Hofmann—or somebody who fit Hofmann's description. "He actually walked right in front of the bus, as if he wasn't paying attention to what he was doing," said the driver, a sharp, dark-haired man from Kamas. "He was so deep in concentration. I almost hit him." Then he gave them the precise time of the incident.

How did he remember the precise time?

He drove the same route every day, and he knew what time it was by where he was on the route.

There was only one problem. He said it happened on Tuesday, the day of the first bombings, not Wednesday, when Hofmann said he was there.

On December 4, they did the drains. Because they hadn't found the mercury switch or wires used in the bomb that destroyed Hofmann's car, they decided to dredge the gutters near where the car had been parked. They started at nine in the morning. It was filthy, cold, back-breaking work. And it turned up nothing.

For Bell and Farnsworth, the investigation had hit rock bottom.

One more time, Jim Bell made his pitch. "There might not be enough evidence to take the Hofmann case to court yet. But at least we should get the ball rolling. Let's arrest Mark. Let's get the warrants. Let's get it started. If we arrest him, it will generate confidence in the case. It will bring witnesses out of the woodwork. And at least it will get the community off our backs. If we don't file soon, we'll never be able to convince anybody that there's a case."

But Bell was wasting his breath. The man on the other side of the table wasn't even listening.

Bob Stott, the deputy county attorney, rarely listened. It was his way of controlling a conversation. No matter how short or simple the explanation, Bob Stott always had to hear it one more time. After an hour-long explanation of a complex case, he was always the one who asked a question that took the discussion back to square one. "You have to pull him through a case by the nose," says a colleague.

Bell and Farnsworth had hoped, prayed, in fact, that the day would never come when they would have to lead Bob Stott by the nose through this case. At first, it looked as if Gerry D'Elia, the street-savvy prosecutor from back East, would take the case into court. He had arrived at the bombing scenes soon after the police and had stuck with the case ever since, assisting the searches and fighting the legal battle with Nurse Loden. Unlike so many people, he had done everything he could to make the investigation easier, not harder. They liked him. He was a cop's lawyer, quick-thinking, kick-ass, combative.

Or if not D'Elia, then David Biggs, a dapper young prosecutor who had joined the county attorney's office only five months earlier. Like D'Elia, he had worked with the cops from the beginning. They hadn't always seen eye to eye. Biggs, in particular, didn't think they had enough on the Sheets murder for an arrest, and he wasn't shy about telling them so, but at least he pulled in the same direction.

Not Bob Stott. He just looked at them with his startling cerulean-blue eyes and tilted his big round head to one side in what could have been either a nervous tic or a sign of total incomprehension.

Stott told people that as a youngster growing up in a devout Mormon family in Geneva, Utah, he had developed his verbal skills as a way of besting his belligerent brother. "I could never win the physical battles, so I had to try to win the other ones." But it took only five minutes of listening to him in the courtroom to know that his verbal skills had never won any battles. He mispronounced words, rambled incoherently, dangled participles, mangled syntax, and, despite mighty efforts, often failed to get subject and verb to agree. With all that, the fact that he often forgot names—not just personal names but simple nouns too—went almost unnoticed. Although no one in the office would forget the day when, in the middle of a trial, he forgot the defendant's name.

No, Bob Stott became a lawyer because lawyers were in control. Or at least that was the impression he got from watching Perry Mason. In nine years at the Salt Lake County Attorney's Office, he had worked his way into a supervisory position where he had control both over cases and over other lawyers. In court, he was a plodder. Determined to maintain control, he spent hundreds of hours preparing for every possible contingency, writing out every question and every conceivable answer beforehand on yellow legal pads.

If the case was simple and everything went according to plan, he looked good. Juries sometimes took to his low-key manner and workmanlike approach. Sometimes, they just felt sorry for him. "If you put the proper makeup on him, and do his hairstyle for him, and walk him into the courtroom, and tell him everything he has to say, then he can do a good job," says a colleague. "But set him on his own, and he can't organize a ham sandwich."

Of course, as a supervisor, Stott made sure to pick and choose his cases and control his work load in such a way that he always looked good.

Still, Stott had helped prosecute a variety of famous defendants during his nine years at the county attorney's office, including Ted Bundy, the serial murderer; Ervil LeBaron, the fanatic polygamist; Joseph Paul Franklin, the white racist; and, most recently, Ronnie Lee Gardner. Gardner was already on trial for murder when, using a gun slipped to him in the courthouse by an accomplice, he tried to shoot his way out, killing one man and wounding several others in the process.

It was an impressive record, and no one was more impressed with it than Bob Stott. Others may have considered him slow-witted and dull, but Bob Stott considered himself a very successful advocate—he was the best lawyer on the county payroll and he wasn't shy about saying so. In his eagerness to demonstrate his superiority, in fact, he had more than once appropriated credit for brilliant ideas that originated elsewhere on his staff—a practice that won him no friends among his colleagues.

In fact, it was Bob Stott's vanity that had gotten him into the Hofmann case in the first place.

At first, he didn't want it. As a devout Mormon—a very devout Mormon—the last thing he could have wanted was a case that involved the Mormon Church. From the second day, anyone could see that this case was filled with trapdoors. As lead prosecutor, he would have to interview leaders of the Church who most definitely did not want to be interviewed. God forbid, he might even have to subpoena Church records and, even worse, call Church leaders to testify in court. The thought of putting President Gordon B. Hinckley on the witness stand in a murder trial was enough to give Bob Stott chills.

On the other hand, it was the case of the century, the highest-profile case ever to come along, and if Bob Stott didn't take it, somebody else would. And it would be his feather, not Stott's. Inevitably, he would lose some status—and that, too, was enough to give Bob Stott chills.

For the first month of the investigation, he tried not to commit himself, tried to stand back and see where the case was going, letting D'Elia and Biggs work with the police and take the heat. If it turned out the Church wasn't that deeply involved after all, he could always jump in and grab the case without taking the risks.

Eventually, vanity won out over caution.

By mid-November, County Attorney Ted Cannon had to have an answer. The case was getting complicated, both legally and politically, and D'Elia and Biggs were getting too far out in front. Soon, it would be impossible to turn the case over to Stott, even if he wanted it. "Today is it," Cannon told Stott on November 18. "You've got to stop kidding around. Either you want to be the case manager as far as the county attorney's office is concerned, or it's going to be Gerry D'Elia. But whichever way, I'm going to have the decision by 4 o'clock."

Stott chose to interpret Cannon's ultimatum as a plea. He needed his "best man" on the Hofmann case, and there was no doubt in Bob Stott's mind who the best man was.

"Please, Bob, tell us exactly what you want in order to file a complaint on Hofmann." Jim Bell tried not to sound as if he was begging, but it was hard not to betray his frustration.

Stott couldn't give them an answer—or wouldn't.

So he and Farnsworth went back to the war room and sat around in stunned silence. What could they do, that they hadn't done already, to get the county attorney's office off its butt to file a case? Someone suggested that perhaps the problem was partly theirs. Perhaps they had made the case too complicated. Perhaps Stott didn't really understand it. Perhaps they hadn't done enough to make it understandable. Maybe it was all just a failure to communicate.

If the prosecutors wouldn't put together the case against Hofmann, then the police would do it for them. They would show them in the clearest possible terms exactly what they had to work with.

So that's what they did. A group of ten or twelve officers directly involved in the investigation—about half police, half ATF agents—sat down in front of the chalkboard and listed the evidence against Hofmann item by item:

- 1) Two eyewitnesses who saw him carrying the bomb.
- 2) The letter jacket found in his home corresponding to the eyewitnesses' description.
- 3) Robert Pitts's statement that Hofmann was in Christensen's office one week prior to the bombing and they were arguing.

- 4) A witness who saw Hofmann wearing his letter jacket the day of the bombing.
- 5) Jerry Taylor's rock-solid conclusion that the three bombs were distinctive and consistent.
- 6) Hofmann clearly holding the bomb in his car.
- 7) Crease on his pants showing that his position in the car was not what he said it was at the time of the third bombing.
- 8) Brad Carter's statement that Hofmann was inside the car at the time of the bombing—also inconsistent with Hofmann's statement.
- 9) Aaron Teplick's identification of Hofmann's van in front of the Sheets house the morning of the bombings.
- 10) The Radio Shack receipt for a mercury switch purchased by an M. Hansen, and the Mike Hansen envelope in Hofmann's office.
- 11) Shannon Flynn's testimony that Hofmann was knowledgeable in the use of explosives.
- 12) A Radio Shack catalog found in Hofmann's house in which someone had circled the type of C-cell-battery pack used in the bombs.

Next they made a second list outlining the case for Hofmann, Yengich's case, all the holes and hurdles prosecutors would face if they indicted Hofmann immediately. They typed up both lists and made copies for everybody. Then Bell called the county attorney's office and asked for a rehearing, with the whole staff: Cannon, Stott, D'Elia, the works. It was do-or-die time.

A few days later, Bell and Farnsworth led a contingent back across the street to the county attorney's office and made their pitch again. Unlike Stott, Cannon, a genial, white-haired man with an off-center sense of humor, welcomed them. He inquired about the status of the effort to compel Nurse Loden to testify (the Utah Supreme Court was scheduled to hear the appeal) and seemed to share their determination to bring the case to trial soon. For the first time since the case began, Farnsworth felt as if the police department and the county attorney's office were working on the same team.

"By golly," said Cannon, "we still have to work on the Sheets case, but I think we can get a conviction on the Christensen case." To the cops' ears, it was music. Finally, someone agreed that they had a prosecutable case. Farnsworth wrote in his notes of the meeting: "It worked out really well. . . . They were being so difficult a couple of days before because Bob Stott was running the case."

Optimism was still running high the following Monday when Cannon called Chief Willoughby to say, "We can convict Hofmann on the Christensen case.” Even the Utah Supreme Court’s decision on December 5 refusing to compel Nurse Loden to divulge what she heard in the hospital couldn’t dampen Jim Bell’s spirits.

Any day now, they could arrest Mark Hofmann.

80

Three weeks later, Hofmann was still a free man.

And everybody knew why: Bob Stott wasn’t ready yet.

Again Bell requested a meeting with the county attorney’s office to “review” the case; that is, to light a fire under Stott. This time, he pulled in his biggest gun: Jerry Taylor. He was embarrassed to do it. Taylor had already flown into town four times for this investigation and, as far as he was concerned, his work was long since finished.

“Jerry, can you come back?” Bell asked sheepishly when he called Taylor in San Francisco. “We have one county attorney we want you to talk to, because he doesn’t buy what’s going on.”

“Jim. There’s more goddam evidence in this bombing case than in 99 percent of my cases. That son of a bitch should have been tried and found guilty by now.” Taylor had a way of getting right to the point.

He wasn’t happy about it, but as a favor to Jim, he agreed.

On December 11, Bell and Farnsworth met with contingents from the county attorney’s office, ATF, the state crime lab, and the U.S. Attorney’s Office. It was a huge meeting but there was no mistake who the guests of honor were: Jerry Taylor and Bob Stott.

As he always did, Taylor took control of the meeting, laying out the case in the simplest possible terms. One, all three bombs were planted by the same person. Two, that person had to be Mark Hofmann. It was exactly the presentation he would give in court, and it was a virtuoso turn, from beginning to end.

When he finished, Gerry D’Elia stood up to cross-examine him. D’Elia was a bomb expert, too, and he went after Taylor with a barrage of questions that had even the old pro on his toes. If Taylor could weather this assault, he could handle anything Ron Yengich threw at him in court. Compared with Gerry D’Elia, Yengich knew nothing about bombs. It was a duel of wits that had everyone in the room riveted.

Everyone, that is, except Bob Stott.

Out of the corner of his eye, Farnsworth noticed Stott squirming in his chair and looking at his watch. A few minutes later, in the heat of an exchange, he got up and started putting on his coat. The room fell silent with astonishment. Stott actually intended to get up and leave the meeting, a meeting that had been called especially for him, a meeting for which Jerry Taylor had flown into town. Then Farnsworth remembered. Every day at noon, Stott played racquetball.

As Stott started to leave, Farnsworth cut him off. "Where are you going?" His tone wasn't friendly.

"I have an appointment for lunch," said Stott.

Farnsworth moved in close. "You ain't going anywhere. We flew this guy in for you. Everybody else here already knows the case. You are the only one who doesn't understand what the fuck's going on. You're staying here."

Stott looked at Farnsworth, then looked at his watch. Then he looked at his watch again. Finally, he took his coat off. "Excuse me," he said in a huff. "I've got to make a phone call." A few minutes later, he came back and sat down again quietly.

When the cross-examination was finished, both Taylor and D'Elia were invigorated. "I want that young kid cross-examining me on this case," Taylor told Jim Bell. "That's as effective a cross-examination as I have ever had in a courtroom on a bombing case. No better than that." From Jerry Taylor, it was a hell of a compliment. But it didn't make Bob Stott very happy.

Speaking to the whole group, Taylor continued. "Now I'm going to tell you what I can't tell you in court—my own personal opinions of Mark Hofmann."

The room was absolutely quiet.

Taylor addressed himself to those who speculated that Hofmann's actions were those of a basically good man in desperate straits, a man who may have intended to commit suicide with the third bomb, out of guilt and remorse. "The idea that Mark intended the third bomb for himself," said Taylor, "is a bald-faced lie. If he intended suicide, if he entered the car with the purpose of connecting two wires and blowing himself to hell and gone, then he wouldn't have knelt with one knee on the seat, he would have gotten all the way into the car. He wouldn't have reached for the box with one hand; he would have reached with two hands and not just one but both would have been hit by the full blast of the explosion. In fact, his whole body would have been destroyed.

"Mark Hofmann is not just a sweet kid in over his head, blowing himself up out of remorse. He is your basic all-American serial bomber. He likes setting bombs. He gets off on it. I've dealt with hundreds of people just like him. I know the type."

He closed on a chilling note. "In fact, that third bomb won't be his last. He will continue setting bombs until you catch him or until he blows himself up."

To a group of men who had lived and breathed Mark Hofmann for two months, it was a breathtaking display. "Now," he said, fixing the sole of his shoe, which had come loose during his presentation, "if you've got any questions, just shoot."

Bob Stott cleared his throat portentously. As the lead prosecutor, it was, of course, his place to speak first.

"Now, tell me, Jerry," he began blankly, "do you really think the guy did it? What do you really think?"

81 George Throckmorton had been following the Hofmann case with growing indignation. He had read all the newspaper articles and watched all the TV reports and couldn't get one thought out of his head. "I know there's something wrong with the way the documents have been checked," he told his wife, for the umpteenth time, after watching the umpteenth Hofmann story on the evening news, "but I can't get anyone to listen to me."

For Throckmorton, a conscientious Mormon, that wasn't just armchair speculation. Unlike most of the people commenting on TV, he happened to know something about documents. He was, in fact, the only practicing forensic document examiner in the state of Utah, the only person for miles around who was trained to study documents and testify about them in court.

But had anybody bothered to ask him about Mark Hofmann's documents?

Of course, most of his experience involved everyday documents, not historical ones. Once he had cracked a serial rape-and-murder case by matching the handwriting of a note the rapist left at the scene to the suspect's handwriting. But that was unusual. Most of his time at the state crime laboratory was spent checking medical records to see if a doctor had made changes to protect himself in a malpractice suit or looking for forged signatures on bad checks or credit-card slips. He certainly didn't have much experience with historical documents.

But he didn't need much to know something was wrong with Hofmann's story. Simple common sense told him that one man couldn't have turned up so many key documents over such a short period of time. Others, including Jim Bell, had harbored the same suspicions at first, only to be told that all the experts back East had authenticated Hofmann's documents and attested to his reputation.

George Throckmorton had heard the same thing. Only he knew better.

He knew, for example, that those "East Coast experts" may have been experts in something but they weren't experts in authenticating documents. Most had no training or experience in forensics. In his opinion, some of them weren't even equipped to authenticate a document.

Throckmorton had tried to call attention to this travesty. Despite an order from his boss, the state attorney general, not to talk about the Hofmann case, he had hinted broadly to reporters that someone needed to get a qualified examiner to look at the documents in the case. As far as he could tell, they had never been "authenticated" in the true sense of the word.

When that didn't get any attention, he went to the sheriff's office. "You should be aware that these documents have never been really authenticated," he explained, "in spite of what everyone's saying. Because I'm not sure if anyone has authenticated them who knows what he's doing." Like so many other things, his warning disappeared into the black hole of the sheriff's office.

So Throckmorton turned to the press. He called both the Tribune and the Deseret News, which were in a journalistic dogfight over the bombing story, mounting massive investigations over every crumb of gossip that could be conned from officialdom. But neither paper was interested in Throckmorton's abstruse quibbles with the East Coast experts.

The three top local television stations, KSL-TV, KTVX, and KUTV, also turned him down. In the end, only one person, Paul Larsen of Utah Holiday, Salt Lake City's glossy monthly magazine, showed any interest, and by now, Throckmorton was too dispirited to think much would come of that.

But he didn't give up the fight. If no one else would authenticate the documents—really authenticate them—then George Throckmorton would.

He called Dean Jessee, whom he had met the year before at a seminar for the Southwest Association of Forensic Documents Examiners. At that time, Throckmorton discovered that Jessee, who routinely “authenticated” documents for the Church, had been educating himself to the task out of a single book. If that wasn’t discouraging enough, Jessee was now in the midst of preparing a magazine article for BYU Studies on “why the Salamander Letter is authentic.”

Nevertheless, Jessee met with him at the Church library and showed him a copy of the Salamander Letter along with the reports that had been written to authenticate it. As Throckmorton suspected, the ink report from Albert Lyter at Federal Forensic Associates in Raleigh, North Carolina, said only that the ink was iron gallotannic and consistent with those in use at the time. Bill Crueger’s report on the paper said essentially the same thing: the paper was 100 percent rag, consistent with paper in use at the time. But, as Throckmorton explained to Jessee, iron gallotannic ink had been around since the seventh century and cotton rag paper had been available since about A.D. 1100, when it was introduced to Europe from the Orient. The paper and the ink could have been produced anytime within that period. They were, essentially, undatable.

The report of Kenneth Rendell, the East Coast documents dealer, was even worse. “The letter was examined under ultraviolet light,” he wrote of his examination of the Salamander Letter, “and the ink fluoresced in accordance with other inks of this period.” As Throckmorton, and any forensic documents examiner worth his salt, knew, ink never fluoresces, it luminesces, and it does so under infrared light, not ultraviolet. And besides, gallotannic ink should neither fluoresce nor luminesce.

Then Throckmorton researched Rendell’s involvement with the famous, forged “Hitler diaries.” Despite what many people seemed to think, Rendell had waffled for a long time on their authenticity and attacked those, like Charles Hamilton, who questioned them. Eventually, he agreed they were bogus—but only after the consensus of experts had shifted against them.

And this was the expert who authenticated Hofmann’s documents?

A week later, Throckmorton was on the phone with Mike George of the county attorney’s office.

“I’m not saying these documents are forged, all I’m saying is that they need a serious looking into.”

Like everybody else, George thought it sounded like quibbling. “Jeez,” he said, like everybody else. “You’ve got authentic paper, authentic ink.”

Throckmorton tried to be patient. “Listen,” he said. “I could go out and find 'consistent' paper right now, and I could make 'consistent' ink in the bathroom. And all you have to do to make ink look old is to bake it in an oven."

That got George's attention. Maybe this was worth looking into. He asked Throckmorton to come down and give his pitch to the prosecution team.

When he arrived in the war room on the third floor of the county attorney's office, everyone was sitting around the big conference table reading copies of Utah Holiday. Paul Larsen's article had just come out.

After talking to Throckmorton, Larsen had contacted Dean Jessee, who stood by his earlier assessment that the Salamander Letter was authentic, but added, "I'm not an expert. I'm not a forensic document examiner. I'm not qualified to testify in court. It's my personal opinion. That's all." When Larsen pressed him on why he thought the document was authentic, he fudged, claiming that he wanted to save his reasons for the paper he was writing.

Then Larsen called Rendell in Massachusetts to get a fuller explanation of his "authentication" of the letter. Rendell was instantly defensive. "I don't think forgery is a possibility," he said peremptorily. "Mark Hofmann, for example, is too sophisticated to try that."

Rendell added that, as far as he knew, the police had long since given up looking into the Salamander Letter as a motive for the bombings. "The deal was completed on it over a year ago. Everybody seemed happy with it."

But not Larsen. "How do you authenticate a document?" he pressed.

"We look at the paper it's written on, the ink used to write it, and the handwriting," Rendell explained. "The paper and ink are tested to see if they are of a type that was actually in use at the time the document was supposed to have been created." From what Throckmorton had told him, Larsen knew how much that was worth.

And what about the handwriting? "I did not authenticate that the document came from Martin Harris's hand," said Rendell. "That would have been impossible with what little I had." Dean Jessee had told Larsen that Harris left behind precious little of his handwriting for comparison purposes, just a few signatures and one short note, maybe fifteen or twenty words long. And where was that note? In a Book of Common Prayer that had been sold to the LDS Church by Mark Hofmann.

Rendell concluded: "All my report said was that the handwriting was consistent with the handwriting of the time and that there were no signs of forgery." It was hardly the ringing authentication that the press had made it out to be.

When Larsen asked Jeff Simmonds, Hofmann's old mentor at Utah State, what he thought of the Salamander Letter, he didn't mince words. "I think it's a forgery," he offered enthusiastically. "It's too pat." But he didn't think Mark had forged it. He guessed it was a nineteenth-century forgery by anti-Mormons trying to discredit the Church.

Larsen wasn't so sure. His article didn't directly accuse Hofmann of forgery, but it did raise some scratchy questions, speculating that the Salamander Letter and other Hofmann documents might have been part of a larger scheme to defraud the Church with even more spectacular, more controversial forgeries.

It should be asked whether these pieces might be a prelude to some other great discovery—the 116 pages of the Book of Mormon, which Martin Harris lost while he was a scribe for Joseph Smith and which appear in his own handwriting. Hofmann has indicated to several people that he had an interest in finding this lost manuscript. If forgeries exist, were they ends in themselves or were they meant to be used as the samples against which other more valuable documents might be compared? Did the limitations on authentication of the salamander letter create an opportunity for forgery? Was the inexperience of Mormon scholars with that process of authentication a temptation to test it? These are speculative questions, but they are the sort which must be posed in a thorough investigation.

After reading that, the men sitting around the table in the county attorney's office greeted the arrival of the tall, thin, academic-looking Throckmorton like the Second Coming. They took one look at his reassuringly grizzled, graying beard and hired him on the spot.

Throckmorton said he needed two things. First, the original documents. He couldn't work from photocopies. Second, he needed a partner—a non-Mormon partner. "If I can prove these documents are forgeries, there will be a lot of people who say I am just protecting my Church by tarnishing documents that are against the faith."

Not that he doubted his own objectivity even for a second. He couldn't have cared less what was in the documents. He hadn't read them and didn't plan to. When he looked at a document, it was one letter at a time. It was the appearance of objectivity he was concerned about.

The man he chose was William J. Flynn, the chief questioned-documents examiner for the state of Arizona and one of the most highly regarded forensic specialists west of the Mississippi. It didn't hurt that he was also president of the Southwestern Association of Forensic Documents Examiners, and the director of a private forensic laboratory. Of the 233 documents examiners in the United States, Flynn, who had handled a staggering fifteen thousand cases over the years, was the cream of the cream. Throckmorton was taking on the big boys back East, and he knew he needed all the help he could get.

"I have just one question," he told Flynn when they talked on the phone. "What religion are you?"

Flynn, who knew almost nothing about the case, thought it was an odd question. "I'm not practicing," he replied, "but I'm a Catholic."

"That's perfect," said Throckmorton.

82 Flynn understood the question a lot better when he arrived in Salt Lake City for a brief visit on December 17. Throckmorton met him at the Holiday Inn off I-15, the one with the indoor pool that Flynn would never get to use, and drove him directly to a meeting on Temple Square. The Church wanted to look him over.

Dallin Oaks was there, along with other top brass, the new Church archivist, Glen Rowe, and the by-now unavoidable lawyers. At first Flynn thought the purpose of the meeting was to turn over the documents, but there were no documents in sight.

The real purpose of the meeting was quickly made clear. The Church wanted to know what Throckmorton and Flynn intended to do to their prized possessions. As they pointed out repeatedly, this was an unprecedented situation. They were being asked to open the Church vault to outsiders, to people beyond their bureaucratic control, to a non-Mormon, no less. Not that they trusted Throckmorton any better. His attacks on Mark Hofmann and his documents were, by now, well known, and they didn't please the Church. Someone accused Throckmorton of "picking on" Hofmann.

The mood was not friendly.

How did they plan to test the documents? Would the tests damage the documents in any way? Would they be handled with appropriate care by a Gentile? From their skeptical faces, Flynn got the feeling “they thought I was going to dump these things in grape juice.”

The Church’s dilemma was clear. As later described by a Mormon in the county attorney’s office, “It was damaging enough to think that the documents were genuine and that the first leader of the Church might have been nothing more than a con man who duped the faithful. But it would be even more damaging if the documents turned out to be forgeries, and the current leaders of the Church had been duped by a con man.”

Caught between a rock and a hard place, the Church reached for its favorite defense: secrecy. They agreed to let Throckmorton and Flynn look at the documents, but they were determined that absolutely no one else should see them.

That meant that under no circumstances could the two examiners make photocopies, or copy down the contents of the documents.

It meant the documents could not leave the Church premises. Throckmorton and Flynn would be given a conference room in the historical library. The locks would be changed, and they would be given the only two keys.

It meant that they would have to enter and leave the room together. Neither one would be allowed to stay in the room alone.

It meant that the documents would be brought to them every morning in a locked briefcase and returned every night to The Vault, where the briefcase would be handcuffed to a pipe so that it could not be opened again until the next day.

The Church lawyer who was doing most of the talking repeated again and again: “We don’t want these divulged. We don’t want the writing disseminated.”

Throckmorton couldn’t understand the paranoia. All of the documents they intended to review had already been published in Dean Jessee’s book, The Letters of Joseph Smith. But when he repeated that, three times, the lawyer didn’t seem to hear him. “I have to protect Hinckley,” he kept saying. “I have to protect the Church.”

They began work the next morning at eight, laying out their equipment on a huge wooden table in an ample conference room on the third floor of the Church Office Building. Flynn had brought his portable infrared equipment as well as some test plates. Throckmorton brought the microscopes, the ultraviolet equipment, measuring devices, and miscellany. They arranged everything around the table in stations until the place looked, according to Flynn, “like a mad scientist’s laboratory.” The plan was to move the documents from one station, one machine, to the next. Documents examiners were nothing if not methodical.

The Church provided them with five documents, including the Anthon Transcript, the Josiah Stowell letter, and a letter from Joseph Smith to the Lawrence sisters. The RLDS Church sent the Joseph Smith III blessing, and Brent Ashworth contributed the Lucy Mack Smith letter, the Martin Harris letter, and another letter written by Joseph Smith from the Carthage Jail. In addition, the Church provided a number of documents by the same authors that had not come through Hofmann's hands, for purposes of comparison: in all, eighty-one documents. Despite repeated requests, however, the FBI refused to surrender the Salamander Letter.

They worked for four days straight, from eight in the morning until eight at night, leaving only occasionally for Flynn to get a cup of coffee—he was shocked to discover that none was sold in the building. Despite a bank of windows in the conference room, they never saw the sun; it rained the whole time.

They put every document through what they called the “round robin,” starting with the infrared machine, which was equipped with a camera that took pictures directly through the infrared apparatus. Because infrared radiation reacts differently to different chemical compositions in different inks, it was easy to spot any later additions to genuine documents.

At the microscope station, they checked for signs of alteration, obliteration, abrasive or chemical erasure, and any anomalies that would betray the date or region of manufacture. They looked to see how the paper had been cut. They could tell the difference between a cut made with a razor blade, with scissors, or with a paper-cutting machine. They could tell how the paper had been manufactured, how the ink had spread into the paper over time, and whether there were any fox marks (oxidation spots).

Then they compared the handwriting with other examples from the same writer that had not come through Mark Hofmann's hands. Using a rigorous set of seventeen tests, they looked for such things as lift points, pressure points, embellishments, and the relationship to the base line. The handwriting in a single document took as many as three hours to analyze thoroughly.

Almost from the start, little things bothered them. Under the microscope they noticed that on some of the documents, the ink had cracked into tiny scales—they called it “alligator skin”—invisible to the naked eye. Since neither man had worked with old documents before, they assumed it had something to do with aging but couldn't imagine why it would affect some documents and not others.

The handwriting in the Josiah Stowell letter looked too elegant for a messy writer like Joseph Smith. "If all you can play on the piano is 'Chopsticks,'" Flynn told Throckmorton, "you can pound on the keys with your fists but you can't play Mozart. If you only have a certain degree of skill, you can always write worse, but can never write better."

The letter that Smith had supposedly written from the Carthage Jail wasn't on the same kind of paper as two other letters Smith wrote the same day, letters that had been lent by the RLDS Church. What were the chances that a man in jail would have access to two different paper stocks on the same day?

And something was wrong with the Anthon Transcript. If the ink used to make the characters was so acidic that it burned through the paper and left reverse images on the other side, why didn't it leave similar ghost images on the pages of the Bible where it had lain, supposedly, for more than a hundred years? And why was the inscription in that Bible written in one ink, and the signature—which proved it belonged to the Smith family—in another? Why were several different inks used in one document, and why had the date on another been changed from 1722 to 1822?

But all this only suggested that a few of the documents might be forged, in whole or in part. Even if true, it didn't tell them when they were forged or who forged them. They would have to wait and pursue that when Flynn returned in January.

On the day Flynn left for Arizona, a Church delegation led by Gordon Hinckley visited the conference room. They looked suspiciously at all the equipment while Throckmorton and Flynn explained the process. They asked some questions but, to Flynn's astonishment, never asked the most obvious question of all: Are the documents genuine?

Not that he could have answered. Their tests to date had shown no sign of systematic forgery by Hofmann or anybody else. Sure there was a signature added here, a line removed there, but in any group of eighty-one historical documents, you were likely to find some anomalies. Most of the documents looked surprisingly "right." The paper, even on the doctored documents, looked genuine. The ink looked genuine. The writing instruments looked genuine. The handwriting looked genuine. They all seemed to have aged the appropriate length of time. The only unanswered question was the nagging one about cracked ink.

Maybe the East Coast experts had been right all along, Flynn thought.

But there was another explanation, admittedly a bizarre one, and he tried it out on Throckmorton as they drove to the airport on December 20. Was it possible that someone had gathered the old paper, the old ink, the old writing instruments and then artificially aged all the documents?

Nah, he concluded, jumping out of the car. Impossible.

83 On Christmas Eve, the gang met again in the county attorney's office: Ted Cannon, Bob Stott, Jim Bell, Ken Farnsworth, both national and local ATF men, representatives from the FBI, even Brent Ward, the U.S. attorney, and Pete Hayward, the county sheriff. At least twenty men in all, few of them friends. Hayward still wasn't speaking to Cannon; Brent Ward wasn't speaking to Bob Stott, at least about this case. The police were furious with Hayward for copping out of the Sheets investigation; the ATF men were furious with Ward for copping out on the explosives charge. The county attorney's office was angry at Ward for locking them out of the grand jury proceedings, and Stott was angry at everybody for trying to push him into filing charges before he was good and ready. In short, the meeting was noticeably lacking in holiday cheer.

One more time, the investigators summarized the evidence. Then they repeated their plea: Won't somebody please file charges against Mark Hofmann?

No one had to ask Sheriff Hayward where he stood. For months, he had been telling everyone, especially the press, what he thought of Ted Cannon's office. "Those guys aren't prosecutors. They aren't prosecuting the case."

Not too long before, D'Elia had visited Hayward's office only to be greeted by a hail of verbal abuse. "How stupid can you guys be? When the hell are you going to file? What's it going to take? You can't imagine the public pressure that's on us to have this case filed. The county attorney's office doesn't know what the fuck is going on. You gotta file this case."

D'Elia took his coat off and dropped it, a gesture with a clear message: "If you want a fight, I'll give you a fight." He wasn't the kind to "take shit" from anybody, even Hayward.

"Listen," he yelled back. "Two weeks after the bombing, you and your men had already pulled out. I can't even get your men to do anything. They're not even in there with the investigation. It's total uncooperation. You're sitting here, doing nothing, and you're telling me to file. You go out there and get the damn facts and maybe I'll file it. You don't have a case yet, you don't have a motive yet." It was a full-scale screaming match by now.

Hayward ended on a threat. "I'm sending my detective over with the papers tomorrow, and I'm gonna have him screen this case in front of you. And then I'm gonna call the press and tell them."

D'Elia wasn't an easy man to intimidate. "Fine," he said, stalking out of the room, "but you tell your man to bring a kick-out letter with him tomorrow morning." Hayward got the message: a kick-out letter was the form a prosecutor signed when he officially refused to file a case.

All eyes turned to Brent Ward. He looked completely uninterested in the proceedings. Someone asked if he would file separately on the bomb charge.

Not a chance. At first, his argument was technical. "We would have to get an exception to file simultaneously on the bomb charge," he explained. "Your filing would oust us from jurisdiction." Not everyone understood the details, but they understood the bottom line.

"Besides," Ward added nonchalantly, "nobody has convinced me that we have the right person. How do we even know we don't have the wrong guy?"

There was a long stunned silence.

Duffy Diamond broke it. "Who's fucking side are you on, anyway? Who are you working for here, for Christ's sake, the fucking defense counsel?"

"I'm the devil's advocate," Ward offered lamely. The time for devil's advocacy was long, long past.

When no one jumped to support him, Ward scurried to explain. "We need to find where the bombs were made. We need to go down other avenues, talk to other witnesses." Bell and Farnsworth looked at each other in astonishment, thinking of the hundreds of witnesses they had already spoken to. But Ward went on. "We need things that you don't have any prospect of getting. Mostly physical evidence." Like the fake mustache, for instance. "The man in the elevator was wearing a mustache. Where is the fake mustache?" Unless the police could get a lot more information than he had seen, Ward would not file, and if the county attorney's office did, they would be "walking into an absolute disaster." A disaster that, if it failed, would reflect badly on all of them.

In other words, it wasn't really a question of guilt or innocence, or even of good law enforcement or bad. In the final analysis, it was a question of P.R.

Then and there, it was clear to everyone that Brent Ward was signing off on the case. For a man with political ambitions, it was just too hot to handle. (Colleagues who saw Ward after Christmas said he looked "as if four hundred pounds had been taken off his shoulders.")

That left only the county attorney, Ted Cannon.

This time, to everyone's astonishment, he gave the go-ahead. First thing after Christmas, he said, his office would file charges.

Then Bob Stott spoke up. He didn't think it was the right time. "We can't do that," he said. "How's it gonna look? Here it's been two or three months, and then, all of a sudden, between Christmas and New Year's, we go ahead and do it. That'll look stupid." Or, even worse, vindictive—an attempt to destroy the Hofmann family's holidays.

So the filing was put off until January sometime, and everyone, including Mark Hofmann, spent Christmas at home.

84 Flynn wasn't scheduled to return to Utah until January 7, but he couldn't wait that long to return to work. While the rest of Phoenix sweated through last-minute shopping and hung Christmas lights on the cacti, Flynn buried himself in the literature on antique ink. For some reason, he couldn't get one question out of his head. Why the cracking?

He canvassed the libraries and called every forensic expert he knew hoping to find someone else who had experience with cracked ink. He examined the stampless covers that the county attorney's office had supplied him with. No cracking. He called a friend at the FBI labs in Washington and asked for all the information he had on iron gallotannic inks. No reference to cracking.

There was only one thing left to do: make his own ink and see if he could get it to crack.

Making it was easy. Anybody could do it in the kitchen sink. The formula was available in several places, including Charles Hamilton's book Great Forgers and Famous Fakes. Teaching himself how to cut quill pens from turkey feathers was harder. (Although not as hard as locating turkey feathers in Phoenix. He finally found them in an Indian supply store for $1.50 apiece.)

Once he had made up a fake document, he had to age it. Iron gallotannic ink, like iron, rusts with age. The trick to aging ink was to speed up this oxidation process. One way to do that was to apply heat—simply to bake the document. Flynn tried it, and succeeded in aging the ink from black to a rust-brown color, but in the process, aged the paper dramatically. Instead of remaining supple like Hofmann's documents, it turned dry and brittle. In aging the ink a hundred years, he had aged the paper a thousand. And still no cracking.

So he tried speeding up the oxidation process chemically, using oxidizing agents like oxalic acid, which he had seen mentioned in the literature. That aged the ink all right, but it also took it off the paper. Sodium hypochlorite, nitric acid, sulfuric acid, hydrochloric acid, and hydrogen peroxide were equally unsuccessful. When he tried ammonium hydroxide (common household ammonia) and sodium hydroxide, the ink turned a lovely shade of rust-red, but there was still no cracking.

He decided to stick with the ammonia and change the ink, mixing up several batches using different additives common in the nineteenth century. One of those additives was gum arabic, a form of complex sugar used to preserve and improve the viscosity of ink. When he exposed the gum arabic solution to the sodium hydroxide, the ink once again turned the requisite reddish-brown color. Then he put the sample under the microscope and saw what he'd been waiting for. The ink had cracked.

When Flynn and Throckmorton reunited in Salt Lake City on January 7, they had only one thing on their minds. They wanted another look at the documents. Even with all the work that had been done, there were still important unanswered questions: Which documents showed the cracking? What other circumstances—besides gum arabic and artificial aging—might explain the cracking? For example, the Church routinely deacidified documents that came into its archives. Or was there something about the way they were stored?

It wasn't long before they started getting answers.

First, they realized that they had seen the cracking only on Hofmann's documents. It had to be more than a coincidence.

Throckmorton tested the theory. "Hand me a document and don't tell me where it came from," he told Flynn. After looking at it under various instruments, he announced, "This one came from Mark."

"Right."

He examined a second document. "This one didn't come from Mark."

"Right again."

Then a third document.

"Hofmann?"

"Right again."

They started putting the documents into two stacks, one stack for the documents that showed the cracking, Hofmann's stack; and one for documents that showed no cracking. Before long, they were both feeling cocky.

Flynn handed him another document, and Throckmorton pronounced it "Mark's."

Only this time it wasn't.

Suddenly their theory didn't look so good. They could have understood it if a document from Hofmann had not shown the cracking and had been genuine. It only made sense that some of Hofmann's documents were real. But to find a document that did show cracking but didn't come from Mark blew a gaping hole right through the middle of their theory.

Then it happened again. Another document that didn't come through Hofmann showed the cracking.

They tried to pass it off as a minor glitch. Throckmorton started a third pile with the two documents, but said to himself, "This theory doesn't hold water."

That night he took the two documents to Glen Rowe, the Church archivist, and asked him to check again on where they came from. Who donated them to the Church, and where did the donors get them?

The next day Rowe came by to say that both documents had been donated to the Church by the same man. And he had gotten them both from Mark Hofmann.

A day later, they found the clincher. It looked harmless enough, a simple promissory note made out to one Isaac Galland and signed on the back by Joseph Smith. Only when Throckmorton and Flynn looked at it under the microscope, they discovered a curious thing. The ink on the front was not cracked. The ink on the back was. The same piece of paper, stored under the same conditions, deacidified in the same way, and yet one side was cracked and the other wasn't. Clearly, the signature had been added and, like all the other documents with cracking, artificially aged.

And it came from Mark Hofmann.

Ken Farnsworth was visiting friends in Los Angeles when Jim Bell phoned from Salt Lake City on February 3. The county attorney's office had called Bell and told him to be at their offices at seven the next morning. No explanation, just be there.

No explanation was needed. Bell knew why they wanted him there, which was why he was calling his partner. "They won't tell me what they're doing," said Bell. "So you and I both know what they're doing."

It was that son of a bitch Stott. "Hell, if you can't trust the guy who's a detective on the case," Farnsworth sputtered, "who do you trust? What's the point?"

He flew back that night at ten.

The next morning at seven Farnsworth showed up at the county attorney's office. Bob Stott was more than a little surprised.

"I don't appreciate being left out of the arrest," Farnsworth snarled at Stott. Then he found out that they had also left his name off the information. He demanded to know why.

"Well, we were just gonna let Jim sign it because we didn't know you were gonna be here," said Stott, squirming.

It was all Farnsworth could do to keep from slugging him. "That's bullshit. This case is assigned to me. The Christensen murder is specifically assigned to me, and it's my responsibility to sign a complaint. I'm gonna put my name on it. You got a problem with that?"

Stott fumbled for a few seconds then finally came out with it. "Well, you know that Mark and his family and Ron think that you haven't looked at anything else. All you've looked at is Mark. And they think that it's real, that you're real prejudiced."

Prejudiced! Farnsworth was livid. Who the hell was running this case, the law enforcement agencies or Mark and his family? He shot Stott a black look. "Hey, pal, I'm not going away on this case. I'm part of it. No choice, I'm here. You got me whether you like it or not. I don't care." He pointed at the information. "So you change that puppy right around, right now. I'm not going back to my department and say, 'Hey, they took my name off my own case because they don't want me on it.'"

Stott's mouth twitched. It was a standoff. Finally, he looked away.

"Okay, for you, we'll put your name on it." So they added Farnsworth's name to one of the informations, the one that listed the two counts of murder. Two of Stott's investigators, Dick Forbes and Mike George, signed the other three.

That defused the situation, but it didn't leave Farnsworth feeling any better about it. Stott had kicked him in the teeth, and it still smarted. "Mark doesn't like you," he repeated to himself. "Bullshit." It wasn't Hofmann. It was Stott.

Bell, Farnsworth, Forbes, George, and D'Elia took the paperwork to the chambers of Judge Paul Grant in the county court building for signing. When they were finished, Bell said, "Let's go to jail." Hofmann had denied them the pleasure of hauling him in. He had agreed to come to the jail on his own. The five of them would go wait for him there.

On the way across the plaza to the Hall of Justice, the two investigators stopped. "Look," said Mike George to Bell and Farnsworth, "this is you guys' case. All we've been doing is helping. It's your deal. You guys go and book it." If anybody deserved to be in on the arrest, it was George and Forbes, thought Farnsworth, so he persuaded them to come along. But it was a class gesture.

Bell and Farnsworth walked through the main floor of the Hall of Justice and out the other side. Because of construction in the building, they would have to take one last detour. Standing on the other side of the parking lot at the entrance to the booking room, they could see Channel 2 reporter Rick Schenkman and his cameraman. They looked around. That was it for press. And Schenkman didn't even notice them. Just as they were entering the tunnel that led to the booking room, they heard him call out to his cameraman, "Hurry, get the picture of that guy over there!" He was pointing at Gerry D'Elia. So they walked on, uninterrupted, with the arrest warrant in their hands.

At the end of the tunnel, the garage door opened in front of them. They passed through the electrically controlled security gate and into the long, concrete booking room lined with the iron bars of holding cells. At the far end of the room, on a bench next to the booking window, sat Mark Hofmann.

Sheriff Hayward and Lieutenant Ben Forbes were also there, but it was Bell and Farnsworth who approached Hofmann and said, "You're under arrest."

Filling out the booking sheet took only fifteen minutes. But it was still a high. Farnsworth heaved a sigh of relief. "Finally, we got the little prick in jail."

* * *

Later that day, they drove to Centerville to explain the arrest and probable-cause statements to Terri Christensen. For the first time, they saw her new baby, now almost one month old. Knowing he would be a caesarean, Terri had chosen to have him delivered on January 9—on what would have been Steve's thirty-second birthday. She named him Steven.

PART FIVE

Contending with Lucifer

He remembered that they started to have conversations about very subtle things when they were in college. They started to talk about the fact of human freedom, which had been taken away from the individual. They were in the land of promise but were with a master.

Something about all this with a Jesus Christ who had been crucified for them, and he was actually condemning them to death.

Now they began to talk about the fact that the Bible was not a book that was given to man by God. It was a book that was given to man by man. They were in the land of promise but were with a master. They were in the land of promise but were with a master.

"This is the way of the world," said the man.

Now it was the prosecutors' turn to approach Gordon Hinckley.

Bob Stott must have prayed this day would never come, but by late March, he could no longer avoid it. Church functionaries like Don Schmidt could testify at the preliminary hearing about most of the documents Hofmann had sold the Church, and Hugh Pinnock could take the heat for Dallin Oaks on the McLellin Collection, but only two people knew about the Joseph Stowell letter, Mark Hofmann and Gordon Hinckley.

Ironically, Stott had assigned himself the documents side of the Hofmann case, allowing him to control—some said contain—the Church's involvement. Now, as the prosecutor in charge of the documents scam, he was leading his team into the sanctum sanctorum of Church power, Hinckley's paneled offices.

Before they even sat down, Hinckley asked the first and most important question: "Are you members of the Church?"

David Biggs answered, "Yes. But I'm not a particularly good one." He wasn't sure if Hinckley heard him, he seemed so preoccupied with picking up "vibrations." He was, after all, first and foremost a spiritual man with the Lord's business on his mind—and a lawyer, Wilford Kirton, at his side.

Stott explained that they needed to know more about Hinckley's meetings with Mark Hofmann. In particular, they needed to know what kind of pressure Hofmann might have been under to produce the McLellin Collection. Was it the kind of pressure that might lead to murder?

Hinckley looked at them with a Mona Lisa smile. Far from putting pressure on Hofmann, he said, he only vaguely remembered Mark Hofmann.

Stott and Biggs shifted uneasily in their chairs. Mike George, the investigator from the county attorney's office who had accompanied Ken Farnsworth on the last interview of Hinckley almost four months before, marveled at how, with all the time in between to recollect those meetings, he still couldn't remember a thing.

"Was he ever in your office?" Stott asked.

"Probably," said Hinckley.

Probably! thought Biggs. Now he was even forgetting what he had admitted in the press conference.

"Have you ever bought anything from him yourself?"

"Not directly. A couple of documents may have come through me, but only as a vehicle by which the Church made the purchases."

They tried, ever so gently, to refresh his recollection.

Surely he remembered the morning, only days before the bombings, when Hofmann came to tell him the Kinderhook plates "might be available for the right price"? He did remember the Kinderhook plates?

"I don't know a whole lot about them," Hinckley said dryly.

George thought, This is Hinckley. He's telling us he doesn't know a whole lot about the Kinderhook plates. My God, even I have learned a little about them in this investigation. He has to know what they're about. They're a big thing in Mormon history.

In a show of cooperativeness, Hinckley walked to his bookshelf, pulled out a book and began to read a passage about the Kinderhook plates as if it were all news to him, like a person who has just heard an interesting word for the first time and wants to look it up—just out of curiosity.

Stott and Biggs pressed. Surely he knew that Steve Christensen had been called by Church officials at all hours of the night to go out and find Hofmann and get him to repay the First Interstate loan?

Hinckley shrugged his shoulders.

Surely, he knew that phone calls had flown back and forth from the Church Office Building and that Christensen was pounding on doors all over Salt Lake City? Surely this indicated that the Church was bringing pressure to bear?

Hinckley could recall nothing.

No matter how evocatively they painted the picture of those last desperate days, Hinckley could recall nothing.

Biggs decided it was time to push a little harder. One thing that had always amazed him, he began innocently, was why no one had investigated the documents the Church bought from Hofmann, not really investigated them, not checked their provenances, for example. True, Hofmann, like many documents dealers, kept his sources confidential, but the Church had never even tried to verify its purchases. And yet it was spending tens of thousands of dollars on these documents.

Biggs wanted to ask: Were these the actions of parties who barely knew each other? Is it credible that you would put that much trust in someone whom you knew only "vaguely"? But he decided instead to ask only half the question, "How is it that you felt comfortable relying on Mr. Hofmann as a sole basis for purchasing these documents?"

Hinckley looked him in the eye. "We relied on Mark Hofmann's integrity," he said gravely. "If we were deceived, then it's to his eternal detriment."

Wow, thought Biggs. Heavy stuff. But hardly responsive.

They tried another approach. As per Joseph Smith's instructions, every good Mormon is supposed to keep a detailed daily diary of his or her activities. Over the years, the Church's leaders had been extraordinarily conscientious in obeying that injunction. So they asked to see Hinckley's diary entries for his meetings with Mark Hofmann. "I don't keep a diary," Hinckley responded quickly, as if he were prepared for the question.

After another hour of evasions, memory lapses, and sermonettes, Biggs lost his patience. "President Hinckley. This has been in the news—people have died—isn't there any way we can get some information about your meetings with Hofmann?"

Hinckley couldn't contain his indignation. "This is the least of my concerns," he huffed. "I am an extremely busy man. I have worldwide concerns. Mr. Hofmann is a postscript . . ." he reached for the rest of the phrase, ". . . in the walk of life."

You wish, thought David Biggs.

When Bob Stott finally worked up the courage to talk about Hinckley's testimony at the upcoming preliminary hearing, Wilford Kirton jumped in.

"President Hinckley doesn't wish to testify at the hearing. We think it would be in everyone's best interests to not have him testify."

Someone suggested that he would have to testify at trial.

You don't understand, said Kirton imperiously. President Hinckley does not wish to testify at the hearing, at the trial, at anything.

Even Stott had to be outraged. This was putting him, as a devout member of the Church, under wholly unacceptable pressure.

Hinckley had obviously wanted to stay out of this discussion, but it was clear from the prosecutors' reaction that nothing less than his personal intervention would calm the furor that Kirton's comments had unleashed. So he decided to give another sermonette, this one on the subject of "priorities." He sat down with Stott as a father would sit down with a wayward son.

"This isn't that significant, as it relates to Church matters," he said softly. "It's the Church that matters. You have to consider the Church first. I don't wish to testify."

This time Stott said nothing.

But that wasn't all Hinckley wanted. "I think it would be in the best interests of the Church," he added in the same mellow voice, "if you simply dismissed the charge."

Dismiss the charge? Biggs and George were aghast. It took them a moment to realize that he meant only that Stott should dismiss the charge on the Stowell letter, which would let Hinckley off the hook as far as testifying at the preliminary hearing.

Despite the months of investigation, Stott, Biggs, and George still had only the vaguest idea of how much Hinckley had to lose if Mark Hofmann told all in open court, or even if the complete details of his relationship with Hinckley came into the open. They knew nothing of the forces at work within the ranks of the General Authorities to oust Hinckley from power for his failure of vision, his failure to see the trap that Hofmann had laid for him. If Church conservatives were to read the full details of his misadventures in newspaper accounts of a trial, the consequences for him—apart from the consequences for the Church—could be catastrophic. He could disappear from the upper reaches of power or, even worse, of the Celestial Kingdom.

More fervently than the prosecutors could have imagined, Gordon Hinckley must have wanted to say "dismiss the charges" on all of Hofmann's crimes. Close the public record, lock him away or buy his silence, put the matter to rest. Make him, as quickly as possible, "just a postscript in the walk of life."

But Bob Stott wasn't ready to do that. "We are not going to drop the charge," he said after he regained his composure. But he did have a compromise suggestion. "If we can get the defense to stipulate as to your testimony, we won't have to call you. But if they won't stipulate, and if we think it's important for you to testify, you will have to testify."

As they left the room, Biggs slapped Stott on the back. He knew that couldn't have been easy.

The preliminary hearing began on April 14, 1986, in the midst of an early-spring heat wave. It would have led the news stories in both local papers if Ronald Reagan hadn't ordered an air raid on Libya the night before. And some people were surprised that even that knocked the biggest local story out of the lead spot.

Ron Yengich and the Hofmann family had been shouting Mark's innocence from the media rooftops for three months, and most of the press and public believed them. It had taken so long for anyone to file charges that when they finally did, many people figured the police were just trying to cover their backside: pinning the crimes on Hofmann because they had to pin them on somebody.

It was only a preliminary hearing—a proceeding before a judge to determine if the evidence warranted a trial—but there was nothing preliminary about the media hoopla or the police security precautions. The circuit court building swarmed with uniforms. There were guards in every corner of the courtroom, guards at the doors, guards in the halls, guards downstairs, guards upstairs, guards in the bathrooms. Spectators passed through a metal detector both on entering and on leaving the courtroom. Briefcases, purses, camera bags, rolled-up newspapers, everything was checked. Those who wanted to avoid the search had to listen to the proceedings on loudspeakers set up in an anteroom. Ron Yengich argued that because Hofmann was innocent, the real killer was still out there and Mark was still a target. Police said they feared an attack by some crazed Mormon, mad at Hofmann for hoodwinking Church leaders. Most people thought Yengich's explanation sounded more likely.

Paranoia, like spring, was in the air. After technicians from KSL finished installing the wiring system in the courtroom, several detectives on duty wondered, seriously, if the men from the Church-owned station might have secretly arranged to transmit the proceedings directly to Church headquarters.

The day before the hearing, Jim Bell had left a message with Yengich's secretary. "Tell him that if Mark wants a bulletproof vest, the police department will provide one free of charge. We'll be happy to bring it over to him, and he can keep it through the entire proceeding."

It was an especially strange offer given that Hofmann, free on bail, had been seen in local restaurants dressed in nothing more protective than a T-shirt emblazoned with a white salamander.

Circuit Judge Paul G. Grant entered the courtroom and strode to his place in the corner behind an altar-like dais of blond oak. He was a huge man, with cowboy boots showing beneath his tent-size black robe. The fifty or so spectators, half of them press, who filled the padded pews of the stark, concrete courtroom, quickly settled down. Grant stepped up on the dais and slumped his vast frame into a big leathery chair. Everything about him seemed huge: hands, feet, head, eyes, even his glasses.

At six-feet seven, Grant was used to being the center of attention. He had presided over the preliminary hearings in the Ted Bundy, Ervil LeBaron, and Frances Schreuder cases. After the last, he had lost his taste for high-profile cases and generally let the younger judges take them now. If he wanted attention, he would say, all he had to do was show up at church with his twelve children, most of whom were also more than six feet tall.

A devout Mormon and former bishop, Grant brushed off questions about his ability to sit in judgment on a case that involved the Church so deeply. Every judge brings some baggage to the bench, he would say; at least he was honest about it. Just in case, though, he had sounded out Ron Yengich on the issue. Yengich assured him that he felt Hofmann could get a fair hearing in Grant's courtroom.

In fact, the only thing that really bothered Grant about the trial was that it threatened to interfere with the basketball season.

"I have perceived that it's going to get warm in this courtroom," Grant announced in his comforting, avuncular voice. "So I will invite everyone to take off their coat and not suffer through this."

Bruce Passey, the co-owner of a jewelry manufacturing firm on the third floor of the Judge Building, took the witness stand first. He looked like a man who spent most of his time indoors doing close work: pale, balding, slightly overweight, bespectacled. Early on the morning of October 15, he had stood in the foyer and ridden up in the elevator with a man wearing a green letter jacket and carrying a brown package addressed to Steve Christensen.

Gerry D'Elia questioned him. "Did you notice anything with respect to any kind of glasses on this individual, hearing aid, anything of that sort, that you would recognize?"

"No eyeglasses."

"How about facial hair? Did you notice anything about facial hair?"

"He was not clean-shaven."

"Would that be a beard?"

"Well, more of a five-o'clock shadow, as if he hadn't shaved for the morning."

"I am going to show you, Mr. Passey, what's been marked Proposed Exhibit No. 2. I'm holding it up, for the record, and showing you the front of it, and then showing you the back of it, and then putting it up right in front of you. Are you able to recognize that jacket, Mr. Passey?"

"Yes."

"From where?"

"That was the color of the jacket that was on the fellow that was in the foyer."

"How about the remainder of the jacket? The sleeves are gray on that, are they not?"

"Yes."

"You originally described the sleeves as being a light tan color. Is that correct?"

"Yes."

"Why the difference between your original description of tan sleeves and the gray sleeves right now?"

"Because the light in the foyer; they use a little bit dimmer light."

"Now, with respect to the person that you saw in the elevator and in the foyer of the Judge Building in the lobby on October 15, 1985, are you able to recognize that person again?"

"Yes."

"Do you see that person in the courtroom today?"

"Yes."

"For the record, would you indicate where that person is seated and point out the person and tell us what the person is dressed in?"

Passey pointed to Hofmann. "He is sitting next to Mr. Yengich wearing glasses and a blue suit."

On cross-examination, Yengich tried everything to impeach Passey's identification. "Did you say whether or not he was wearing glasses?"

"He was not wearing glasses."

Yengich smiled. "I note that you wear eyeglasses."

"Yes."

"Were you wearing them on that morning?"

"Yes."

"I'm nearsighted," Yengich confessed congenially. "What's yours?"

"I'm nearsighted also."

"When is the last time you had your eyes checked, sir?"

"About a year and a half ago."

And what about the mustache, Yengich wanted to know.

"I said I was not 100 percent sure on the mustache."

"The composite does have a mustache on it?" The composite had been based partly on Passey's original description to the police.

"Yes."

"It's easily identified as a mustache? You would agree with me on that, wouldn't you?"

"Yes."

On the letter jacket, Yengich circled warily. Reading from the notes that Detective Johnson had taken at the time of Passey's original description of the letter jacket, Yengich said, "It goes on to say, 'with dark brown leather sleeves.' " Not just brown, but dark brown. It was easy to mistake light gray for light tan, but light gray for dark brown? "Is that correct?"

"No, I did not tell him dark brown."

"Is that what it says on State's Exhibit 4?"

"It does say it, yes."

"But your testimony today is that you did not tell the detective that?"

"No, sir."

"The detective must have been in error when he put dark brown leather sleeves. Is that correct?"

"Correct."

As for the identification of Hofmann, Yengich wanted to suggest that it was based not on Passey's own recollection of the encounter in the elevator but from what he had seen in the media.

"Do you take either newspaper, either daily, in Salt Lake?"

"Yes, sir."

"Have you seen any photographs of him in those papers?"

"No, sir."

Yengich hadn't expected that answer. "You have not? Why is that, sir?"

"Because ever since the bombing, I saw him the first time they put him on television, and then, after that, I just quit watching. I don't read the paper anymore."

If there was anything Yengich hated, it was a witness who knew how to protect his testimony. "You don't read the paper at all anymore?"

"No, sir. If I do, it's more the sports page or the Wall Street section."

"You don't watch any of the TV news?"

"If anything comes on about it, I just turn the opposite way or think of something else. I do not watch it."

Later that day, D'Elia called to the stand Margene Robbins, a receptionist in Tom Wilding's office. Hofmann had visited the office on the morning of the bombings.

What time did he come in? D'Elia asked.

"Well, it was probably about 9:15 or something."

"How was Mr. Hofmann dressed?"

"He was wearing a green fabric, a green fabric jacket that had gray leather sleeves and a striped knit collar." She recognized it because her son had a letter jacket very much like it. "Except," she added, her son "didn't wear it after he was out of high school."

"Have you seen any other men over thirty wearing an Olympus High School jacket without a letter on it, to your recollection?"

"No."

Janet McDermott, a businesswoman in her mid-thirties with the large eyes and high cheekbones of a fashion model, took the stand next. She had been across the hall when the bomb exploded in Steve Christensen's hands. In the audience, Terri Christensen told herself she was prepared to listen. Two days before, Ken Farnsworth had visited her at home to warn her about McDermott's testimony. "She will be saying that she thought Steve was alive when she came out into the hall," he had said, "that she heard Steve crying." Farnsworth wanted to reassure her that the testimony was both ugly and inaccurate. He swallowed hard and explained that what McDermott thought was crying was probably just air being released from the lungs. The medical examiner would testify that Steve had died instantly. Farnsworth wrote in his notes that Terri handled the explanation "pretty well."

McDermott testified she heard an explosion and crouched down behind her desk.

"What did you think when you heard that?" asked Gerry D'Elia.

"I was very scared. I thought that if there was somebody out in the hallway, that they would know for sure I was there."

"Did you hear anything at that time while you were over at the desk?"

"Yes, I did."

"What did you hear?"

"A very high-pitched crying." McDermott began to cry.

In the audience, Terri Christensen braced herself.

"When you opened your door of 610 Judge Building, what did you see?"

"Steve Christensen was laying on the floor."

"Where was he?"

"He was partway in his office, partway out in the hallway."

"Did you see any wounds on Steve Christensen?"

"Yes."

"What were the most extensive wounds that you saw that caught your attention?"

"His entire chest was bloody."

"How about the noises that you had heard from inside your office? Did you ever hear them again once you got to your door and looked at Mr. Christensen?"

"They were coming from Mr. Christensen. They were much deeper by now."

Terri Christensen put her head down and began to cry as softly as she could. She had thought she could handle it. "I want to know everything," she had said two days before. "I want to be there." But she didn't really. She believed what Farnsworth had told her about Steve dying instantly, and she was prepared for McDermott's story—intellectually at least. But the image, true or false, caught her unawares, and the tears just came of their own accord.

Only a few feet away, close enough to hear her crying, Bill and Dorie Hofmann sat stone still.

Throughout the testimony, Steve Christensen's younger brother, Scott, sat in the courtroom staring at Mark Hofmann. Only occasionally did his eyes stray briefly to the witness or to a piece of evidence being admitted. No one would have guessed that the handsome, sandy-haired, burly young man with vengeance in his eyes was, in another world, a sweet-tempered, easygoing family man. But then, no one could have guessed how much his brother had meant to him.

At the end of the day's session, one of the officers assigned to watch the courtroom approached Ken Farnsworth with a worried look. "Watch the big guy," he said ominously, pointing at Scott Christensen. "He's going to kill Mark. He's going to get up and go over and beat the fuck out of him."

Gerry D'Elia circled the next witness for a long time before asking his first question. He wanted the judge, the media, and the audience to look long and hard at a man whose life had been shattered by Mark Hofmann.

"You were married to Kathleen Sheets?"

"Yes." Gary Sheets shifted in the witness chair looking uncharacteristically nervous.

"For how long?"

"Twenty-seven years and a few months."

"How many children did you have in total?"

"Four."

"And the names, besides, I think, Gretchen, and Jimmy, that I can recollect?"

"Kathryn Robertson and Heidi Jones."

"How old is Gretchen?"

"She's twenty."

"How old is Jimmy?"

"Jimmy is fifteen."

"How would you describe Kathy's relationship with the family?"

"She was her grown daughters' best friend. Two or three times a week, I would come home at night, and Kathy would come up and say, smiling at me, we have got all three grandchildren tonight, which meant tending them. Her children and her grandchildren were her life and her love, and me. We had a very close family."

In the audience, Jimmy, Gretchen, Katie, and Heidi, along with their Aunt Joan, listened to their father's testimony and relived the pain with him. Like everything in their lives for the last six months, it was an ordeal, but this one they welcomed.

For months after the bombing, Gretchen couldn't walk down stairs without thinking something terrible would happen. Every time she opened the dryer, she closed her eyes and waited for the explosion. She wouldn't go near the mailbox. One day, she opened the front door and saw a big cardboard box from AT&T. She just looked at it in terror and shut the door again. Eventually, she worked up the courage to kick it a few times, then Jimmy poked it with a long pole. It turned out to be telephones.

When Gretchen went to give blood, the nurse recognized her name. "Oh, you're not related to that Gary Sheets are you?"

"Yeah, that's my dad."

"Well, I don't think that Mark Hofmann is guilty."

Then one day Katie took Danny, her nephew, to a hamburger place. They were about to sit down when she saw Mark and Dorie in the next booth. Her mother was dead, and her murderer was sitting there eating a hamburger and fries. She took Danny's hand and left. But that did little to ease the anger and she brooded for days.

Now, finally, it was Hofmann's turn to suffer. This was his ordeal. And they wouldn't have missed it for the world. They had spent so many months hating him and hating the thought that they were suffering and he wasn't, that Kathy was gone and he was free.

The next morning, Ron Yengich cross-examined Gary Sheets.

Since the bombings, Sheets had been at the center of a storm of rumors accusing him of everything from adultery to homosexuality. One of the more fantastical versions involved a sordid love triangle between Sheets, Steve, and Terri Christensen. Another story making the rounds as the hearings began was that Gary and Kathy had been involved in an ugly divorce at the time of the bombings and that Gary had since remarried. The point of the stories was always the same: Sheets himself had killed his wife—and maybe Christensen—either in a jealous rage or in order to make room for some other liaison.

They were outrageous lies, but Yengich had to use what was available. He had heard the rumors—some suspected the defense team had generated its share of them—and he knew they could support at least one red herring. In a case heavy on circumstantial evidence and weak on motive, it took only one red herring to hang a jury.

"You considered Steve to be a very bright young man?" Yengich asked.

"Extremely so. The brightest in the company."

"And he voiced to you his concerns about directions that CFS was taking. Is that a fair statement?"

"Yes."

"But they never boiled over into any arguments or anything such as that between you?"

"No."

"Not even the type of argument that a father and son might have—is that correct?"

"No."

"And so any dispute between you and Steve at that point would have been, again, coupled with the genuine affection that you held for him—is that correct?"

"I think so. But I don't think we really had disputes."

Sheets was making it easy for him. As Yengich knew, Christensen had had many serious disputes with his boss, in front of witnesses, as the CFS ship sank. But all that would come out at trial. It was enough just to suggest it here.

Yengich floated another red herring.

"Having been in the insurance industry for a period of time—and you did consider Steve Christensen to be an important part of J. Gary Sheets & Associates—correct?"

Sheets: "And CFS."

"And CFS—is that correct?"

"Yes."

"Was Mr. Christensen insured by either of those companies?"

"Just by CFS."

"And was that insurance policy still extant at the time of his death?"

"Was it still what?"

"Did it still exist at the time of his death?"

"Yes. We bought some buy-sell insurance on all of us in the early part of '85."

"Who was the beneficiary of that?"

"CFS."

"Has that been paid?"

"That has been paid."

"What was the amount of that insurance?"

"Five hundred thousand."

On redirect, D'Elia made bouillabaisse of Yengich's red herring.

"Now, with respect to the insurance on Mr. Christensen, that is known as a key-man policy, isn't it?"

"That's right."

"And is that customary for CFS, and other corporations that you have ever been a part of, to have this on key men within the group?"

"Yes. We were far too long in coming to do that. We felt, for a few years before, we needed to have key-man insurance. Just slow getting around to it."

D'Elia asked if CFS was "the sole beneficiary of that key-man insurance policy."

Sheets: "That's right."

"And has that all gone to the bankruptcy?"

"Yes."

"Have you received any part of that insurance policy?"

"Personally?"

"Yes."

"No."

"I don't have anything further. Thank you."

When Aaron Teplick, a curly-haired thirteen-year-old with a serene, Buddha-like face, took the stand, his head barely showed over the witness box. The microphone was set as low as it would go and it still pointed at his forehead.

But nothing fazed Aaron.

Before the hearing, D'Elia and Ken Farnsworth had prepared him for this moment.

"Do you know how important you are to this case?" Farnsworth asked.

"Oh, I don't know," said Aaron offhandedly, as if he had been asked what he wanted for lunch.

"Do you know why this is so important?"

"Does Mark Hofmann have a van like that?" No doubt about it, Aaron was a smart kid.

Teplick Senior was more of a problem. D'Elia and Farnsworth spent more time reassuring Aaron's father, Dr. Stanley Teplick, than Aaron. Would testifying against Hofmann expose his son to any danger, he wanted to know?

"The crisis is over," D'Elia assured him. "Mark isn't going to go out and blow up everybody who testifies. There are just too many of them. Besides, he can't even walk."

From deep inside the witness box, Aaron repeated, in the same calm, assured voice, his account of the night of October 14 when he saw a van pull up in front of the Sheets house off Naniloa Drive.

"I looked through the Levolor blinds and saw some lights coming down the drive. It was going quite slow. . . . It was a gold-colored Toyota van, a Wonder Wagon. . . ."

When he was finished, Farnsworth, who was sitting in the courtroom, wanted to stand up and applaud.

Like D'Elia, Yengich knew how unreliable child witnesses could be, how easily discredited. And if ever a witness needed to be discredited, Aaron Teplick was it.

"Aaron, have we ever met before?" Yengich adopted a pleasant, avuncular tone that he used often if never entirely convincingly.

"No."

"Okay. Just shook hands out in the hallway—is that correct?"

"Yes."

"Introduced myself to you—right? You don't have any problem answering my questions, do you?"

"No."

"Have you ever been down to a Toyota dealership and looked at the books that they have about these vans?" Yengich wanted to get Aaron to admit that the police had manipulated him into identifying the van as a Toyota. After all, doesn't one van look more or less like any other to a thirteen-year-old? Especially in the dark.

"Not the books," Teplick answered. "I've seen them in magazines."

"In magazines." Teplick was certain it was a Toyota because he knew the differences between various vans. At that moment it became clear to everyone in the courtroom, especially Yengich, that Hofmann had had the misfortune to drive by a young car buff that night.

"Did the police officers, at any time, actually take you and show you a van, an actual van?"

"Yes."

"When was that, son?"

"It was after I drew the diagram and the picture and everything." Thirteen-year-old Aaron Teplick knew exactly what Ron Yengich was driving at.

Yengich quickly changed course. "And you described it [to the police] as a gold van, right?" Yengich had discovered that Toyota listed Hofmann's van as "copper."

"Yes."

"That was the phrase you used—is that correct?"

"A gold Toyota Wonder Wagon' was the phrase I used." Aaron was a match for Yengich.

"A gold Toyota Wonder Wagon. And you meant, by gold, you meant gold in color—right?"

"Right."

"Now, you know the difference between the color gold and the color copper, don't you?"

"Yes."

"What color is a penny?"

"Copper."

"Is that copper color to you?" Yengich asked, holding up a penny.

"Yes."

"What color is this?" He held up a gold wristwatch.

"Gold."

"For the record, I have a 1983-D penny and my law partner's watch." Yengich sat down with a satisfied look on his face.

But in the back of the courtroom, Ken Farnsworth was also smiling. He knew what Yengich didn't, that a representative of Toyota had already submitted a statement that the Wonder Wagon didn't even come in gold. It came only in copper—whatever you called it. D'Elia knew it too. Holy shit, he thought to himself as Yengich sat down, are you in for a big surprise when we go to trial.

After Aaron Teplick's testimony, Jim Bell noticed a change in the press. In the lobby outside the courtroom later that day, he was approached by a TV reporter who had proclaimed Hofmann's innocence loudly and often during the long months of investigation. "Well, do you think he'll plead guilty now?" the reporter asked eagerly. "There's no question what the kid saw."

Elliott.

The last person to testify that day was an attractive woman in her early twenties. She gave her name as Kelly Maria

"Kelly, directing your attention to the month of October of 1985," D'Elia began, "where did you work?"

"Radio Shack."

"And where is the location of that Radio Shack?"

"Cottonwood Mall, Highland Drive."

D'Elia sensed some movement at the defense table. He had already noticed that Yengich didn't have the case under control, that he hadn't begun to read all the thousands of pages of materials the county attorney's office had dumped on him in the last two months. Could it be, D'Elia wondered, that the defense hadn't read the report on this witness yet? That they didn't know what she was going to say? That only Hofmann knew what she might say?

"And now, directing your attention, Kelly, to the 7th of October, 1985," he continued, "were you working on that day?"

“Yes.”

“Do you remember what day of the week that happened to be?”

“Monday.”

D’Elia approached her with a copy of a Radio Shack receipt. “And do you recognize that receipt?”

“Yes.”

“What is it a receipt for?”

“Battery holder, a small switch, and lamp.”

“Now, the battery holders, what size battery holders are they? To fit what size battery?”

“A C-cell.”

“And now, on this date, do you remember making this sale to any individual?”

“Vaguely.”

“Do you remember anything about the individual . . .” Again, he heard shuffling at the defense table, Mark scribbling something on his pad, perhaps, “. . . the name that they gave to you?”

“Mike Hansen,” said Elliott. She spelled it.

“What do you remember, if anything, about the actual transaction that day, Kelly? First of all, do you remember what time of day it was?”

“Probably in the afternoon.”

“Why do you say that?”

“Mornings are usually very slow.”

“And do you recollect anything else about that actual transaction?”

“Just the merchandise that was purchased.”

“Why do you recognize that merchandise?”

“Because it is not a common switch, and it is not common to buy the switch and battery holders at the same time.”

“Now, you have worked at Radio Shack for a year and a half. How many mercury switches like that have you sold to any individuals at any time?”

“Maybe a dozen.”

“And how many C-size battery holders had you ever sold two of to any individual in either Decatur, Illinois, or here in Salt Lake City?”

“Including this situation, maybe twice.”

“And how many times have you ever sold a mercury switch like this along with two C-size battery cell packs at Radio Shack during your entire year and a half experience?”

"This is the only one I can recollect."

D'Elia moved in closer to the witness stand. "Now, do you remember anything about the individual who purchased these items?" Out of the corner of his eye, he could see the defense table "tighten." It was a physical movement, unconscious, of course, everybody pulling closer together, wincing collectively. Clearly, they feared that this woman could identify the man who bought the C-cell battery packs and mercury switch from her on October 7, that she was going to wheel around on the witness stand and point her finger at Mark Hofmann. Of course, if Yengich had done his homework, he would have known, as D'Elia did, that Elliott couldn't make a positive identification. This will teach him to read the summaries we send him, thought D'Elia.

Through all the testimony so far, Hofmann had played the great stone face, his expression never changing from the fleshy ennui of a bored choirboy. Now D'Elia saw a chance to make him sweat.

He stepped back to include both Hofmann and the witness in his line of vision. "Would you ever be able to make an identification of that individual again?" he said slowly, separating his words with pauses and waving his arm to encompass the entire courtroom.

"Possibly," said Elliott. Great response, D'Elia thought.

"Possibly?" he repeated. "How about looking around the courtroom right now. . . ."

At that moment, Hofmann looked away. He squirmed around in his chair and actually looked away as D'Elia watched in astonishment. His face turned pink, and he tugged at the collar of his shirt. For the first time, he looked scared.

D'Elia finished his question as slowly as he could, "Would you take a look around the courtroom and see if you can recognize anybody that is either similar or not."

Elliott dutifully scanned the courtroom from left to right, saving the defense table for last. Fortunately for Hofmann, Yengich had positioned him so that he was partly hidden from the witness stand by a lectern that the lawyers used. If he hunkered down in his chair, Kelly Elliott might hardly see him at all.

And with D'Elia staring right at him, that's exactly what he did. Trying not to be noticed, he began to slink lower beneath the defense table. While Elliott looked from face to face, still on the other side of the room, taking her time, Hofmann began to disappear from view.

The courtroom was absolutely quiet.

Oh, God, thought D'Elia, he thinks he's going to be identified this time, and he's going down. The next sound D'Elia expected to hear was that of "everything dropping into his pants."

Finally, Elliott looked back at D'Elia. "I don't see anyone."

And Hofmann sighed. For the world to hear, he actually sighed.

Judge Grant was looking at Kelly Elliott at that moment and missed the drama at the defense table. He had already come to the conclusion that Hofmann was a tough nut, an emotional cipher. Normally, he could tell from a defendant's posture when a witness said something that was true but was disputed by the defense. He could see what he called "aspects of denial" either in the body language or, if the defendant was a particularly hard case, in the eyes. But not with Mark Hofmann. As far as Grant could see, Hofmann had given away nothing. The only other person he had ever had in court who was that way was Ted Bundy. "If Hofmann is guilty," he said to himself, "then he must have no value system in any way, shape, or form."

Ken Farnsworth was one of the multitude of people watching Mark Hofmann closely. Because Jim Bell was scheduled to testify as a witness and therefore couldn't attend the hearings prior to his appearance, Farnsworth sat through the early sessions, watching Hofmann's reactions and thinking about his interview with Eric Nielsen, the police psychologist.

In March, Farnsworth had asked to see him. He wanted to know as much about Hofmann's mind as possible. Like any good cop, Farnsworth had a sharp instinct for people and their motivations, but if Ron Yengich ever let him interview Mark, he wanted to be sure to "ring all the right bells."

The meeting took place at Farnsworth's dilapidated bachelor pad in a peeling turn-of-the-century house northeast of downtown, furnished sparsely with a weight-lifting machine, an antique Chinese carpet, a small dining table, and the piquant odor of cat litter. A huge safe stood in the bedroom. It held all of Farnsworth's guns and shooting medals.

Nielsen, who had lost an eye (and a fast-track career as a professional soldier) in the Vietnam War, listened as Farnsworth reviewed the facts of the case. Then he offered his opinion. "Mark sounds basically like the classic sociopath, although he doesn't show the vicious aggressiveness that most sociopaths show."

It was the pressures on Hofmann at the end—from Wilding, from the Church, even from his wife in regard to the new house—that had transformed him into "a sociopath out of control."

"My general sense is that we are dealing with a paranoid personality disorder," Nielsen explained. "His fondness for his children would not suggest psychopathology. Also, he's methodical. He is capable of very long-term planning, which is atypical of psychopaths. Psychopaths tend not to think about the consequences of their actions."

"Often, when people think of a paranoid personality disorder, they think of the suspiciousness. With Mark, suspiciousness isn't the salient feature in his personality. Grandiosity is the salient feature. He really thinks he is a superior person. And he obviously is bright, bright enough to pull off a number of things."

For Nielsen, that explained why Hofmann wore the letter jacket when he delivered the first bomb to Steve Christensen's office, an action that seemed uncharacteristically stupid. "He had come to believe that he could get himself out of anything," said Nielsen. "This is just speculation. But he was a solitary kind of kid, who probably retreated a lot into fantasy. Since he never belonged to a group of kids, he probably retreated more and more into his grandiose fantasies."

And what about his bizarre relationship with the Mormon Church? Why the elaborate scam and the forgeries discrediting the Church, an effort that, in the end, didn't net him very much money?

"Among his grandiose fantasies were some that involved his parents," said Nielsen. "I think he's real ambivalent about his dad. I think that, if anything, his effort was probably to destroy something in the long run that was of tremendous value to his dad, to discredit the Church, that is, and thereby to shake his dogmatic beliefs. And also to assume the dominant position in their relationship."

"In a way, the Church hierarchy became a symbol for his father, so in harming the Church officials, he was also harming his father."

That's why Nielsen thought the third bomb was intended for Hugh Pinnock. "Pinnock was intimately involved in bringing all the pressure to bear on him. Obviously, Mark was trying to take out people whom he saw as sources of stress. It sounds as if it was related to the fact that he was being replaced by Steve Christensen. He was no longer going to be the Church's finder of rare and controversial documents, Christensen was."

Suddenly, it was all obvious, Farnsworth thought—as if Nielsen had opened up a window on the impenetrable darkness of Hofmann's motivations and let in a shaft of sunlight. The third bomb had to be for Pinnock. What better way to shut down the McLellin deal and get the creditors off his back? If a bomb had exploded in the First Presidency building, no one would have ventured out for a month. The media would have gone mad. It had to have been for Pinnock. Nobody else could have given Hofmann that much "bang for the buck."

Nielsen didn't think that ten to twenty years in prison would do anything to improve Hofmann's personality. "That personality type doesn't get any better. If anything, a prison environment will just solidify that paranoia."

Why did Mark keep up the facade of being a good Mormon, going on a mission and attending church? "I suspect he went on a mission, not because he wanted to, but because the failure to go would have put him in direct conflict with his father, which he preferred not to do. So he did that under a fair amount of resentment."

Nielsen speculated that the legal proceedings could only exacerbate tensions within the family. "I think that's likely in any family, but I think that members of the LDS Church are more likely to get goodness and family wrapped up together. Family is part of the route to heaven, if you will. If somebody in the family does something bad, it reflects on the whole family. It erodes the eternal family. So a wayward child tends to pull the family down together."

As for Hofmann's anger at his father: "It's hard to know. He may have been compliant but pissed off all the time. He may have expressed it all internally. Or he may have acted it out in a fantasy life. It got acted out symbolically in the end."

Farnsworth asked about an incident that had been bothering him ever since it came up on a routine police check following the third bombing. On January 8, 1981, after the discovery of the Anthon Transcript, after he was established in the documents business, Hofmann had been arrested for stealing a 76¢ bag of sliced almonds from Smith's Food King on East Sixth Avenue. Why would he risk exposure and ridicule for a 76¢ bag of nuts?

"Sociopaths get a kick out of doing illicit things," said Nielsen. "They do them just for the thrill of it. Like a lot of things he did, Mark may have done it for the kick of getting away with it."

"In the end, I think his grandiosity got the best of him. He lost his ability to harness it and to restrain it. He started to do things that were just too risky, thinking things like, 'I could wear my letterman's jacket, plant a bomb, and walk out, and nobody's going to remember me.'

"But," Nielsen added cautiously, "one thing is absolutely clear, and that is, Mark is never going to tell you what was going on inside Mark. He will tell you about the brilliance of his actions, but nothing about his motivations. He will tell you what he did, but he will never tell you what he thinks."

The next day, Jim Bell took the stand.

Gerry D'Elia led him methodically through the mountain of evidence that had been accumulated in six months of investigation. Bell described arriving at the Judge Building on the morning of October 15, described the bomb scene, the position of the victim's body, the condition of the doorway. He identified photographs of the body and the scene that were taken at the time.

"Is this an accurate representation of the wounds you saw when you first entered the Judge Building on the morning of the 15th?" D'Elia asked.

"Yes, it is."

Then began the laborious process of identifying the evidence, beginning with the diagram Bell had drawn at the scene on which the location of each piece of evidence was carefully marked.

"Were you in charge of the scene as far as collecting the evidence at the Judge Building, Detective Bell?"

"Yes, I was."

D'Elia showed him the first batch of plastic bags, each with its own number—C-1, C-10, C-20, C-34, etc.—corresponding to its location on Bell's diagram. Together, they were State's Proposed Exhibit No. 41.

"What these are, are items of all types of batteries that were removed from the Steve Christensen bombing scene at the Judge Building. They're battery tops and batteries."

"What size batteries are they?"

"C-cell."

Next came State's Exhibit No. 43, pieces of the cardboard box that contained the bomb. Then No. 46, including bits of wire, an Estes rocket igniter, and a mercury switch. Then No. 45, which contained item C-33A, a three-inch glass vial.

"What is in the vial within that package, Detective Bell?"

"This is a carpentry nail. Those were the type of nails that were in the bomb in the Judge Building and were scattered throughout the whole building."

"About how many nails did you happen to find scattered throughout the building as a result of the explosion?"

"I didn't totally count them. It got so ridiculous, I just quit picking them up after a while. I would guess somewhere about a hundred or so, a hundred and fifty."

"Where did that specific nail come from?"

Bell looked at the package. "This specific nail came out of Mr. Christensen's body at the autopsy."

"What part of his body?"

"His head, his brain."

Bell looked directly at Hofmann. He had determined in advance that he was going to look at Hofmann as much as he could while on the stand, especially when he described the gruesome evidence at the site of Steve Christensen's death. Like everybody else, he wanted to elicit some reaction from that fleshy mask.

"Now," said D'Elia. "Would you open up the packet and take out C-179." Bell pulled from the packet a mangled, nine-inch piece of twisted steel. When he first saw it, he had called it "the ugliest-looking weapon I ever saw as a policeman." He held it up in front of him to make sure the entire courtroom got a good look—especially Mark Hofmann.

"What is that, Detective Bell?"

"This right here is a piece of pipe that was removed from Mr. Christensen's chest."

A faint gasp, more like a change in air pressure, swept the room. Joan Gorton and Kathy Sheets's children covered their eyes in a reflex of anguish. Terri Christensen gathered her things, clinging to her composure, and walked quickly from the room.

Bell looked at Hofmann. His eyes had glazed over, his chest was heaving, his body had gone rigid, his neck had tensed till the tendons stood out, his knuckles went white, his mouth slacked open. Suddenly Bell realized what was happening—and others in the courtroom later confirmed it. "Did you see Mark?" Jerry Taylor asked him at the next adjournment. "When they showed that piece of pipe, he had a goddam orgasm!"

Later in Jim Bell's testimony, D'Elia returned to the elusive Mike Hansen.

Bell recounted how, on the morning of October 18, he had sent agents to canvass the local Radio Shack stores in search of receipts for the components used to make the first two bombs.

"Did you receive a report from any of them at any time?" asked D'Elia.

"Yes. Agent—Sergeant—Larry Stott of the Salt Lake Police Department and Agent Jim Thompson from the ATF in Sacramento, who had been here in Salt Lake, had called in to the police department and informed us that they had located a receipt where a person had purchased a mercury switch and a battery pack and the address was bad and the name on that receipt was M. Hansen."

The same day, Bell had obtained a search warrant for Mark Hofmann's house.

"Who was in charge of the execution of the warrant?"

"I was."

D'Elia approached the witness stand with State's Proposed Exhibit No. 63. "I'm going to ask you just to take that from the packet and tell us whether you can identify what's in there or not."

"Yes, this is the MIKE HANSEN envelope that was located in Mr. Hofmann's house."

"Where in the box in the southeast basement bedroom was it that you saw that?"

"It was laying right on top. . . ."

"What else was in that box?"

"There were documents on Mormon history, Mormon religion."

"Now, when you specifically seized this envelope, No. 63, why did you seize it?"

"Because prior to going in there, we'd heard of M. Hansen, who had purchased the mercury switch and the battery pack, and that's Mike Hansen and that's why it was taken."

"Now, this Radio Shack receipt that you originally referred to, Detective Bell, that the Mike Hansen was on, did you ever have a subsequent opportunity to see that Radio Shack receipt?"

"Yes, I did."

"And there was an address on it?"

"Yes, there was."

"Did you ever go to the address . . . ?"

"Yes."

"And what did you find?"

"I found a vacant field and a parking lot."

After lunch, David Biggs resumed the questioning. He handed Bell the envelope with MIKE HANSEN written on it. "Is there something else on that envelope, some other writing that was there, previous to it being seized?"

"In the center here, it says it was mailed to Utah Engraving at 231 Emerson Lane, Salt Lake City."

"Did there come a time when you visited Utah Engraving?"

"Yes, on March 3rd of 1986."

On that day, Ken Farnsworth and David Biggs had gone together to the small shop on Emerson Lane, a tiny back alley between First and Second East, and talked with the owner, Julius Andersen, a seventy-year-old Dane. Andersen served as honorary consul to Utah from both Denmark and Sweden and proudly displayed a huge Royal Danish seal on his office wall. Given half a chance, he would lapse into stories about trips to his native land and hobnobbing with its royalty.

Farnsworth showed him the envelope that they had found in Hofmann's basement with the name MIKE HANSEN written on it. Andersen looked at it and said immediately, "Jorgen wrote that."

He introduced them to Jorgen Olsen, a short, blunt man, who darted around the shop like a mechanical figure in an eccentric old clock. Andersen had imported him from Denmark some time ago but had taught him pitifully little English in the years since.

As soon as Olsen saw the envelope, he pointed to it and said something in Danish. "Oh, yeah, I wrote that," Andersen translated. To prove it, Olsen wrote out MIKE HANSEN several times in the same capital letters. It meant that Olsen had, at some point, made a plate for this man named Mike Hansen.

Farnsworth and Biggs searched through boxes and boxes of Andersen's receipts, which were stored in no particular order, but came up empty. "Maybe we can find the negatives," Andersen suggested helpfully. "When do you think these plates were done?"

Farnsworth and Biggs had no idea.

The negatives were stored in huge photographic boxes, each containing thousands of negatives, six months' worth to a box, again in no particular order. They asked for everything from October 1984 through April 1985 and settled down for another interminable search.

Farnsworth lifted the lid from the first red-and-yellow box and looked glumly at the massive pile of black films. He picked up four or five, looked at each on a light table, then tossed them aside and reached for another batch. After the second one, he let out a whoop. "Bingo!"

It was a negative for a promissory note, one of the notes that had been "signed" with Jim Bridger's X.

On the third day of the hearing, April 17, Jack Smith, a photoengraver at Debouzek Engraving Co. in Salt Lake City, took the stand. A forty-year veteran of the printing and engraving business, Smith had a gentle manner and leathery smile.

Biggs showed him an invoice from Debouzek Engraving, marked State's Exhibit No. 69.

"Do you recognize specifically that particular invoice marked State's No. 69?"

"Yes, I do."

"How do you recognize it?"

"Because I made it out."

"Is it in your handwriting?"

"It's in my handwriting."

"Let's go through it briefly. Tell the court, what it is that was ordered on that particular receipt?"

"It was a Jack London signature." He explained that the customer had ordered an etched plate made from a sample signature provided by the customer. The plate was then mounted on wood "so the customer can use it for letterpress work or to print."

"Can you tell how State's 69 was paid for by the individual?"

"It was paid in cash."

"What was the name of the individual that ordered that particular plate?"

"A Mike Hansen."

Ken Farnsworth had accompanied Biggs to Debouzek Engraving about a month after the arrest, led there by a $2 check found among Hofmann's papers, made out to Debouzek on March 8, 1986.

Sitting in his little office surrounded by samples of artwork the firm had done at the turn of the century—"Wasatch Brand Butter," "Popularity Chocolates," "Vernal Honey"—Mr. Debouzek, the son of the founder, seemed baffled by their questions. "Gee," he said, "I'm the owner, but I don't really do all this stuff." He sent them to Jack Smith, who sat at a long, low counter against the back wall next to a tall filing cabinet filled, undoubtedly, with pink invoices in no particular order, Farnsworth feared.

Smith said he had seen Hofmann on television and in the newspapers but didn't remember having done work for him. Farnsworth explained what they were looking for and began showing Smith copies of Hofmann's most important documents.

When he got to the "Oath of a Freeman," Smith took one look at it and said, "I made that."

Farnsworth was afraid to look at Biggs. "Come again?" he ventured.

"Yeah," said Smith nonchalantly. "I remember making that one."

Farnsworth struggled to maintain his professional composure. "Do you think maybe you could find it for us?"

"Yeah, sure." He loped into the back room and a few minutes later returned with the negative for Mark Hofmann's "Oath of a Freeman." He pointed at Farnsworth's copy. "That was printed from this negative."

Farnsworth couldn't hold back any longer. "Don't you realize," he shouted, "this is a one and a half million dollar fraud!"

Smith looked at Debouzek, who was standing next to him, and the two men said, almost in unison, "We didn't know." They were obviously afraid the police might consider them part of the scam—accessories after the fact, or something. "The plate has a disclaimer at the bottom," they pointed out.

A few more minutes and Smith produced the receipt. It was dated March 26 and made out to "M. Hansen." Smith also produced a second receipt for another version of the "Oath of a Freeman." The customer's name on that order was "Mark Harris," but the telephone number he gave was Mark Hofmann's and the receipt was dated March 8—the same day Hofmann, apparently short of cash, wrote a $2 check to Debouzek Engraving.

After the fourth day, Scott Christensen stopped coming to the hearings. Farnsworth asked Mac Christensen why.

"You convinced him Mark's the guy. He doesn't need to hear any more. All he wanted to know was whether Mark was the guy who did it. He's absolutely convinced."

So was Mac Christensen. So convinced that he wondered why they bothered to go on with the hearings. "Do we have to do any more?" he asked Farnsworth. "Is there any more point in going farther? Does anybody have any doubt in their mind that this guy did it?"

Farnsworth couldn't help gloating. "It gets better than this," he beamed. "We are saving better things for later. The best evidence we're saving for the trial."

92

There was one more twist to the Mike Hansen story. David Biggs called Sonda Gary to the stand.

"Where do you work?" asked Biggs.

"At Salt Lake Stamp."

Biggs showed her State's Exhibit No. 68, a copy of a receipt from Salt Lake Stamp. "Can you identify that particular receipt?"

"Yes, I can."

"How?"

"I am the one that wrote it out."

"To whom was this particular receipt made out for?"

"It was made out for Mike Hansen."

"The address?"

"He didn't give me an address. It was P.O. Box 9421, Salt Lake City, Utah, 84109."

"Can you tell me what it is that was requested to be produced by Salt Lake Stamp by Mr. Hansen?"

"A stamp."

"Did Mr. Hansen bring in something to show you to give you what it is he wanted you to produce?"

"Yes, he did. He brought me in a copy of the stamp that he wanted made." Biggs pointed to some writing at the bottom of the receipt. "It says, in parentheses, 'Needs to be exactly' and, underlined three or four times, 'like above' exclamation point. Who wrote that?"

"I did."

"Can you tell me why you would have written that?"

"I asked him if he just wanted a rubber stamp to say that and he said, 'No. It has to be exactly like the one I brought in,' and so I wrote that down underneath so our typesetter would know he would need to make a photocopy of that."

"What is it that he wanted reproduced?"

"It's just a rubber stamp."

"What does it say?"

"It says Austin Lewis, and it looks like—it's an address, 301 Harper, Berkeley, California." It was the name and address of the friend to whom Jack London had, supposedly, given a first edition of Call of the Wild complete with a "dream inscription."

Biggs himself had found the receipt in the attic of the Salt Lake Stamp Co., a big outfit that made rubber stamps for almost every business in town. He was, as usual, going through boxes and boxes of papers surrounded by dim light and dusty rafters, thinking that this was, without doubt, the most ridiculous search of all. What was a suave, ambitious young lawyer like David Biggs doing searching through crates full of old receipts anyway?

They had chosen Salt Lake Stamp for no reason other than it was the biggest stamp-making company around and therefore the most likely one for Hofmann to use. They had already been through all the receipts in the attic (and the basement) once. They had gone all the way back to 1978 and come up empty. Now they were starting the search all over again.

Then Biggs hit paydirt. "Look," he called out, "a Mike Hansen!" The receipt was stapled to two other pieces of paper: one the original artwork submitted by "Hansen," the other a proof of the finished stamp. (Later, they found in the same crates an order for stamps used to print notes for the "Spanish Fork Cooperative Institution." That one was made out to Mark Hofmann.)

Biggs was proud of his discovery, so when Jim Bell brought it over to the county attorney's office two weeks later, he took a special interest in it. As he watched his colleagues pass it around, he had a crazy idea. "Jim, has this thing been dusted for prints?"

"No," said Bell, thinking, Give me a break. Fingerprints dry up and fade away, in months sometimes, and these had been around since 1982.

But Biggs didn't care about what usually happened. He just had a feeling. He put the stapled papers back in the envelope. "I want these analyzed for prints. And I want it done today."

"Okay," said Bell, shaking his head, "but it's not going to show anything."

They sent it off to Scott Pratt, the latent-prints examiner at the state crime lab, a former FBI man and a real Da Vinci of his craft. If anybody could find a print on that document, Pratt could.

Biggs called Jim Bell back to the stand after Sonda Gary stepped down.

"I would like to show you what's been marked State's Exhibit No. 75 and ask if you have seen that before."

"Yes. This is fingerprints that were taken off Mark Hofmann up at the LDS Hospital."

"What hand?"

"Left hand."

"Were you present when Mark Hofmann's left fingerprints were taken?"

"Yes. They were done at my request, and I was present in the room when it was done."

Then Biggs called Scott Pratt to the witness stand. He was an unlikely hero, soft-spoken and nondescript in his regulation police-force mustache.

"Who do you work for?"

"The State of Utah crime laboratory."

"What position do you hold at the state crime lab?"

"I am the latent-prints examiner."

Biggs showed Pratt State's Exhibit No. 75. "I ask you if you can identify that?"

"This is a fingerprint card that was shown to me by Detective Bell representing Mark Hofmann."

Biggs then showed him State's Exhibit No. 68A, containing the three pieces of paper that Biggs had recovered from Salt Lake Stamp.

"What were you requested to do, if anything, with 68A?"

"My request was to process these documents, three documents, for the possibility of finding any latent fingerprints contained upon the documents."

"Did you do that?"

"Yes, I did."

"What, if anything, did you find?"

"On the document which I marked as No. B which has a '1' and a stamp of 'Austin Lewis' and down at the bottom says 'Needs to be exactly like above'—I found some identifiable prints on that document."

"Were you able to identify the latent print on 68A with any known prints that you were shown?"

"Yes. On the document that's State Exhibit 68A, up in the upper left-hand side of the document I found a latent fingerprint which was found to be the same as the left ring finger on the fingerprint card bearing the name Mark Hofmann.”

After the Mike Hansen testimony, the mood of the press and the public changed overnight. When Ken Farnsworth came to the courtroom that day, he could feel the audience “rolling over” from the defense to the prosecution. Jim Bell, who had been going over to the courthouse during breaks to see if the prosecution needed anything from the evidence room, sensed a complete transformation. Mark Hofmann was no longer the innocent victim of a bungling police department, he was the calculating, cold-blooded killer of two innocent people. The police were no longer closed-minded clods, they were intrepid investigators, guardians of the peace.

One female television reporter approached Bell after the Hansen testimony and put her arm around him. “We would really like to interview you and Ken,” she said, nuzzling him. (They had never been introduced. He recognized her from TV.) Bell was too polite, too chivalrous, too diffident to say what he was thinking: You bitch. After all this crap you’ve thrown our way, in one day you want us to be friends and tell all.

The only apology came from Mike Carter, the court reporter for the Tribune who had roused the cops at every turn in the investigation and earned a nearly permanent place on the police shit list. In just three days, Carter’s courtroom dispatches had gone from championing Ron Yengich (DEFENSE ATTACKS KEY WITNESS IN HOFMANN CASE) to congratulating the prosecution (FINGERPRINT ON RECEIPT MATCHES HOFMANN’S). “I thought I knew everything there was to know in this case,” he told Bell and Farnsworth’s boss, Captain Oran Peck. “I thought I had all the sources. And I didn’t know shit. You guys kept things secret from us that I had no idea about.”

When Peck relayed the apology, Farnsworth thought it was about time. “No shit, shinola,” he said. “What does he think we’ve been doing over here?”

On the fifth day of hearings, Bob Stott began presenting evidence on charges related to the documents, and the courtroom fell, almost instantly, into a profound slumber. Stott led a parade of witnesses through minute descriptions, often confusingly detailed, of dozens of documents and the circumstances under which each one was acquired from Mark Hofmann. On cross-examination, Brad Rich, Yengich's second, compounded the ennui by taking each witness back over the same flat ground a second time, sometimes a third time. By the sixth day, reporters felt free to put down their pencils whenever Rich rose to speak, and members of the audience were openly expressing their disdain for his endless quibbling.

About the only exciting moments were provided by a crazy lady in scarf and glasses who sat in the back of the courtroom and every now and then yelled out in a strident voice, "The Church is railroading Mark Hofmann! He's taking the fall for people in the Church!"

In the witness room, Ralph Bailey, Wilford Cardon, Al Rust, and other Hofmann victims occupied themselves talking still more deals. A collector from Arizona tried to buy a "packet of gold," an extremely rare, early form of Mormon currency, from Rust. When Rust steadfastly refused to sell, Ralph Bailey turned to him sympathetically. "Al, do I know where that packet came from?"

Rust rolled his eyes and nodded sheepishly. "Yeah."

Amid all the talk of irresistible deals and rates of return and double collateral, Brent Ashworth's appearance was a jolting shot of humanity. Two weeks after the bombings, while Ashworth was out of town, his seven-year-old son, Sam, had been hit by a car driven by drunken teenagers. For three months, he had languished in a coma. Then, for three more months, he seemed to get better. Charlene Ashworth stood by his bed all day and Brent all night. Then, on the Friday before Ashworth was scheduled to testify, Sam died.

He blamed Mark Hofmann. He was not there when the accident happened partly because he feared for his life, because Hofmann had sent a message from the hospital that he should get out of town, that he might be the next victim.

David Biggs, Ashworth's cousin and law school classmate, offered to put off his testimony, but Ashworth said, "I'd like to get it over with before the funeral so I can go to the funeral without having this thing hanging over me." Earlier on the day he was scheduled to testify, Ron Yengich—another of Ashworth's law school classmates—had approached him. "I'm sorry to hear about your son," he said. "Would it be agreeable to you if we came down and talked to you privately in a few days? And we'll waive our cross-examination?"

Ashworth considered it a gracious gesture.

Later that day in court, when Yengich stood up and announced he wasn't going to cross-examine Ashworth, Hofmann shot him a startled look that said, You're not?

There was one element of suspense still hanging over the hearings: Would Gordon Hinckley testify? As late as April 19, the defense had been telling reporters that they expected to see Hinckley on the stand the following week. Bob Stott's brave determination to subpoena Hinckley seemed to have dissolved in the three weeks since the meeting in Hinckley's office, although no one knew exactly why. After that meeting, David Biggs and everybody else in the county attorney's office had been cut off from any further contact with Church officials. Stott insisted that he, and he alone, would deal with the Church.

Farnsworth, for one, was not reassured. He had seen the way Stott dealt with other, lesser Church officials. Like Hugh Pinnock. In briefing Stott in preparation for Pinnock's testimony at the hearings, Farnsworth had told him about Pinnock's statement to the effect that he considered the piece of papyrus that Hofmann showed him to be genuine—that is, one of the papyri from which Joseph Smith translated the Book of Abraham. Stott refused to believe it. "I won't ask Pinnock that on the stand," he snapped, "because I think he's lying."

"But Bob, this is an important piece of evidence," Farnsworth insisted. "You've got to ask the questions." Stott refused to do it. He refused to be a party to exposing a General Authority to ridicule: either for lying, or for being unable to distinguish between commonplace hieroglyphics and a genuine Joseph Smith papyrus. At the preliminary hearing, Stott stuck to his pledge and skipped over the subject entirely.

If Stott was that deferential to Pinnock, his colleagues wondered, how could he stand up to Hinckley? The fact that he was known to have had several one-on-one meetings with Hinckley in the interim only fueled speculation that a deal, explicit or implicit, had already been cut.

But Hinckley still had a problem. If he wanted to be certain to avoid the witness chair, somebody else needed to sign off on any deal: Ron Yengich. And with the day approaching when Stott was scheduled to put the Stowell letter into evidence, Yengich was still making noises about calling Hinckley to the stand.

That's when Bob Stott paid an unusual visit to the counsel for the defense. For the record, he took David Biggs with him to Yengich's office on 4th South.

"President Hinckley doesn't want to testify," Stott told Yengich. "And we don't want to call him any more than we want to call any other recalcitrant witness. How would it be if we set up an appointment for you to talk to him? And then you come to us, after you talk to him, and see if you can enter into a stipulation as to what his testimony will be." Stott made it sound like his idea, but everyone assumed he could never have offered a meeting if Hinckley hadn't cleared it first.

Yengich accepted the offer.

It was a brief, tense, businesslike meeting. Different as they were, both men had something the other wanted. Hinckley wanted a stipulation that only Yengich could give him. But what did Yengich want? What he got was an agreement by Hinckley that Church officials would argue against the death penalty at Hofmann's sentencing.

Hinckley undoubtedly wanted more (a guarantee that Yengich wouldn't call him to testify at trial, for instance), and so did Yengich (an agreement that the Church would push for a plea bargain, perhaps), but those deals would have to wait.

For now, it was a sure sign of how Yengich thought the hearings were going that he was already hedging his bets against the death penalty.

Mark Hofmann had his own way of responding to the deteriorating situation in the courtroom. On April 23, after seven days of hearings, he reinjured his knee. As Ron Yengich told it, he had tried to take a step without crutches, fell, and fractured his kneecap. Between the surgery and the sedatives, Yengich argued, Mark would not be able to exercise his constitutional right to assist in his own defense. The hearings came to a sudden halt. Judge Grant was not pleased. It was a shame, he said, to interrupt a preliminary hearing already so complicated. But better that than to go through with it, only to have some higher court order him to repeat the whole thing. With great reluctance, he granted a continuance until May 5.

Local media scrambled to fill the news vacuum.

At KSL, a reporter, Jack Ford, suggested keeping the story alive by doing an extensive recap of the hearings to date.

It was a suggestion that almost cost him his job.

It wasn't the recap itself that got him in trouble. In fact, the station, like all the local stations, had long since learned that Hofmann was a ratings winner and the idea won instant approval. The problem was what he said in the recap. In reviewing the testimony that Hugh Pinnock had arranged a loan for Hofmann from the First Interstate Bank, he said the Church had helped to arrange a loan for Hofmann to buy the McLellin Collection. He also mentioned that the Church had arranged for the mission president in Nova Scotia to buy the McLellin Collection from Hofmann.

The moment the story aired, the roof caved in. The Church spokesman, Richard Lindsay, father of KSL anchorman Bruce Lindsay, called the news department raving mad. Spence Kinard buckled instantly and ran a retraction even before calling Ford at home to brief him on the situation. When Ford saw the retraction, he went through the ceiling. He set fire to the newsroom phone lines but Kinard was unapologetic. "You hung me out to dry," he said.

"Spence, it's not you who got hung out to dry," Ford shot back. "The Church is upset because we said they helped arrange a loan. Well they did! They say it was an individual, not the Church, but that's baloney. It may have been an individual who placed the call, but he was a Church official, sitting in his Church office, on Church time, using a Church phone, and he did it for the benefit of the Church. Nobody else wanted that McLellin Collection except the Church. And the Nova Scotia mission president doesn't collect documents. He was just a big-bucks guy who said, 'If you need help, I'll help you out.' If the Church says they weren't helping arrange any buyers for anything, how do you explain the fact that the Church volunteered to get an armored car to go down to Texas and pick the Collection up?"

The arguments were lost on Kinard. The only arguments he cared about were the ones that came from up the line, from senior management and higher.

The next day, Ford spent eight hours on the carpet, explaining his actions four times at four different levels of bureaucracy, right up to and including a meeting with the vice-president of Bonneville International, Don Gale.

And then it happened again.

In another report, Ford repeated a direct quotation from the testimony of Curt Bench, head of the rare-book department at Deseret Book. Bench had said that Hugh Pinnock or Gordon Hinckley called Steve Christensen to say that Hofmann hadn't paid back the loan yet and to ask him to tell Hofmann that if he didn't get his act together, they were going to excommunicate him.

This time, Hinckley went through the roof.

The Word came down through the bureaucracy like a thunderbolt from Mount Olympus. Several General Authorities called the KSL station manager, Jack Adamson, who called Kinard, who called Ford, and threatened to fire him on the spot. The report was in error, they argued, because Christensen did not have the authority to excommunicate anybody, and if he conveyed that message to anybody, he was doing so entirely on his own initiative.

But there was no mistaking what had really brought down the whirlwind: Ford had spoken Gordon Hinckley's name in connection with the Hofmann case. For months, everyone in the media had been tiptoeing around Hinckley's involvement, and now Ford had dared to jump on it with both feet. It was only a passing mention, but someone still wanted his head.

Once again, Ford tried to defend himself: "Christensen was relaying information from the Church Presidency," he explained. "All he was saying was that if Mark didn't straighten up, it might prompt the Church to bring excommunication proceedings. Christensen wasn't saying that he would excommunicate Mark, only that the Church might do it." Somebody upstairs was quibbling over legalistic turns of phrase, and Ford guessed who it was.

Then came the final warning. If he stepped out of line one more time, he would be fired. It was a clear, unequivocal message, and it came, unlike Christensen's warning, on the highest authority.

Ford had had enough. He told Kinard, "Okay. From now on, I'll just give you the information, and you write the stories. Whatever you want, you do it. You can write the story, then have three different people go in and change it around so that it doesn't make the Church look bad."

That seemed to satisfy them.

When the hearings resumed on May 5, the prosecution woke the courtroom up with its last two witnesses, William Flynn and George Throckmorton. Flynn spent nine hours on the stand explaining, for the first time in public, the key to Mark Hofmann's forgeries: the cracked ink.

Bob Stott began the direct examination with the most important question of all. "Are you a member of either the LDS Church or the Reorganized Church?"

"No, I'm not," said Flynn.

Stott got quickly to the point.

"Did you find any unusual or unnatural, abnormal characteristics on any of these documents?"

"Yes. On many of the documents, there appeared a microscopic cracking on the surface of the ink. These appeared on the questioned documents that we were examining."

"Besides the cracking, were there any other characteristics?"

"Yes. Under ultraviolet examination on several of the questioned documents, there was a one-directional running of the inks, or a constituent part of the inks, as if they had been wet."

"Were you able to determine if there had been any additions on the documents, any additional applications of ink?"

"Yes. On several of the documents, there were inks that were not consistent with the body of the document. That is to say, that data had been added to the document with a different ink."

"Now, besides these characteristics, was there anything common about the documents that you found these characteristics on?"

"Yes."

"What was that?"

"These anomalies that I spoke of all occurred on documents that had been dealt by the defendant in this case, Mark Hofmann."

By now, the courtroom was wide awake. Even Judge Grant had some questions.

After Flynn described the techniques by which a document could be artificially aged, he produced a sample "antique" document that he had created himself just the previous month using those techniques.

"Let me clarify," Grant jumped in. "The paper is modern paper aged by heating?"

"Correct, Your Honor. Everything about these documents is modern. It's modern paper that's been artificially aged, modern ink of an old formula that has also been artificially aged."

The following Monday, May 12, George Throckmorton picked up the story. In the course of the investigation, he had examined 688 documents written in iron gallotannic ink. Of that total, "I observed twenty-one that had this characteristic cracking effect."

"Out of the twenty-one or so that you have exhibited with the cracking effect, where, to your knowledge, did those documents come from?"

"All of them were purported to me as coming through Mark Hofmann."

Throckmorton also explained the printed forgeries, like the Deseret currency and the Jim Bridger notes. He and Flynn had found "trash marks" on the documents corresponding to microscopic flaws in the photographic negatives the police had found. These indicated that the documents had been printed from the negatives and not vice versa. If the documents had been photographed, Throckmorton explained, the microscopic flaws would not have been picked up by the camera and therefore would not have shown up on the negative.

Gerry D'Elia asked about the Spanish Fork Cooperative notes, the early Mormon money that Hofmann had sold to a number of collectors.

"Now, did you have any opportunity to make an ink comparison from the colored red, green, yellow, and blue inks on those Spanish Fork notes with any known inks that you received?"

"Yes, sir."

"What kind of ink was it that you had in your possession that you made the comparison with in those?"

"The red inks I examined on the Spanish Fork notes, on all four sets that I examined, I found to be indistinguishable from the Carter's brand red ink that is used to put new ink in rubber stamp pads."

The same was true of the green, yellow, and blue inks. All were the Carter's brand inks available in any stationery store. In addition, the paper contained optical brighteners that were not introduced into paper manufacturing until the 1940s.

D'Elia held up three sheets of rub-off letters that had been found in Hofmann's house.

"And now, when you had occasion to review the Spanish Fork Co-op notes that were printed, along with the transfer rub-off sheets, were you able to form any relationship or comparison through your analysis?"

"The Spanish Fork Co-op notes contained three different styles and sizes of printed letters, hand-printed letters. And I observed that the rub-off letters on these sheets were of the same size and style as found on the three different sizes and styles on the Spanish Fork notes."

"Were there any styles and sizes on the Spanish Fork Co-op notes that you did not have on the rub-off sheets so that you were able to conclude there was a relationship?"

"All of the sizes and styles I was able to find on these three rub-off sheets."

"And what was your conclusion with respect to the quantity?"

"The quantity of the letters that were removed from the rub-off sheets were consistent with what was found on the Spanish Fork notes."

Throckmorton had an additional observation on the Anthon Transcript, the only one of Hofmann's documents that did not show the characteristic cracking. (He had used an ink that didn't contain gum arabic and had aged the paper with heat rather than with chemicals.) The brown marks on the Transcript, said Throckmorton, could be easily explained. "Those characteristics are very similar to the characteristics I have observed when a document has been wet and subsequently dried and heated. In fact, it almost looks like an iron, a regular iron that you would use to iron your clothes, has gone over it."

On cross-examination, Brad Rich went straight for Throckmorton's weak spot: the possibility that his findings had been influenced by his faith.

"Are you familiar with a document known as the Book of Mormon?"

"Yes, sir."

"Do you have a particular belief about from whence that volume came?"

"I do."

"Can you tell us what that is?"

"I believe my beliefs would be what would be considered the conservative point of view for a member of the Mormon faith, and that is that the Book of Mormon was translated from the plates that were given to Joseph Smith.”

“And who gave those plates to Joseph Smith?”

“That would have been Moroni, the Angel Moroni, as he is called.”

“An angel. Do you believe that either a salamander or toad was involved in any way in that process?”

“I don’t believe so.”

In their summations, both Stott and Yengich focused on the issue that had stumped everybody from the beginning: motive.

Stott added up the hundreds of thousands of dollars that Hofmann owed at the time of the bombings. He recounted the pressure Hofmann was under to pay back that money, and the possible consequences if his forgery scheme was exposed. “He had to get rid of Steve Christensen,” Stott told Judge Grant. “He was the center of the pressure. Maybe it wouldn’t solve all the problems, but at best it would buy him some time. And we all know the only thing a con artist needs is time . . . maybe just one more day.” Kathy Sheets had been killed to divert attention away from the Salamander Letter and toward CFS.

Because the third bombing wasn’t being charged, Stott didn’t have to speculate on the intended target of the third bomb.

The next day, Yengich tore into Stott’s neat scenario. The prosecution hadn’t satisfactorily explained the motive for the Christensen murder, Yengich charged, and had glossed over the Sheets murder entirely. “What is the motive for Hofmann to perform all these vile acts?”

“Steve Christensen was helping Mark. They were friends. Hofmann didn’t owe money to Christensen. He—Christensen—was offering his hand in friendship, not offering a threat that all of the others had. The death of Steve Christensen does Mark Hofmann no good at all.”

Yengich scoffed at the suggestion that Christensen had been killed to buy time. And if the killing was designed to avoid an investigation of his document dealings, well, the result had been just the opposite. In relaying warnings from the Church, Yengich said, Christensen had been acting as a friend. If Hofmann had reason to kill anyone, if he would have benefited from murder, then the targets would have been either Hugh Pinnock or Gordon B. Hinckley, not Steve Christensen.

As for the Sheets murder: “There is no evidence that the death of Sheets advanced the scheme to defraud.” It was, he concluded, a case based on maybes. “And a case based on maybes is no case at all.”

For Judge Grant, the cracked-ink testimony cracked the case. From the outset, he had been worried that some might question his impartiality in assessing documents antagonistic to his faith. How could a Mormon judge rule on this case? Flynn's and Throckmorton's objectivity had saved him from the whispers. And he was the first to admit it. They were a "god-send," he would tell people later. "With their cracked-ink finding, they delivered a totally objective forensic test as to the validity of the documents. That meant we never had to deal with what they said or what they meant."

During the hearings, Grant also began to develop a theory about Mark Hofmann's real motivations. When people asked, "How could all this evil come from a clean-cut young Mormon kid, a kid like our kids?" Grant had the answer. Sitting on the bench, watching Mark, he had seen into his dark heart.

He would begin his explanation by telling a story. "This case makes me think of a story I heard from a man I respect a great deal, a very bright person with a law degree from Columbia. Just one of the top people I've known in my life in terms of brightness and congeniality. A people person, an idea person, and a things person.

"And he told me this story about the time when he was a missionary in London many years ago. He would go to Hyde Park, where the missionaries would preach, and he got to the point where he could contend with the hecklers and the ministers from other faiths. Then one day, while he was in the midst of it, he met a man, rather large of stature, with swarthy skin and eyes like fire.

"And he got into a contention with this man that nearly destroyed him. All the proven arguments just didn't hold water. This big man with the swarthy skin and eyes like fire was just so bright that he simply destroyed my friend.

"Accepting defeat, he returned to the mission home, and the mission president asked him what was the matter. The mission president happened to be an Apostle. My friend reviewed what had just happened, and the mission president said, 'I hope you learned a valuable lesson. The individual you were contending with was Lucifer himself. There is not a living soul on the earth who can match wits and contend with Lucifer. Just cannot be done. If you take him on individually, he will defeat you every time.'

"That story introduced me to the possibility that there was in fact a satanic involvement in this case.” That was how Hofmann was able to trick the top members of the Church hierarchy. They were dealing with no mere mortal.

Judge Paul Grant, father of twelve, had decided that Mark Hofmann was, in fact, Lucifer.

What else could he do but bind Lucifer over for trial.

David Biggs wasn't the only one who looked forward to a real courtroom cockfight beginning on March 2, 1987, when the first of Hofmann's five trials was scheduled to begin. Ron Yengich had been scratching the dust in anticipation ever since the preliminary hearing. So had Gerry D'Elia.

D'Elia especially seemed eager to mix it up. During the hearings, he and Yengich had already had one altercation over a media motion to release the probable-cause statements (which included the names of witnesses who could be cornered for interviews). In a small corridor outside Judge Grant's chambers, D'Elia tried to explain the prosecution's objections to the media attorney.

"Don't interrupt!" Yengich snapped.

D'Elia wasn't one to let a challenge go unanswered. "Why don't you stop talking, then, so someone else can say something."

From there, the exchange quickly degenerated into a name-calling shouting match.

"Asshole."

"Son of a bitch."

Oh, yeah?

Oh, yeah.

Someone said, "Okay. Let's have it out right here," and suddenly both men began to square off, ready, aching to put the matter to the ultimate test of manhood. No need to go outside, just decide it right there in the hall outside the judge's chambers.

At first, Biggs, Stott, and Brad Rich were too startled to stop them. Biggs, proud of his cool, couldn't believe the lapse of professionalism. Having been to school with Yengich, he knew his confrontational style. It was his job to hate prosecutors. But if he could work up this much venom over a motion to release probable-cause statements, what would he be like at a murder trial?

Bob Stott stepped back and looked at the two men, who were literally inches apart, in total bewilderment.

Finally, somebody said, "Okay, it's time to cool it," and the two roosters backed down.

Then Judge Grant, who had been towering over the skirmish from what seemed like a great distance, issued a stern warning. "Look. This is a high-profile case. I am sorry, but in any other case, if you fought in my courtroom, that would be okay with me—at least until it got to the point where I felt I had to cut it off. But in this one, it just won't fly. If you two don't behave, I am personally going to get into it with you. You won't just have to fight each other, you are going to have to fight me personally."

Coming from the huge-handed, six-foot-seven Grant, that was enough to keep both Yengich and D'Elia in line for the rest of the hearings. But Grant wouldn't always be there, and the stakes at trial would be far higher. All the signs pointed to a real street fight.

Then, in November, strange things began to happen.

The first began with the arrival of David Yocom. In the November 4 general election, Ted Cannon lost his bid for another term as county attorney to Yocom, a criminal lawyer—and friend of Ron Yengich's—who had worked in the county attorney's office from 1970 to 1979 and prosecuted such high-profile criminals as Ted Bundy. Normally, Cannon wouldn't have turned over his office until January, but other problems forced him to leave prematurely. When Cannon's interim replacement, Bill Hyde, proved insufficiently malleable, Yocom arranged to be sworn in as acting county attorney on November 19, two months before his term officially began.

Almost the minute he got his hands on the reins of power, Yocom pulled Gerry D'Elia off the Hofmann case. Yocom accused him of insubordination, but people who knew the history of their relationship suspected otherwise—that Yocom had long carried a grudge against D'Elia for refusing to deal on a case involving some of Yocom's pals. At the time, Yocom, acting as their defense attorney, had called D'Elia a liar, an asshole, and, worst of all, "a lousy prosecutor."

"Screw you, Yocom!" D'Elia shouted back. "Let's go to trial."

"If we go to trial," Yocom boasted, "I'll clean your clock."

But in court, it was D'Elia who cleaned Yocom's clock.

After the election, to no one's surprise, Yocom came gunning for D'Elia. One of his first official acts was to drop D'Elia from an arson case that he had been working on for six years and instruct the other prosecutors to arrange a plea bargain that was "satisfactory to everybody." Yocom knew the defense attorney and knew he wanted to settle. The case was weak and, even after a trip to the Supreme Court, dead in the water, Yocom insisted.

When D'Elia showed up in the courtroom to hear the sentencing of the case, Yocom hit the ceiling. He called D'Elia into his office and ranted. "You can't beat me, D'Elia. No one can beat me. The people voted for me." Later that week, drunk and belligerent, Yocom approached D'Elia in a bar. "Why don't you get a haircut?" he muttered under his breath—breath that, according to D'Elia, "you wouldn't want to light a match near." Jabbing his finger in D'Elia's chest, Yocom ranted about the case three years earlier, when D'Elia had "fucked him over."

The following Monday, D'Elia got a call from Bud Ellett, the chief criminal deputy. "That's it," he said. "Tomorrow Yocom is shifting you to the satellite office. You're being relieved of all of your duties on the Hofmann case."

D'Elia reacted with, for him, surprising cool. "He's dumber than dog shit. I always knew it."

The next day, he left for Carson City to be married and then to Lake Tahoe for a honeymoon. When he came back, he took a few weeks of sick leave and then quit. A television reporter asked him on camera, "Mr. Yocom says you're absolutely not necessary to the Hofmann case. How do you respond to that?"

"Well, either he's incredibly stupid or he's a liar. Take your pick."

The victims' families picked stupid. With D'Elia gone, the prosecution lost its killer instinct. Putting Bob Stott alone in a courtroom with Ron Yengich would be like putting a tuna alone in a pool with a barracuda. When Jim Bell and Ken Farnsworth heard the news, they suspected immediately that Stott had no intention of getting wet.

Just about the same time Yocom pulled D'Elia off the Hofmann case, Bob Stott started disappearing frequently from the county attorney's office. No one knew for sure where he went or whom he saw, but Biggs, for one, was sure something was up and that the something had to do with the Hofmann case. It crossed his mind that Stott might be meeting with officials from the Church, probably Church lawyers, possibly even Hinckley himself, briefing them—unofficially, of course—on trial preparations. But by the end of November, a year after the bombings and three months before the trials were scheduled to begin, the secret meetings, whatever they were, whomever they were with, were obviously heating up.

Soon, work on the Hofmann case ground to a halt. Stott diverted Biggs from trial preparations into a morass of paperwork on motions: a thankless, eight-to-eight job. As soon as he climbed out of that hole, Stott put him to work on a pointless synopsis, condensing thousands of pages of evidence into readable form. Biggs spun his wheels for weeks, producing a twenty-two-page document that Stott pronounced "too long. It sounds like a book," he said. "You've got to cut it down." So he spent more time cutting the twenty-two pages to seven.

Biggs knew it was all busy work, designed only to keep him occupied while Stott, the demon for control, continued to conduct his secret business.

97 To drivers who glanced into the windows of the stylish black Chevy Blazer as they passed, the two men inside must have looked like an odd couple. Behind the wheel, Ron Yengich, with his long hair and medicine-bow mustache, looked like one of those redneck ranch hands who descended on Salt Lake City from Price and other distant towns every weekend to terrorize the townsfolk. He was dressed better, of course, but he sat too low in the seat for passersby to see the cut of his suit.

In the passenger seat, Bob Stott squirmed uncomfortably. Next to the lean, hungry Yengich, Stott looked unusually well fed and burgher-like. He couldn't have been entirely at ease, perched on the white sheet that Yengich had thrown over the seat to protect Stott's suit from the sheddings of the seat's usual occupant, Yengich's big dog, Little.

In fact, both men had good reason to be nervous. Two months before the opening of what promised to be the most publicized trial in Utah history, after more than a year of investigative work by hundreds of state, federal, and local officials, after hours spent preparing, not just for one trial but five, they were meeting in the secrecy of Yengich's black Blazer to cut a deal that would bring the whole huge enterprise to a quick, quiet end.

After the preliminary hearing, Yengich knew that he was in deep trouble. For the first time, he had seen the prosecution's case in its totality, and it was a frightening sight. They had the eyewitnesses, they had the letter jacket, they had the Radio Shack receipts, the Mike Hansen alias, the bogus printing plates, the cracked ink. They hadn't cracked Nurse Loden, but Hofmann's clumsy lies in the hospital were almost as damaging.

The case was short on motive but that was a two-edged sword. If a jury was positively convinced that Hofmann did it, the lack of a strong motive would only make the act look more wanton and senseless. It's a lot harder to show mercy to a man who kills people for flimsy reasons—as a diversion, for example—than for a man who kills in the heat of passion, or even out of revenge. Yengich had often said that it was easier to understand killing a friend than killing a total stranger. And what if the prosecution convinced the jury that the third bomb was intended for someone else? Then Hofmann would look like a mad serial bomber with total disregard for human life. It was a formula for a death sentence.

In fact, the only weakness in the prosecution's overwhelming case was that it was too overwhelming. In his compulsiveness, Bob Stott had loaded so much information into a single case, much of it arcane and confusing, that a jury could easily get lost in it—especially with a little help from defense counsel. "I'll have a chance to try a myriad of other people other than my client," Yengich boasted.

It was one of his favorite tactics: working up sympathy for the criminal by working up contempt for the victim—or for the prosecution, or for the judge, or for the system. In this case, it was easy. The victims of Hofmann's frauds, men like Thomas Wilding, were, in his opinion, just greedy fat cats out for a fast buck. It was almost comic the way they climbed all over one another to get at Hofmann's documents, to make the big, easy score. Why the hell didn't one of them blow the whistle on his client before things deteriorated to murder? If Wilding had just called the police when he uncovered Mark's shenanigans, Kathy Sheets and Steve Christensen would still be alive. But no. He wanted his money first, justice second.

They were all the same way. They didn't call because they were all getting rich. They were either going to go to another kingdom of heaven, like Brent Ashworth, or they were going to get rich in this kingdom.

In Yengich's mind, however, no one was more culpable than the Mormon Church. "Documents are coming up every six months," he explained to a reporter, "located by the same guy. And what does this guy do? This guy is a student. He's planning to go to medical school. And all of a sudden, he's turning up major document finds every time we turn around. Well, doesn't somebody sit back and say, 'Okay, we want to compare this document and that document?' But they don't ever do it. You know why?

"Greed. Incredible greed on the part of a number of members of the hierarchy of the Church who wanted to get these documents and salt them away somewhere where the Brethren's faith wouldn't be shaken by them." If it hadn't been for that greed, Yengich believed, Mark's whole scheme would have come to a quick end, and Kathy Sheets and Steve Christensen would still be alive.

Between the avarice of Mark's clients, the CFS scandal, the Church's complicity, the confusing documents, and the huge cast of very public characters, including everybody from well-known TV pitchman Mac Christensen to Church bigwigs like Hinckley and Oaks, Yengich knew he could develop enough red herrings to confuse the already muddy waters and hope that the jury, unable to see its way clearly, might mistake its confusion for "reasonable doubt."

If he were the prosecutor, he would have handled it all very differently, he told himself. He would have focused on "the woman who's dead and the man who's dead, and eliminate all the rest of the garbage." But he was certain Bob Stott wasn't clever enough or brave enough for a bold stroke like that. In fact, Stott was so deeply involved in the Mormon side of the case that he was more likely to give up the homicides than the documents.

Except even Bob Stott wasn't myopic enough to do that.

Yengich also had troubles in his own camp. If Stott's case was too overwhelming for its own good, Yengich's client was too smart for his own good. In public, Yengich later praised Hofmann's savvy and clucked about how helpful it was to work with a client who understood the legal ramifications of his actions. But privately, Yengich had torn his hair more than once over Mark's stupidity—or arrogance (he was never sure which it was).

Early in the case, against Yengich's specific instructions, Hofmann had met with several reporters in the office of Jimmy Barber, Shannon Flynn's attorney.

The next morning, Yengich called Mike Carter, one of the reporters at the meeting. "Come over to my office," he barked.

When Carter arrived, he could hear Yengich yelling at Hofmann through the walls, calling him a "dumb shit." When Carter joined them, Yengich instructed Mark, "You've never met this guy, have you?"

Hofmann cowered in his wheelchair. "No," he said in a tiny voice.

"I want to introduce you to Mike Carter. Shake hands." After they shook hands, Yengich wheeled Hofmann out of the room as if looking for the nearest cliff.

He returned a few minutes later still in a tizzy of rage, swearing and knocking things off his desk. At first he tried to threaten Carter—"You know you might be in trouble"—then he promised him "great things to come" if he kept the previous day's visit with Mark "under his hat." Carter agreed, and Yengich kept his end of the bargain by giving him first look at the polygraph test results.

That wasn't the only time Yengich had been surprised by his client. Mark had an annoying habit of withholding important details, especially details that made him look stupid as well as evil. So Yengich had to wait for each new packet of discovery materials from the prosecution to find out what bombshells Hofmann had conveniently forgotten to share with him.

Like when he used the Mike Hansen alias at the same time he wrote a check in his own name. That one drove Yengich crazy. It was bad enough that he had been so stupid, or so brazen, as to try to pass himself off as Mike Hansen while writing checks on a Mark Hofmann account. It was bad enough that he tried it not once but twice. But then not to tell his lawyer about such a disastrous miscalculation, to let him learn about it from the police! That was just too much.

Hofmann tried to win his way back into Yengich's favor by telling him, "I've confided more in you than in anybody else in the world." But Yengich couldn't help wondering what other surprises were waiting out there, and how could he trust a man who had beaten a lie detector?

The case was also costing too damn much money. So far, by some accounts, the Hofmanns had been able to produce only about $25,000 even after Bill Hofmann mortgaged his house. Yengich could have billed twice that much just for the preliminary hearing. Who was going to pay for six months of trial preparation and two months of trial, taking up two-thirds of his staff? As long as a stunning upset was a possibility, the case was worth the red ink. Dramatic, highly publicized acquittals are the criminal lawyer's loss leaders. But with conviction almost a certainty, the dollars and cents no longer made sense. Was it worth his time just to save Hofmann from the death penalty—assuming he could do even that?

A plea bargain was the only way out. If Mark could plead to a second-degree murder and a manslaughter charge and the sentences ran concurrently, he could get out of prison eventually. At thirty-two, he could serve ten or fifteen years and still have twenty or thirty years as a free man. It wasn't great, but it was a lot better than a capital murder conviction. In Utah, very few capital murderers ever walked out of prison.

There was only one problem. Why on earth would the prosecution want to bargain this one? With an unmuffable case, mountains of evidence, hundreds of man-years of investigation, and with the eyes of the media and the world watching, what possible reason could Bob Stott have for trading it all away?

As the black Blazer sped through the early morning dusk in the suburbs of Salt Lake, Yengich made his pitch, outlining for Stott the “advantages” of a plea. He started off by reflecting on how often law enforcement officials had said to him, “Boy, I’d sure like Mark Hofmann to explain this to me.” Once a week, as regular as clockwork, Ken Farnsworth had called his office and requested an interview with Mark. Stott himself had asked on numerous occasions, “When can we talk with Mark? Are we going to be able to talk to Mark?”

It was more than just personal curiosity—although there was plenty of that too. There were all sorts of “pressures”—Yengich let the word sink in—to find out what Hofmann knew. Pressures from the public, pressures from the press (who weren’t about to let the police off the hook until their questions had been answered), and, of course, pressures from the Church.

No one wanted to know what Hofmann knew more than the Church. Were the documents authentic? Which documents were authentic? Hofmann had sold or given or traded hundreds of documents to the Church. Only a handful were covered in the indictment. A trial would determine the authenticity only of those entered into evidence at the trial. The rest would be cast into permanent shadow—unless, of course, Hofmann were to talk and tell everything he knew.

The same was true of all the nasty rumors connecting Hofmann to the Church. A trial would resolve only a few of them, leaving the most destructive ones—like the rumor that the Church was railroading Hofmann to cover up its complicity—intact. How much better it would be for the Church if Hofmann told everything he knew. “If we go to trial, and he’s convicted,” Yengich later said, “the vast majority of the public out there may believe he’s guilty, but there’s going to be a lot of people who still say he’s not guilty. They’re going to have this conspiracy theory. It may only exist in the minds of a few people, but if it exists at all, it’s really going to make life difficult for the people at 47 East South Temple.”

The public wanted answers, the press wanted answers, the cops wanted answers, Stott wanted answers, and, more than anybody, the Church wanted answers. And the only person who had the answers was Mark Hofmann.

Stott made an offer. “He can plead to one first-degree murder charge or two second degrees.”

"I want to go lower on the murder charges," Yengich countered.

"That's impossible," said Stott.

"How would you like to interview him on the charges?"

Stott looked as if he could barely contain his excitement.

Yengich dangled it some more. "You can interview him and get a complete confession as to the cases charged."

Stott's eyes widened.

"But for that, I want to have a manslaughter."

That's what Yengich had to bargain with: answers. And he made it clear: no plea, no answers. "If we go to trial, pal," he said, "you're never going to know. Because I can assure you—look me in the eye—that my client's never going to tell you."

It was a persuasive argument that played to Stott's obsession with the documents as well as his courtroom insecurity. But just in case it wasn't enough, Yengich decided to show his trump card.

At the preliminary hearing, he had agreed not to call Gordon Hinckley to the stand but instead stipulated to certain statements about how Hinckley had acquired the Josiah Stowell letter.

Now, Yengich made clear, all previous bets were off. If this case went to trial, not only could he call Hinckley and Pinnock and Oaks to the stand, he could use his subpoena power to "rummage to his heart's content" through the deepest, darkest recesses of The Vault.

The very suggestion was almost enough to give the jittery Stott a nervous breakdown. He and D'Elia had already argued about the chances of impaneling an impartial jury in a case that involved high officials of the Mormon Church. Stott thought it wouldn't be that difficult. D'Elia thought he was either crazy or willfully blind. Every potential juror would be asked, "Are you a Mormon?" and then, "Would you believe President Hinckley more than the other witnesses in this case simply because he is who he is?" And if the juror was wearing his garments, and he said no, then he was a liar, and D'Elia didn't want him on his jury.

On the other hand, non-Mormon jurors with axes to grind against the Church might convict Hofmann only if the prosecution managed to serve up a piece of the Church as well. The resentment out there ran deep. On a recent skiing weekend in Alta, D'Elia had sat on the deck downing beers with some friends who wanted to talk about the Hofmann case. They particularly wanted to know all about President Hinckley's complicity, which they took for granted. The more they drank, the rowdier they became and the more they demanded Hinckley's head. Banging their tankards on the table, they chanted in unison, "Hinckley did it. Hinckley did it. Hinckley's a fucking jerk. Hinckley did it. Hinckley did it."

And they believed it.

Now Yengich was threatening to put Hinckley and other Church leaders on the stand and grill them like unindicted co-conspirators. The Mormon bashers would have a field day. The foundation for their testimony alone would be devastating to the Church.

"What is your name?"

"Gordon C. Hinckley."

"What do you do for a living?"

"I run the LDS Church."

"How often did you see Mark Hofmann?"

"Why did you meet him so often?"

"Did you ever personally give him any money?"

"Under what circumstances?"

"Isn't it true that most people have to make an appointment to see you?"

"Isn't it true that most members of your Church never see you at all? Or if they do, they have to first see their bishop, then their stake president?"

"Did Mark Hofmann always call for an appointment?"

"Isn't it true that he just walked right into your office?"

"Doesn't that indicate that you attached a great deal of importance to what Mark Hofmann was doing for you?"

"Doesn't that indicate that your public statements to the effect that you barely knew Mark Hofmann were in fact misleading?"

"If you were lying when you said that, why should this jury believe you now?"

And the farmer in Genola, Utah, who pitched hay all week and went to his ward house every Sunday would read about it in his paper or see it on the evening news and say, "Golly. When I got into trouble with my farm down here and I needed to talk to somebody from the Church who has some authority, I couldn't even get past my bishop." And a lot of basic, decent people who were members of the Church would start asking themselves the same questions.

And nobody wanted that.

On Sunday, December 28, Judge Kenneth Rigtrup lingered late at church. He had a lot on his mind. A genial, portly man who managed to maintain his Santa Claus disposition despite being confined to a wheelchair and suffering through endless bouts of ill health, Rigtrup thought again that maybe he just wasn't cut out to be a judge. Maybe that was why, during his four years on the bench, he had never gotten a capital case. All cases, of course, were supposed to be assigned randomly, but it was an open secret that lawyers could "jiggle the system" by slipping a little money to someone in the clerk's office to get the right judge for a case. And in four years, no one, apparently, had considered Rigtrup the right judge for a capital murder case. Perhaps the defense attorneys were fooled by his stern courtroom manner, and prosecutors who knew him saw the buoyant humanity beneath the somber black robes.

But all that changed when, after a lot of bad press, the clerk's office instituted a new calendar system by which docket numbers were randomly assigned to cases, and the numbers were then blindly divided among the judges.

Only then did Judge Kenneth Rigtrup get a capital murder case: The State of Utah v. Mark Hofmann.

Like almost everyone else, Rigtrup had been personally touched by the crimes, if only lightly. He always bought clothes at Mr. Mac's, and his next-door neighbor's son had lived in Hofmann's ward and knew him.

Since the case was assigned to him, Rigtrup had seen Hofmann only once, at the arraignment the previous February. Ron Yengich had ambushed Rigtrup in the courthouse on the Friday before the Monday when the arraignment was scheduled to take place. He said something about having to be in Wyoming for a case on Monday, but Rigtrup suspected it was all just a ploy to dodge the press. "It's set for Monday, and we ought to do it Monday," he said. But when Yengich pressed, he relented and, against his better judgment, arraigned Hofmann not just on the murder charges but on everything. Hofmann stood in the empty courtroom with only his father at his side and said "Not guilty" in his high, disembodied voice as Rigtrup read each of the charges. By the time the press arrived—on his way into the courtroom, Rigtrup had told the clerk to alert them—the show was over.

The next time Rigtrup was scheduled to see Hofmann was Monday, December 29, the first of three days he had scheduled for hearings on motions.

When Rigtrup returned from church about 12:30 that frigid December Sunday, his wife told him that Jack Ford of KSL-TV had been calling every fifteen minutes trying desperately to get ahold of him. Minutes later, he called again.

“Are you going forward with motions tomorrow?” Ford asked.

“Yes.”

“Well, hasn’t there been a change?”

“Not that I’m aware.” Rigtrup knew what he was driving at.

It wasn’t the first time Ford had suggested that a plea bargain was in the works, but Rigtrup wasn’t about to explore the subject with him. Utah state statutes forbade judges from participating in plea discussions prior to an agreement being reached between prosecutors and defense counsel. So he would just as soon not know what was going on.

In fact, Rigtrup had suspected that something was in the works for a long time. For the past month, neither Yengich nor Stott had been approaching this case as if he really intended to go to trial. Yengich had waited until ridiculously late to file his motions, and then seemed totally unconcerned about the hearing dates. Stott wasn’t beating down his door either. Rigtrup had been forced to call Stott’s office to tell him to tell Yengich to come to his office so he could set the date for the motions. It was not the behavior of attorneys who planned to go to court.

Jack Ford’s phone call only confirmed the obvious.

“No one has conferred with me,” Rigtrup told him officially. “We have the matter set for hearing in the morning. So, as far as I know, we have a motion set for hearing.”

The next morning, before the hearing began, Yengich and Stott came into Rigtrup’s chambers together. “We want to talk to you before you take the bench,” one of them said as the other closed the door. Just by the tone of voice, Rigtrup knew what it was about.

“If I change the plea,” Yengich began, “would you let Mark out on bail between the plea and sentencing?”

Rigtrup didn’t like the idea, but he didn’t want to commit one way or the other without hearing more.

Yengich said he would enter a guilty plea on the Sheets case, but he wanted it to be sentenced one degree lower than the charge. So a guilty plea to second-degree murder would be sentenced as if it were manslaughter.

Rigtrup liked that even less.

Stott had agreed, Yengich insisted, subtly reminding Rigtrup that a judge's only duty was to ensure that a plea bargain was "carried out in good faith and that there was some rational basis for it, not to substitute his own views." Yengich just wanted to make sure that Rigtrup would honor the agreement he and Stott had reached on sentencing.

But that wasn't all.

Yengich also wanted a commitment that the sentences would be concurrent rather than consecutive.

Rigtrup liked that least of all. In fact, he was offended. Yengich was sandbagging him. He couldn't imagine how Stott had agreed to these outrageous terms.

"I don't really care for this kind of negotiation," he finally said, restraining his indignation.

But Yengich was undaunted. Unless Rigtrup agreed to both terms, he said, the deal was off. Hofmann wouldn't plead.

At that point, to Rigtrup's utter astonishment, Bob Stott jumped in and argued fervently for the deal. He had talked to the victims' families, and they were foursquare in favor of a plea. Besides, a jury would never hand down a death sentence in this case, so the plea bargain gave them as much as they could get in a trial—almost—with considerably less time and expense.

But under this agreement wouldn't Hofmann get only five to life, making him eligible for parole in about ten years, rather than a near certain life sentence?

Yes, Stott admitted, but the Board of Pardons probably wouldn't let him out anyway, so the results would be the same. Besides—and on this point he grew especially impassioned—this way we are going to find out all of the information we need to know. And that, he said again and again, was absolutely crucial.

Rigtrup detested the deal, but as long as Stott agreed to it, his hands were tied.

Contrary to what Judge Rigrup thought, Bob Stott did have reservations about the plea bargain, but they had little to do with whether or not it was fair or whether or not Ron Yengich was, as one cop put it, “getting away with everything but Bob Stott’s wallet.”

Stott’s concern was to make sure Mark Hofmann told everything he knew—or at least everything that Bob Stott wanted to know. “How do we know Mark is going to be open with us?” he demanded of Yengich. “We can make this agreement, then Mark could clam up. We go ahead and he pleads, and then he says, ‘Ha, ha, fooled you. I got my plea, and I’m not going to talk to you.’”

Yengich’s solution was to offer a “sampler.” He would let Stott talk to Hofmann, off the record, before officially submitting the plea agreement. That way Stott could test the merchandise, so to speak, and see just how forthcoming Hofmann would be.

And what was to prevent Hofmann from pretending to be an open book in the brief interview before the plea and then clamming up afterward? Nothing. But Bob Stott didn’t seem to care. He was so eager to get a plea, so eager to talk to Hofmann that nothing else seemed to matter.

The interview, which took place at Yengich’s house, turned out to be not just off the record, but top secret. Stott didn’t tell Jim Bell or Ken Farnsworth, or his own investigators, Mike George and Dick Forbes, the four people who knew the most about the Hofmann case—and were best able to detect if Hofmann’s answers were evasive or contrary to the evidence. This was Bob Stott’s show, and he wasn’t going to share the spotlight with anybody. At the last minute, he relented and brought along David Biggs, who, unlike Stott, knew something about the homicides.

On January 7, Hofmann and Yengich were waiting for them in the living room of Yengich’s small, red brick, white-trimmed Victorian house in a suburb of Salt Lake City. The four men took seats surrounded by books on famous defense lawyers and baseball players, companion volumes to PBS series, and general bachelor clutter. They knew this was serious business when Yengich locked Little out of the room, although his odor lingered.

They began by asking Hofmann about his experience with bombs. He described the wood-alcohol concoction that had left the scar on his neck.

And there was another one. "My friend Brian and I made a black powder incendiary device, which we put in a Sterno can. We put a fuse of black powder in the can, and Brian took it to explode at the schoolyard, which was near his house on Connor Street. Brian took the cap off to ignite it but it didn't explode."

How did you know how to make an incendiary device?

"I knew quite early how to make black gunpowder. I started making it in elementary school. I got the formula and the percentage makeup of black gunpowder out of the World Book Encyclopedia. Another friend, Mike, and I made black powder out of sulfur, saltpeter, and charcoal."

And there was another incident with another friend. "We made some black powder and went over to a park and detonated it." And another one. "I made a sort of cannon out of a pipe along with a kind of extension-cord ignition system. I shot rocks out of the pipe and knocked leaves off the trees. I also blew up a bottle with dry ice. I liked firecrackers and cherry bombs. I thought they were fun."

What about the bombs that you made in October 1985? How did you put those together? Where did you get the supplies?

"The idea for the nails packed around the Christensen bomb came out of a book I bought at a gun show that Shannon and I went to. The purpose was to make the bomb more lethal—to make sure it resulted in death."

Why did you kill Christensen? Why Sheets? These were the questions everybody was asking. Perhaps for that very reason, Hofmann backed away from answering.

"I knew I was going to make two bombs to kill two people. At first, I just didn't know for sure who the victims were going to be. I thought of several scenarios for the bombings. First, I thought that one of the bombs would kill either Tom Wilding or Brent Ashworth, and the second bomb would kill me."

It was an absurd idea. Why would he kill anybody else if he was planning to kill himself? But Hofmann went right on, undaunted.

"Then I thought maybe the bombs should be for Christensen and Wilding, and finally I thought about killing Wilding and Ashworth with the two bombs. It wasn't until the morning of the 15th of October, when I made the bombs, that I settled on the actual targets."

Could that be true? Could Hofmann have been playing that kind of game with people's lives? Or was this a game, throwing out several scenarios and watching in secret delight as Stott struggled to believe first one, then the next, then still another?

He admitted that the Mike Hansen alias was a game. "It was my way to play detective. I used it as early as 1978. I used it in 1979 at the University of Utah special-collections library. I also used it at the LDS Church archives, the Utah State University archives special collections, and the New York Public Library. I once bought a tire from David Early Tire using the name Mike Hansen."

Why would you use an alias for something like that?

"Oh, I don't know. I must have felt like being secretive that day."

Hofmann recounted the events that led up to the October 15 bombings.

He bought the equipment for the bombs on October 5, taking care to cover his tracks. "I bought the end-pipe caps, the nails, and the gunpowder all at the Allied store at 6200 South State. I knew I shouldn't buy them all at the same time, so I first bought two cans of Hercules Bull's-eye gunpowder. I carried them to my MR2, then went back to the store and bought the end pipes and the nails. I used different cashiers at Allied's—one for the gunpowder and another for the end pipes and cement nails.

"When I had the bomb components, I went home and put them on a blanket in my downstairs den. That's the same room I did my forgery work in. But one night, just before I made the bombs, Shannon came back to inspect the house because he wanted to buy it when we bought our new house in the Cottonwoods. I threw the blanket over the parts and Shannon walked into the room, walked around it, and walked out without noticing a thing."

Hofmann thought that was very funny.

Did he test the bomb components?

"I went to an area off of I-80 near Grantsville. I connected the wire of the rocket igniter to a fifty-foot extension cord, walked back to a small gully, and connected the extension cord to a battery pack. The bomb went off, so I knew if I made a bomb twice that size I could kill someone with it. When I was testing the bomb in the desert, I felt it was still going to be for Tom Wilding. I wanted to kill him."

So he did have victims in mind.

They asked him to describe how he set the bombs.

"The evening of October 14, I went with Shannon to [a friend's] house to talk about polygamy. Afterwards, I dropped Shannon off at his house at Quailbrook Condominiums. When I got home, Dorie was still up. It was about 11:30. We talked for a little while, and then she went to bed. I went downstairs and made the bombs. I drilled the holes into the pipes in the garage and made sure I picked up all of the filings. It didn't take long, probably two hours or less, to construct the two bombs. I mean, they were very simple devices . . . not nearly as complicated as the ones in the Anarchist's Cookbook."

They asked him why the bombs weren't equipped with safeties. This had puzzled investigators all along. To carry a bomb without a safety was such a daredevil thing to do, and bombers, as a rule, were not the daredevil kind.

For the first time, Hofmann couldn't suppress a smile. The bombs did have safeties. "I wouldn't have carried the bombs without it," he said, confirming that he indeed wasn't a daredevil. He made small holes in the box with an ice pick, then threaded the wires from the bomb through the holes and taped them separately to the outside of the box. "When I delivered the bombs, I took the tape off the wires and connected them. At the preliminary hearing, I looked at some of the remnants of the boxes that were introduced into evidence and I found one of the small holes."

His disdain was palpable. If he could find the holes, why couldn't the police?

"I finished putting the bomb packages together by writing the names Steve Christensen and Gary Sheets on them. I didn't know Sheets's address so I looked it up in the phone directory. In fact, I underlined Sheets's address in the directory with the same Magic Marker that I used to write the names on the boxes. That directory was still there when you did the search."

More disdain. For all the searches of Hofmann's house, for all the grief Yengich and the press had given them for taking everything that wasn't tied down, including Dorie's recipe box, they had missed the telephone book.

"When I was released from jail on bail, I destroyed the directory."

"The bombs were finished by 2:00 A.M. the morning of the 15th. I constructed the bombs at night because that's when I did my best work, my forgeries."

The choice of victims came up again, and Hofmann grew evasive again. "It was while I was making the bombs that I finally decided who they would be for. I wasn't rational at the time." Biggs for one sensed that Hofmann was already laying the groundwork for his appeal to the Board of Pardons: "I didn't know what I was doing. I wasn't rational. I was just lashing out.” The idea was to transform a calculated, cold-blooded killing into something approaching temporary insanity. Obviously, Yengich and Hofmann had decided that the only way to pull off that sleight of hand was to argue that building the bombs may have been calculated and cold-blooded, but using them was an irrational, last-minute, impulsive act.

“I decided that Steve Christensen would have to be killed to stop the McLellin transaction. Steve was an honorable man, but closemouthed. From some cryptic things he said, I knew that CFS and Gary Sheets were in trouble. CFS was going under, and Sheets might be liable for some legal troubles.”

Why did he resort to bombs, with their inherent risk of harming innocent bystanders—like Kathy Sheets?

“The thing that attracted me to bombs as a means of killing was that I wouldn’t have to be there at the time of the killings. I don’t think I could pull the trigger on someone if I faced them, but I could do it if I didn’t have to be around. I only filled the Sheets pipe bomb half full of powder, and I didn’t think the rocket igniter would work because it was three-fourths chipped away.” Earlier, he had said that he knew he was going to make two bombs to kill two people. The story shifted a little every time he told it.

“It didn’t matter to me if the Sheets bomb went off or not because the purpose was to establish a diversion, so that everyone would believe that the bombings were the result of the CFS business problem.”

On that count, at least, the police had been right all along.

“For that purpose, the death of someone was unnecessary. Of course, I knew a bomb left at a residence could kill or severely injure someone, but it really didn’t matter to me.”

Everyone knew he meant to say that it didn’t matter to him if the second bomb killed somebody or not, but the words, said in that tinny, deadpan voice, still sent a chill through the room: “It really didn’t matter to me.”

“When I finished making the bombs and the packages, I cleared up the area and put everything that might incriminate me into two bags—a full can of Bull’s-eye powder, battery packs, the old blanket I used as my work area, the Marks-a-Lot pen I used to address the packages, the drill bits I used to make the holes in the pipe, my soldering iron, solder, the rags I used to wipe off the grease from the threaded ends of the pipes, tape, and unused rocket igniters.”

Biggs asked himself: Are these the actions of a man who intends to kill himself?

“Later that morning, I dropped the two bags into Dumpsters. One was put in a Dumpster at an apartment complex near 2100 East and 3300 South. The other, I dumped into a Dumpster at the apartments where Shannon lived, the Quailbrook apartments.” Mark Hofmann, true friend.

“Sometime after 2:45 A.M., I put the two bombs and two bags into my van and left for the Sheets residence.”

“Aaron Teplick was a good witness at the preliminary hearing.” Finally, an acknowledgment of competence elsewhere in the world. “But he was wrong about the time I drove by the Sheets home. It was more like 3 A.M. than midnight. After driving by the Sheets home, I went back up, parked, walked to the garage, and placed the bomb package upright in front of the garage door closest to the front door. Then I connected the two wires, which were taped to the box. The bomb was ready to go off if the package was tipped. I had tested the mercury switch with the light tester and knew that if the box was tipped at a ninety-degree angle or knocked over, it would explode. I placed the bomb about five feet from the garage door, thinking that a car leaving the area would hit it. I can’t understand why a car didn’t hit the package and detonate it before Kathy Sheets found it.”

In other words, it was all a terrible mistake.

“I got back home about 3:30 in the morning. While I was downstairs, my daughter woke up. Dorie, who was upstairs, asked me to take care of our little girl, which I did until she went back to sleep a while later.

“Sometime between 6:00 and 6:30 that morning, I went to the Judge Building to deliver the second bomb. I parked my van in front of the building on the south side of Third South. I first went into the building and up to the sixth floor without the bomb package to see the lay of the land. Then I went back to the van and sat in it for a moment, then went back to the building with the bomb. I got into the elevator with [Bruce] Passey and [his] father.

“I pressed the sixth-floor button and left the elevator on that floor. I walked directly to Steve Christensen’s office and placed the bomb package inside the doorjamb. I fastened the wires together and returned to the street level using the elevator.

“To eliminate fingerprints, I wore gloves while I was delivering both bombs. In front of the Judge Building, I took off the gloves and threw them into a trash can. I did it to test fate.”

The disdain again.

What were you wearing when you delivered the bombs?

"I wore tan pants, a striped shirt, black shoes, my green high school jacket with tan sleeves, glasses and gloves."

What about the mustache?

"I hadn't shaved, but I didn't have a mustache. I wore my jacket and used the name Mike Hansen to leave little clues."

More disdain. A smile quivered at the corners of his mouth. "I was kind of hoping to get caught . . . and I thought if you could catch me, you should."

But that was just the prelude to Hofmann's tale of regret and remorse. At 8:30 that morning, only an hour and a half after returning home from the Judge Building, Hofmann said he called the Sheets home, but no one answered. "If someone answered, I would have disguised my voice and told them there was a bomb in their driveway and not to touch it."

This, too, Biggs thought, was fodder for the parole hearing.

"I was already regretting the Christensen bomb and was considering calling Christensen. I called his office. The answering machine picked up so I hung up without leaving a message."

Biggs thought, Right. And just how did you think Christensen was going to answer the phone without picking up the package that was sitting in front of his office door? If he felt so damn contrite, why didn't he call the police?

Later, they asked him how he had passed the polygraph test.

"I'm very good at masking my emotions," he said, without a hint of irony.

And how did Dorie pass the test when she said he was home all that night?

"I guess because both times she woke, at three and seven, I was home. Also, my youngest son told Dorie that 'Dad was downstairs all the time.' She had no idea that I had left the house that night."

Finally, they asked the other question that had been on everybody's mind for more than a year: Who was the third bomb for?

Hofmann drew his lips taut and looked straight ahead. "That was a suicide attempt. I was distraught over the killings the day before. I thought I deserved death, and it would be the best thing for my family. I also placed a number of inconsequential papers in the car so that people would think that the McLellan Collection, which didn't exist, was blown up in the explosion and fire."

Earlier he had said that he planned suicide from the beginning. Now it was out of guilt for the two bombings.

Hofmann told them how he bought the bomb parts in Logan and assembled them in Logan Canyon. "I wanted a quick and clean death, so I made the pipe sixteen inches long. It was substantially larger than the ones that killed Kathryn Sheets"—he couldn't even remember her name—"and Steve Christensen. Then I drove down to Salt Lake, parked in my normal spot across from the Deseret Gym, and walked in to get a drink of water to bolster my courage. I went back to the car. The bomb was in a paper sack on the passenger seat. I put it on the driver's seat, touched the two wires together, and the bomb exploded."

If he wanted to spare his family the stigma of his crimes, why did he leave pipe parts and surgical gloves in the trunk that would identify him as the bomber?

If he only wanted to blow himself up, why did he bother to cover his tracks by driving to Logan to buy the bomb parts?

And given his level of expertise, why did he place the bomb in the car rather than in the trunk with the papers, or the papers in the car with the bomb? Certainly he knew that from that distance, the blast wouldn't destroy the papers.

And why would he arrange to have the bomb blow up on a city street where no bomber could plausibly find him?

And if he twisted the wires together to set the bomb off, why was only one hand mangled? You can't twist wires together with one hand.

And why was he leaning into the car with one foot still outside the door when the bomb went off? People don't duck into their cars to commit suicide. What would Jerry Taylor say?

And what about the childhood of cherry bombs and black powder? Only serial bombers think first about making bombs and then about who the targets will be.

The explanations raised more questions than they answered, but Bob Stott didn't ask them. At the final session on January 22, he moved on to the only subject that really seemed to interest him, the documents.

Hofmann admitted the Salamander Letter was a forgery. He spoke proudly of it. "To write it, I researched the matter thoroughly. . . . I had also read books on magic at the University of Utah library and had discussions about it with Brent Metcalfe.

"I composed the letter in about two hours when I was visiting the Church historical library. I called Lyn Jacobs in Boston and read the draft to him."

He had stolen the authentic 1830s paper from a book at the University of Utah special-collections library. "The handwriting style of the letter was copied basically from the available Martin Harris signatures, the samples of letters and styles from that era, and the common style and standards that were employed at that time. I attempted to keep the handwriting of the letter consistent with the handwriting of the known Martin Harris signature. I researched the mail schedules from and to Palmyra and the surrounding areas and knew what post office date and mark to affix. I knew that, prior to 1829, the Palmyra postmark was black and afterwards it was red. The beginning of the letter, 'I received your letter today and hasten to respond,' was from words I had seen in actual letters from that era and place. So I was sure the time sequence was proper.

"Basically, I created what I believed the actual history to be. I believed Joseph Smith was involved in magic. The early writings of Joseph Smith didn't characterize his experience as a First Vision but as a dream. I was aware that salamanders and toads are commonly associated with magic literature. My Salamander Letter was a magic forgery."

Hofmann went on to brag about his other creations. "The postmark on the Lucy Mack Smith letter was from a plate I created myself from a photograph of an original postmark. I did most of the printing myself from plates I made. I did my own photography, chemical work, etching, and printing. People would be surprised at how much I did to ensure that the 'Oath of a Freeman' would pass the forensic tests, but I got lazy and had the 'Oath' plate made professionally. Obviously, I should have made the 'Oath' plate myself."

He was the only one in the room who laughed.

"At one time, I told Dorie that the Anthon Transcript was a fake, but because it so greatly affected her, I later told her that I was only joking and that it was genuine. Although she probably felt or suspected that many of my items were forgeries, she still thought the 'Oath of a Freeman' and the Salamander Letter were authentic."

Through the harangues of creditors, the endless police searches, and the public shame, Dorie had stuck with him, and no doubts about her innocence had ever been raised. Now he was implicating her in a scheme of criminal fraud with breathtaking nonchalance.

They never asked about the bombings again. And despite the evasions and outright lies, Stott maintained that Hofmann had been cooperative and agreed to proceed with the plea.

It was clear to everyone by now that Bob Stott was determined to avoid a trial no matter what. Said one policeman when news of the bargain began to spread through the department like the smell of a gas leak, “Even if we’d had a confession, Stott would have given Yengich anything he wanted.”

Later, when a Los Angeles Times reporter flew to Salt Lake City to cover the breaking plea-bargain story, he told Dawn Tracy that the most surprising aspect of the entire case was the attitude of the prosecution. “The typical prosecutor,” the reporter said, “goes out and gets bad guys. He goes out and stirs things up. Here, they’re so nice and cooperative. What a nice plea bargain. In any other state, you’d see this thing go on trial, because that’s how prosecutors’ reputations are made. Going to trial and getting bad guys, big splashes, lot of exposure. Here you have a nice plea bargain.”

“Hey,” said Tracy, “you don’t rise in this state embarrassing the Mormon Church or making them look bad.”

come.

There was one last obstacle to the deal, an obstacle that even Bob Stott’s inexplicable enthusiasm couldn’t over-

That obstacle was Bill Hofmann.

At the hospital, only a day after the third bomb exploded and the police announced that Mark was their primary suspect, Bill Hofmann had gone to his son’s bedside and said, very gravely, “If you did it, you should turn yourself in and ask for the death penalty, because that’s the only way your soul can be saved.” Bill Hofmann believed in Blood Atonement.

But Mark had assured him: “I didn’t do it.”

Since then, Bill Hofmann had gone on television to proclaim his son’s innocence. He had mortgaged his house to pay for his defense. And finally, he had announced that God Himself had reassured him that his son was blameless. No one who knew Bill Hofmann was surprised. When he was right, he was a rock.

Lu Hofmann, on the other hand, apparently had doubts, even in the beginning. After Ron Yengich’s first long interview with Mark, she had asked him in her tiny, knowing voice, “Do you still feel good about the case?” Only days after the bombings, she called a relative and shared her dilemma. Her husband was absolutely convinced of Mark’s innocence, she said, but she didn't know if her son was innocent or guilty, and the uncertainty was tearing her apart. She had been so proud of his accomplishments.

For Lu Hofmann, the uncertainty must have ended at the preliminary hearing. After that, according to friends, she barricaded herself in her house, quit her job on Temple Square, stopped going to church, and hid when the phone rang. Already small as a child, she began to lose weight at a dangerous rate. Relatives described her as "a fraction away from a nervous breakdown."

But Bill Hofmann continued to believe. Like Dorie, he protected his certainty by refusing to read newspaper accounts of the case or watch reports on television.

A year after the bombings, Mac Christensen came to see Bill Hofmann. He had been carrying around the anger and bitterness too long, Christensen decided. His children and grandchildren would grow up with hate unless he put a stop to it. So he made up his mind to forgive Mark Hofmann for killing his son. It wasn't just the religious thing to do, it was the healthy thing to do.

But Bill Hofmann didn't want to hear anything about forgiveness. "Before you say anything," he told Christensen, "I want you to know my son didn't kill your son. And I know that because I gave him a father's blessing. And I had a spiritual manifestation."

That left Mac Christensen with nothing to say, except, "Bill, if you ever change your mind, I would like you to come talk to me." Then he walked away.

Another time, Joan Gorton, Kathy Sheets's sister, found herself face to face with Bill Hofmann on an elevator. She wanted to say, "If you're a good Latter-day Saint, tell your son to confess, tell your son to admit his guilt. Then maybe he can be forgiven. Until he admits it, no one can forgive him. We can't begin to forgive him as long as he says 'I'm not guilty.'" But her tongue got caught in her throat, and all she could manage was, "I'm Kathy Sheets's sister, and I want you and your wife to know that we sympathize with you."

Bill Hofmann looked at her and said blankly, "We have sympathy for you too."

Brent Metcalfe was visiting Mark one day when Hofmann Senior walked into the living room and found several books on evolution that Mark had bought for his kids. He looked at them and said in a grave voice, "These kinds of books should not be lying around the house. This isn't the view presented at the Temple." Mark Hofmann was thirty-two years old, and he still hadn't found the courage to tell his father about his views on evolution.

How could he ever tell him he was guilty of murder?

By January 1987, Ron Yengich was desperate. The deal was set, Bob Stott had agreed to everything, Judge Rigtrup had given the agreement his reluctant approval, but Mark Hofmann refused to sign it. He had submitted to Stott's questioning and confessed almost everything—including the most outrageous crimes, the two bombings—but he still refused to sign the deal or to confront his father with the truth face to face.

The first time someone mentioned the possibility of a guilty plea in Bill Hofmann's presence, his response was immediate and unequivocal: In that case, Mark should ask for the death penalty. Only by submitting to a death sentence could he atone for his sins and assure himself of even the possibility of entering the Celestial Kingdom.

Ever helpful, Bob Stott volunteered to convince Hofmann Senior that Blood Atonement was no longer official Church policy. He even brought along a copy of an article on the subject by Bruce R. McConkie.

But Bill Hofmann was a rock.

Ken Woolley, Mark's cousin, was the next to try to solve the impasse. He went to Bill Hofmann's home and pleaded with him to consider the possibility that Mark might be guilty, and not to spend all of his savings supporting Mark's defense effort. If he went into bankruptcy over this, it was all going to be a loss.

To prove his point, Woolley brought along some of the evidence of Mark's forgery and double dealing (provided by Ken Farnsworth). He also mentioned, gingerly, that a plea bargain was in the works. Bill Hofmann shoved the evidence aside. "Ken, they are lying to you. There is absolutely no plea bargaining. Believe me, he's innocent. I don't care what you say." He pointed at the evidence. "I don't understand these things. I'll have to talk to Mark, and you'll have to talk to Ron Yengich. You ought to talk to Ron Yengich, because I'm sure there is an explanation for this."

Woolley later said, "Bill Hofmann is a salesman, and salesmen want to believe everything." Bill Hofmann wanted mightily to believe his son was innocent. Yengich told Mark repeatedly: You have to tell your family. You can't keep leading them on this way. But no matter how Yengich pleaded, Mark still couldn't face them with the truth.

Finally, disgusted and desperate, Yengich decided to force Hofmann's hand. He invited Bob Stott and Mark to his house in an effort to re-create the confessional atmosphere of the interviews. Then in the middle of the meeting, by prearrangement, Bill Hofmann arrived at the door. As Yengich got up to greet him, Mark went white. "Get that guy out of here!" he said to Stott in a frantic, choked voice. "I don't want to talk to that guy. Get that guy away."

A few minutes later, Lu Hofmann arrived with her daughter and Dorie. Yengich had also arranged for them to be present at Mark's confession—but the confession never came. Mark sat glumly, saying nothing.

With the date for entering the plea only a few days away, Yengich was out of tricks.

In fact, it wasn't until the evening of the last day before the plea was scheduled to come down that Bill Hofmann finally heard that his son was planning to plead guilty. But the news didn't come from Mark. It came from John Harrington on the Channel 4 news at 5:30. Mark Hofmann, he announced, was going to change his plea from innocent to guilty.

Ron Yengich went through the usual show of fist pounding and finger pointing. He called up Biggs and Stott in a rage. Did they realize what anguish this was causing the Hofmann family? Bill Hofmann was terribly, terribly hurt. What a terrible, terrible way to hear the awful news. The very idea that his son had really been guilty of the murders and forgeries was a blow from which this man might never recover.

He even threatened to scuttle the deal. "We're just flat not going to do it," he said. "When you guys learn to shut up and tell your people that whoever told the media has to shut up, then we'll go through with it."

"But we've already signed the document," Stott protested. The renewed threat of a trial sent him into a meltdown panic.

"Bullshit," snapped Yengich. "We're not going to do this. Because it's not fair. I don't think it's fair to the victims' families. I don't think it's fair to my client's family. We come to an agreement. We agree it won't be released to the press. And then you guys shoot your mouths off. I don't think anybody can comprehend how difficult it is for Mark to deal with his family on this. And you're making it more and more difficult."

It was vintage Yengich, full of sound and fury, but some suspected that it signified nothing. No one gained more from the leak than Yengich himself. The press had done what Mark—and Yengich, for that matter—had failed to do: break the bad news to Bill Hofmann. A few even suspected that Yengich himself or someone in his office had planted the story in an eleventh-hour ploy to force Mark's hand and save the deal. And even if he didn't do it, he had to be pleased it was done.

That night, the Hofmanns had a family meeting. Yengich, who attended, described it as a gut-wrenching experience. By the end of the meeting, he said, every single person there, including him, was in tears. David Biggs wasn't the only one who found it hard to work up a genuine sympathy. "Mark could have told his father a long time ago and saved everyone a lot of pain."

Early the next morning, Yengich called Judge Rigtrup at home. "Mark's not gonna come in," he said. The reports in the media had come at the worst possible time. "Mark was in the process of trying to spend his last quiet evening at home with his family when they saw the plea announced for the first time on television. Let me tell you, we're shocked, and incensed, and infuriated."

They weren't the only ones.

When Heidi Jones heard the press reports that Hofmann would be charged only with manslaughter for killing her mother, Kathy Sheets, she seethed with indignation. Contrary to what Stott had told Judge Rigtrup, the families of the victims had only generally endorsed the concept of a plea bargain. They didn't know the details of the deal until they appeared, sometimes in mangled form, in the press. In fact, the deal called for Hofmann to plead guilty to a second-degree murder charge for the Sheets killing but to be sentenced on a manslaughter charge. It was a subtle distinction, but one that made all the difference to the relatives of Kathy Sheets.

Heidi called her aunt, Joan Gorton, and Gorton, equally irate, called the county attorney, David Yocom. "This is Joan Gorton. I am Kathy Sheets's sister. Is it true that Hofmann is only pleading to a manslaughter on Kathy's murder? Kathy's daughter and I are very upset."

Yocom's naturally short fuse was made even shorter by the growing public criticism of his handling of the Hofmann case. "Listen," he snapped, "I don't have the time to hold the hand of every sister or daughter or cousin of a victim."

If Heidi and Gorton were irate before, now they were beside themselves. Gorton called Gary Sheets that night and related the conversation with Yocom. Sheets tried to calm her down. "If they don't have an explanation," he said, "then we simply won't agree to the plea." Sheets called Stott at home and told him that Yocom had all but caused a collapse in the plea bargain. Stott knew that if the families of the victims came out against the deal in the press, the public would spit it up like a hairball. They were already choking.

"Why don't you come in to my office tomorrow morning," Stott suggested, "and I'll explain the whole situation to you."

In the meantime, Sheets did the best he could to explain the situation to his children. "People are saying Hofmann will be out in ten years. Stott says if we waited and went to trial, because of all the publicity in the state, he doesn't think a judge would give Hofmann a long sentence.

"Stott says he thinks we have a strong case, but we take a chance. He says he thinks we can get as much time served out of him here in this plea bargaining as we would going to trial. And we don't have the risk of going to trial and having some nutty juror giving in to Hofmann's personality. He's a con man. The kid's persuasive. You get the kid on the stand, and who knows what'll happen in a trial. And here, Stott says, we're sure he's going to jail for a good long time."

Besides, said Sheets with a deep sigh that he hoped would end the conversation, "in the eternal scope of things, I'm going to be with Kathy."

The next morning, Sheets went to see Stott and agreed to support the deal.

101 Ken Farnsworth sat in the small circular courtroom and thought about his partner, Jim Bell. "He should be here," Farnsworth muttered to himself as people, mostly reporters, crowded into the seats around him. A few weeks ago, before he left to give some talks to a nursing convention in South Dakota, Bell had said, "I can tell you exactly what day Mark Hofmann is going to plead guilty. It will be the day I'm in South Dakota."

And he was right.

In just a few minutes, the room was full, and the bailiffs directed members of the Sheets and Christensen families to seats in the jury box, and then to chairs set up in front of the jury box. From there, they would be close enough to Mark Hofmann to feel his breath when he said the word they had waited more than a year to hear: "Guilty."

Jim Bell should have been there.

But perhaps it was all for the best, thought Farnsworth ruefully. The press had made so much of their "vendetta" against Hofmann. The last thing he wanted now was to give them an eight-by-ten of Ken and Jim leading a handcuffed Mark Hofmann to the state prison at Point of the Mountain—as sweet as that moment would have been.

At the last possible minute, Hofmann walked into the courtroom wearing a dark-blue pinstripe suit like the one he always wore to his meetings with Hinckley and other Church officials. Only Mark was twenty pounds heavier now, and the coat barely buttoned. He was flanked by his father and Ron Yengich. Mark looked at neither of them, keeping his eyes straight ahead of him, fixed in the middle distance. A moment later, Judge Rigtrup wheeled himself into the courtroom and took his place at the dais.

Looking very stern, Rigtrup reviewed the terms of the deal. Hofmann agreed to plead guilty to two counts of second-degree murder and two counts of felony theft by deception. In exchange, the prosecutors would drop twenty-six other felony charges against Hofmann. In addition, the U.S. Attorney's Office would drop federal charges of unlawful possession of a machine gun, and New York authorities would agree not to prosecute Hofmann for any alleged criminal conduct surrounding the "Oath of a Freeman."

Finally, Hofmann agreed that within thirty days, he would "meet with the prosecuting attorneys and answer, truthfully and completely, all questions said attorneys may have on any or all of the charged offenses . . . and the surrounding circumstances of those offenses and any other related activities." Distaste clung to every syllable as Rigtrup read the four-page agreement.

When he was done, he turned to Hofmann, who stood but refused to look him in the eye.

"Did you intentionally and knowingly cause the death of Steve Christensen?" Rigtrup asked.

"Yes," said Hofmann in a faint, tightwire voice. It was the first time the victims' families had heard him speak. Throughout the preliminary hearing, he had never said a word. Now, the sound of his high, squeaky voice, came as a shock. "He's a fag! He's a fag!" Jimmy Sheets whispered to his sisters.

"Did you intentionally and knowingly cause the death of Kathleen Sheets?"

"Yes."

Kathy Sheets's daughter, Katie, put her head down and breathed a bottomless sigh. Now, finally, she could start putting her life back together.

"Do you desire to enter these guilty pleas because you are in fact guilty?"

"Yes."

Under normal circumstances, the proceedings would have ended there. Judge Rigtrup would have set a date in three or four weeks for sentencing and ordered a presentence report. But these were not normal circumstances. There would be no delay, no presentence report. Rigtrup would sentence Mark immediately after the plea was entered and he would be led directly from the courtroom to prison.

Mark Hofmann wanted it that way.

At first, he had wanted a month's delay in both the pleading and the sentencing. Rigtrup insisted that the plea go on as scheduled but offered to delay the sentencing a month, giving Mark another month of freedom. If that was the only alternative, Mark responded, he preferred to plead and be sentenced the same day. Yengich tried to explain his client's decision by saying Mark knew he was going to prison eventually anyway so why wait around for a presentence report.

The truth was he didn't want to spend an entire month explaining to his family why he had lied to them for so long. He didn't even want to spend a day. Prison was easier to face than his father.

So Rigtrup pronounced sentence.

He had read through more than a thousand pages of evidence, including transcripts of the preliminary hearing, and was struck most by the "indiscriminate nature" of the bombings. "The deaths were inflicted consciously and knowingly," he concluded, "after considerable planning and scheming." The devices Hofmann employed were sensitive, and he had virtually no control over who would be killed by them. A neighborhood child could have been killed by the Sheets bomb. An innocent woman from across the hall had almost been killed by the Christensen bomb.

Finally, Rigtrup announced the sentences dictated by law: an indeterminate term of five years to life for the murder of Steve Christensen and indeterminate terms of one to fifteen years on each of the counts of theft by deception. In accordance with the deal, however, the sentence for the murder of Kathy Sheets was reduced from five-to-life to one-to-fifteen.

One-to-fifteen. Joan Gorton sat in the courtroom and shook her head. Even Kathy Sheets, who could find humor in almost anything, wouldn't find any humor in that.

Rigtrup turned to Hofmann again. "I feel very personally involved in this particular case," he said, with all the gravity he could summon. "I do not have any authority with the Board of Pardons, but I can express my opinion and I will. Mr. Hofmann, it is my personal opinion that you should spend the rest of your natural life at the Utah state prison.”

In the back of the courtroom, Ken Farnsworth wanted to stand up and applaud.

Rigtrup said to Mark, “Do you want to spend a moment with your family?”

With his father sitting directly behind him, Mark kept his eyes fixed straight ahead. “No.”

But he was ushered into the judge’s chambers anyway, where his father embraced him before the bailiff led him off to jail.

102

The first session at which Mark Hofmann was supposed to “tell all” began at 2:25 on the afternoon of February 11, 1987. As at the test debriefing, only Bob Stott, David Biggs, Mark Hofmann, and Ron Yengich were present.

As before, Bob Stott controlled the questioning, going over documents damaging to the Church in excruciating detail while virtually ignoring non-Mormon forgeries like the “Oath of a Freeman.” Most astonishing of all, despite public reassurances at the time of the plea, Stott never returned to the subject of the bombings.

Only once did the remarkably genial questioning stray near the murders. Hofmann began to talk about his rationalization for the bombings. “It was half a joke,” he began. “Well, joke is not a good word, but it was more, thinking that I have the parts, I have a way out, than actually saying to myself when I purchased the parts, this is what I’m going to use them for—these are the people I’m going to take out. None of that was in my mind at that time. As far as the idea of Mrs. Sheets . . .”

“Let’s back off that a minute,” Stott interrupted, “and get back to the documents.”

Later, when Biggs protested, Stott insisted that the murders had already been thoroughly covered in the test debriefing, and, in any case, they would get to them eventually. But the test debriefing had been off the record, and they never did get around to the murders again.

Ron Yengich later expressed his own theories as to Stott's curiously selective questioning.

"You've got a very devout Mormon who is in charge. He's a good guy, but, on the other hand, he had more than one interest. Bob's interest goes beyond solving the crime. I don't know if he's talking to Church leaders or not. I find it hard to believe that he wouldn't be. I think Bob has dual motivations. And one of the motivations is to explain some of these things to the Brethren. I think that's going to become clear when the transcript of the Hofmann meetings is available. Bob asks and reasks and reasks the same questions when it comes to anything that affects the Church."

Hofmann admitted that the Anthon Transcript was "a clumsy job," but described its manufacture in proud detail.

For the ink, he picked a recipe containing tannic acid, ferric acid, gum arabic, and logwood, and went to the chemistry stand in a local hobby store in Logan for the ingredients. "Perfect Chemicals is the brand name," he enlightened them.

After the ink had dried, he soaked the document in hydrogen peroxide—William Flynn had been right—dabbing it on with a piece of tissue. That oxidized the black ink to an "appropriate brown color." To make it look as if the Anthon Transcript had been in the Bible for many years, he wadded sheets of aluminum foil the size of the folded Transcript, heated them with an iron, and placed them in the Bible where he intended to put the Transcript itself—"to make it look like the acid from the paper had browned the leaves of the Bible."

The paper came from an end page of a book in the Institute Library at Utah State.

"Did you rip it out? Cut it out?"

"Yes. Probably at this time I would have used a razor blade to remove it, being careful to only remove the one blank page and not cut into the rest of the book. So I doubt you will find other traces besides the cut end page. You won't find other traces of razor blade." He also trimmed all four edges of the sheet with the razor blade, being careful to remove any oil stains where the paper had come in contact with the leather binding.

Then he dipped the paper in a hot gelatin solution to give it a new sizing—since sizing tends to wear off as paper ages. Without the sizing, the ink would have "feathered," or spread out too much, when it came in contact with the old, absorbent paper. After writing the text, he applied heat with an iron—he ironed the document—then poured hydrogen peroxide on it to age the ink and to remove the sizing where it wasn't protected by the ink.

"Why did you do both the hydrogen peroxide and the heat?" Stott asked.

"Well, I was trying to make it look old. The hydrogen peroxide made the ink look old. The heat made the paper look old."

"But the paper was already old."

"Yes, but it made it look like it had seen some use. It was ragged, it was well aged. It is true that it was genuine paper from that period but I thought it would be more convincing rather than being pure white to show that it had the high acid content. Also, I wanted it to have high acid content so it would stain the page in the Bible."

Finally, he sprayed the document (Mark had taken to calling it "the Hofmann Transcript") with a solution of gelatin and milk in order to create "foxing," or rust spots.

Stott wanted to know how long this elaborate process had taken.

"It was completed in a day. When I say completed, I mean the Transcript was written in a day. Obviously it took longer than that to research it. In one day, the Transcript was written, aged, the Bible was aged, and the Transcript was inserted in the book. All of the forgery work would have been done in a day."

For some time, the Tanners and others had been demanding that Hofmann provide a sample of his forged handwriting. There was no other way, they claimed, to be absolutely sure that he operated alone, without an accomplice. So Stott asked Hofmann to write the signature of Samuel Smith, the supposed relative of Joseph Smith's whose name had been appended to the genuine insert in the Anthon Bible. Hofmann signed the name effortlessly, proudly, then signed his own name underneath it.

At the next session, on February 17, instead of plowing ahead, Stott returned to the Anthon Transcript.

"Let me ask you about some of the spelling—words like characters. Do you remember why you misspelled it? Where you came up with that idea?" The interview was becoming a game of Mormon trivia.

Later Stott asked about Joseph Smith's "characteristic formation of certain letters and words." What does that mean, he asked?

"In other words, the shape of the letters are the same as Joseph Smith's shaping. The words also," Hofmann added, his exasperation showing for the first time. "I mean, it's supposed to be a forgery of Joseph Smith. That's what it's intended to be. So I don't think it's surprising that it looks like his handwriting."

Stott went on and on about Joseph Smith's handwriting until finally Hofmann changed the subject. "You will probably want to know what the glue was," he offered helpfully, referring to the black glue with which the Transcript had been pasted in the Bible.

"I'm sure they shall," said Ron Yengich, whose short attention span had long since expired. "Why don't you tell them."

"It was some charcoal ground up with a wheat paste which I found was not terribly sticky, and so, believe it or not, I added a couple drops of Elmer's Glue to it."

"What kind of Elmer's Glue?" Stott asked with a straight face.

"Not the carpenters' but the school stuff."

"The white stuff?"

"Yes, the white glue. Just a regular bottle with the orange top."

"Where did you get the idea for this charcoal and wheat paste?" Stott wanted to know.

"I thought to myself, I need to glue this in here. What looks like old glue? I had the idea of getting an old book and soaking the end page of the spine where it's glued down and retrieving some glue that way, which I figured was too much work. I was in a hurry. I wanted to get this thing done that day."

"Why?" Biggs asked.

"I don't know. I'm always rather impatient. That's probably part of my personality. I wanted to get it done before Dorie came home from work. My wife. So anyway, just sticking Elmer's Glue on there, or rubber cement, didn't seem to quite do it. They usually didn't use white glue back then."

Hofmann had folded the document into quarters, glued it along the edges into the Bible, and closed it up. Then he cleaned everything up, pouring the leftover ink down the sink and throwing away the extra glue and paper, and waited for Dorie to come home and bear witness to his first great "discovery."

"Was your intention to sell it at that time? Was the money a factor?"

"Yes, but not so much. Originally, initially, it was more [a matter] of the fame involved—although I thought all along that it would be sold, and the more publicity I got the better."

At the session on February 27, Brad Rich substituted for Ron Yengich.

Taking advantage of Yengich's absence, Stott tried to broach a sensitive subject. "I think this is a good time as any to ask, what were your feelings at this time, generally, to start out, say, with your faith?"

"Well, previous to this, I had lost faith in the Mormon Church."

"Do you want to tell us when—or was it a gradual thing?"

"Right around the age of fourteen."

Suddenly, Hofmann broke off. "This is something that I guess Ron wants to be here [for] when I start talking about [it]. Well, I will finish what I was saying."

He looked to Rich for guidance. "We are very close to an area that I know Ron wants to be here [for]," said Rich, "but I think you can finish this."

"I wasn't fearful of the Church inspiration detecting the forgery," Hofmann continued, referring to the Church leaders' alleged ability to read minds and see into men's souls. "That's all I was going to say."

"What was your feeling about Mormon history and, specifically, early Mormon history with Joseph Smith at this time?"

"I won't go so far as to say I wanted to change Mormon history. Let me take that back. Maybe I did. I believed that the documents that I created could have been a part of Mormon history. I'm speaking specifically, for example, of the magic-related items. The 1825 Stowell letter, the so-called Salamander Letter. In effect, I guess, the questions I asked myself in deciding on a forgery—one of the questions—was what could have been. I had a concept of Church history, and I followed that concept."

The questions finally moved on to the Joseph Smith III blessing, which Hofmann considered "a better forgery than the Anthon Transcript."

Where did he get the idea for the blessing?

"It's pretty common knowledge in the Church, RLDS Church, that there's been a debate going on as far as whether or not such a blessing was ever given. Because of that controversy, I figured such a blessing would be worth a lot of money to certain people. So again, as far as motivation, it is true that partially it had to do with my rewriting of Mormon history."

But mostly it was money, he admitted. "As I remember, my first son was born around the time of this."

Stott wanted to know where he had gotten the words for the blessing, but Hofmann couldn't remember the source. "I'm wondering where I got this," he said, "'And he'll be wafted as on eagles' wings.' I must have taken that from someplace."

"Sounds like it's taken from someplace all right."

"Sounds real lyrical," Biggs added caustically.

"I must have read that someplace and thought that it was something that Joseph Smith might say. I can't say. Hopefully it is not from Shakespeare or someplace."

"Do you recall where the inspiration for the second paragraph came from?"

"As I remember, the first paragraph said basically everything that I needed to say. But it seemed to take up such a little amount of paper, and Joseph Smith had a tendency on occasion to say more than what was needed, perhaps."

Reading a line, "His days shall be lengthened upon the earth and he will be received in an instant unto myself," Stott asked: "That's kind of quaint—you know, a stylized way of putting things. Where did you come up with it?"

"Just seemed like words Joseph Smith would use."

Stott wanted to know if Hofmann intended to harm the LDS Church when he forged the blessing.

"That was not my original intent, because, like I say, I didn't think it would see the light of day."

"Did it become an intent later on?"

"It cast me in a rather bad light with some people in the Church, I believe, yes."

"But that wasn't part of your motivation?"

"That's right."

The techniques for forging the blessing were similar to those he had used for the Anthon Transcript, except he invented a more sophisticated method for applying the hydrogen peroxide. He laid the document against a metal screen—"such as you would find on storm doors"—sprayed the document with hydrogen peroxide, then sucked the fluid through the document and the screen using the hose on an old vacuum cleaner. This saturated the fluid through the document, instead of just letting it rest on the surface. "The purpose of the sucking is to bring the characteristic aging or brown of the ink through to the back side," he explained.

Was Mark ever concerned that he might have been forging "a document the Church already had but never made public to anyone?" Stott asked.

"No. That didn't concern me. For one thing, I thought if they had such a document, it wouldn't still be in existence. Not to say that the Church nowadays would go around burning documents or anything. And if another blessing was given, presumably if the Church had a copy, it would not have matched my words since I made mine up and I don't feel like I was inspired at the time."

When the fourth session was held on March 12, Bob Stott was vacationing in the Bahamas, Ron Yengich in Arizona. David Biggs took advantage of Stott's absence to ask questions about some of the documents in which the Church had no interest, like Al Rust's Mormon money.

Hofmann chided the police for missing the plates for the Deseret currency notes during their numerous searches of his house. "The plates were on the top shelf in the closet of my downstairs office until I destroyed them after returning home from the hospital after the bombings."

"How did you destroy them?"

"They were burned in my fireplace. The metal burns a bright white, incidentally, but I knew that it was flammable, the wood backing and also the metal, and that was their fate."

"Did anybody in your family know you did that?"

"They knew I had a fire but not that I was burning plates in that fire."

"Where was the fire in your home?"

"In my fireplace in the front room. People were there when the fire was going. My children, my wife, was there, but they did not participate in helping me in constructing the fire and they thought it was a lot of fun to have. My son was there when I was doing it, when I was building the fire, and since he is young, just turned six, I wasn't afraid of him seeing anything or understanding anything."

"Was this when you were still in your wheelchair?"

"Yes and no. I was able to jump around somewhat on one leg before I really went on crutches. But it was in that time period where I would have been out of my wheelchair, when I went downstairs. I obtained them the first time I went downstairs, which would have been a few weeks after I returned home, I imagine. I wouldn't have gone downstairs in the wheelchair. I would have slid down the stairs on my behind. I went in the room, in my office, and whatever incriminating evidence that wasn't already taken, I put in a bag and probably that same night is when I built a fire."

Stott's absence also allowed Biggs to ask about the "Oath of a Freeman."

Hofmann described the extraordinary lengths to which he had gone to formulate the ink. "I knew that this document would be scrutinized so I took pains to ensure that the ink would not differ from the seventeenth-century printing ink. . . . I obtained some paper from the same time period, approximately, from Brigham Young University library. The paper did not have printing on it, which I guess they'll be happy to hear. That paper I burned in an apparatus to make carbon black. The reason I went through this trouble is because I thought that there was a possibility that a carbon 14 test would be performed on the ink."

"Do you know what book this paper came out of that you used to produce the carbon black?"

"If you want to take me in shackles to the library I could point it out to you, but I don't know that I can describe the exact location."

He then took the carbon and mixed it with linseed oil. "It was just chemically pure linseed oil, which I treated to some extent."

"How did you treat the linseed oil?" Biggs asked.

"Well, I'm going into all of this. You are just dying to hear this, aren't you?"

Biggs was.

"The linseed oil was heavily boiled, which thickens it, and then it was burned." To that, he added a solution of tannic acid that he created by taking a piece of leather binding from a book of that period and boiling it in distilled water "until it turned a nice brown color." With a final touch of beeswax—"just ordinary beeswax, nothing special to it"—the ink was ready.

The paper was a piece of seventeenth-century paper that approximated as closely as possible the paper used for the Bay Psalm Book, the other product of Stephen Daye's press. He actually found a piece that was within five years of the alleged date of the "Oath," and almost precisely duplicated the spacing of the laid lines of the paper used for the Bay Psalm Book.

Before printing the "Oath," he aged the plate by grinding down some of the letters, chosen at random, with a small drill fitted with a fine grinding-tip stone. A final rubdown with steel wool rounded off the corners of the lettering.

The printing was done in his basement workroom. He rolled ink onto the plate, placed the paper on the plate, covered it with a layer of felt and a second thick copper plate, then pressed everything together with a C-clamp.

"Did you have only one piece of paper at that time to print on?"

"Yes, I did."

"Were you a little concerned that maybe you wouldn't get it right the first time?"

"I don't think so. For one thing, this was the first attempt by the Daye print shop to make an impression, and if it was crude or didn't look quite right, I didn't think it would be too great of a concern."

"Did you test out your final product on a piece of modern paper to see how it looked on the paper?" Rich asked.

"Yes, I'm sure I did."

"He's a lot bolder than I am," Rich confessed admiringly. "A lot of things, he just did it, knew it worked, and went ahead and printed it. I would take a ream of paper and go through it to be sure it worked."

Hofmann wasn't one to shy away from a compliment. "By the time I forged the 'Oath,' I considered myself a pretty good forger. I thought I had a pretty good knowledge of different techniques that would be used in analyzing it."

In fact, Hofmann himself had noticed the cracked-ink phenomenon before Throckmorton and Flynn pointed it out.

"Oh, really?" said Biggs, genuinely surprised. "You had seen that cracking before yourself?"

"Yes, although I didn't know the cause of it until the preliminary hearing—as far as the gum arabic. Undoubtedly, when somebody reads this transcript, they'll keep gum arabic out of the formula."

"We are doing an invaluable service here, I guess."

For the "Oath," he had aged the ink not with hydrogen peroxide, but with ammonia.

"Did it concern you that it might be tested by the cyclotron method?"

"No."

"Why not?"

"Because I felt that the document would pass. I'm sure if it wasn't for the other suspicion, i.e., the bombings, etc., I believe it would have passed very well."

As long as Hofmann had brought it up, Biggs couldn't resist pursuing it. "Hypothetically," he said, "if the American Antiquarian Society had been able to, and did vote to purchase your 'Oath' on October 15, 1985, for about a million dollars, what would that have done to the financial hole that you dug yourself into by that time?"

"It would have relieved me from it. Hence, I guess you want me to say the bombings would not have taken place."

"I don't want you to say that unless it is true."

"I'll say it, since it's true."

By the session on April 7, Stott and Yengich had returned and the questions concentrated on Hofmann's desperate financial situation in the months leading up to the bombings.

"Weren't you in a pretty frenzied state at this time?" asked Biggs.

"Yes."

"Weren't you desperate for money?"

"Yes."

Biggs recited the list of victims. "[So] you just defrauded people out of hundreds of thousands of dollars. Wilding, Pinnock, First Interstate Bank, Rust. We could go on forever."

"Now just a second," Hofmann interrupted. "I want to clarify all of this, how all of this fraud and stuff took place, if I can. My view was, when I forged a document and sold it, I was not cheating that person that I was selling it to because the document would never be detected as being a fraud. Obviously, if I would have known they would someday be detected, I wouldn't have done it."

It was a rationalization he had used since childhood. He told them the story of how he had electroplated a mint mark on a coin to make it valuable and when he sent it in, the Treasury Department pronounced it genuine. "And my feeling was that if the Treasury Department pronounces it genuine, that it is genuine, by definition."

"Is that the same kind of rationalization you used on these documents?" Stott asked.

"Yes. I never would have done them, obviously, if I thought they could be detected. I thought I was clever enough to avoid that, which obviously I wasn't."

"If the experts say they're real documents, then the people who buy them really aren't hurt?"

"Yes, that's right." Reality and appearance were one and the same thing, as long as nobody knew otherwise.

"Was there any concern on your hand," Stott pressed, mangling his phraseology as usual, that "these people who perhaps had given you money were now investing sentiment and emotion and belief in these documents—but it was based on a false premise? Did that enter your mind?" It had obviously entered Bob Stott's mind. "Did that cause you any concern?" It had obviously caused Bob Stott concern.

"No, that didn't cause concern in my mind. My feeling is, it's not so much what is genuine and what isn't, as what people believe is genuine. My example would be the Mormon Church, which may be a bad example, since I'm sure you're both believers in it. I don't believe in the religion as far as that Joseph Smith had the First Vision or received the plates from the Angel Moroni or whatever. It doesn't detract from the social good that the Mormon Church can do. To me it is unimportant if Joseph Smith had that vision or not as long as people believe it. The important thing is that people believe it.”

It was an attitude worthy of Joseph Smith. Hofmann may have rejected the Church’s doctrines but he had taken to his bosom its attitude toward truth: faith before facts.

“The Oliver Cowdery [history] was made up by you?” Stott asked, eager to put the damaging rumors to rest.

“Right.”

“Never saw it in the First Presidency’s vault—or anywhere?”

“Right.”

“Why did you make the story up?”

“For a couple of reasons. First of all, I remember distinctly, when I did make it up, we were eating at Wendy’s. Indigestion, perhaps. . . . The other reason, obviously, would have been that part of the Oliver Cowdery history was about a white salamander and Alvin’s involvement [in the First Vision], and that would have validated the history presented in the forged Salamander Letter.”

“Again made up by you?”

“Again made up by me. One forged idea to validate another forged idea.”

On the last day of questioning, May 15, Stott asked what Hofmann would have done if someone had loaned him the money to pay off Al Rust and he had been forced to produce the McLellin Collection.

“What was in my mind is, President Hinckley would be happy if eventually I could tell him that I had seen to it that the documents would not fall into the wrong hands. . . . He wasn’t so concerned, especially when he found out other people knew about this material, to actually obtain it, as to just see that the right people got it.”

In other words, Hofmann could claim that he had sold it to a devout Mormon who would never breathe a word about the McLellin Collection, and Hinckley would never breathe a word either.

It would have been the ultimate forgery, a collection of documents that existed only in Mark Hofmann’s imagination and Gordon Hinckley’s fears.

Mark Hofmann entered the Utah state prison at Point of the Mountain on January 24, 1987. Soon afterward, he wrote a letter to the family of Kathy Sheets:

Of course it is difficult to explain my actions of October 1985. I cannot justify what occurred [sic]. My actions have caused irreparable [sic] harm to your families and to my own.

Saying I'm sorry sounds so hollow as to seem meaningless, but with all my heart I want you to know that although my actions were inexcusable, I am sorry.

I have tried in small measure to rectify my crimes by fully exposing them to the authorities, and putting to a halt the further trama [sic] of the trial process.

In Utah, the plea bargain arranged by Ron Yengich and Bob Stott was not greeted warmly. Informal polls conducted by local papers showed that a majority of people in the Salt Lake area felt Hofmann should have been tried and, if found guilty, sentenced to death.

In the criminal-defense community, Ron Yengich was hailed as a hero. The consensus was that he had “raped the prosecution” on the deal. “We were envious as a group,” says one fellow attorney. “Envious of his ability to have gotten such a good plea bargain. And a lot of that had to be attributed to Ron, because the prosecution’s case wasn’t that weak. In fact, it was so good, we all hoped it would give us leverage in pleading some of our cases.”

John Harrington, a reporter for KTVX, ruefully recalled the case of a nineteen-year-old kid who stole a car and robbed a Der Wiener-schnitzel, a fast-food chain. He was caught before any money was turned over. He didn’t have a weapon, but they thought he did, so he went to prison on armed robbery and car-theft charges. He got five-to-life for the “armed” robbery and one-to-fifteen for the car theft—exactly the sentences imposed on Hofmann for murdering Steve Christensen and Kathy Sheets.

At the county attorney's office, George Throckmorton, the documents examiner who broke Hofmann's forgeries, lost his job. David Yocom claimed he was just making good on campaign promises to cut costs by cutting personnel, and Throckmorton was expendable. "We'll never have another case like this again," said an official. "We don't need an expert like that." Soon afterward, Throckmorton left Salt Lake City.

He was followed by David Biggs, who quit when the Byzantine politics of the county attorney's office got to be too much even for his considerable political savvy.

Of all the original Hofmann prosecutors, that left only Bob Stott, the architect of the plea.

A few months after the plea, Al Rust called Bill Hofmann. He wanted to express his sympathy for the pain that the Hofmann family had suffered. "I also want you to know that I don't hate Mark," said Rust. "I probably have analyzed him in my mind as much as anybody. I probably know, right now, nothing more than before this happened. I can't understand it. I don't think there's a qualified psychologist who could talk to Mark and come up with the answers. But I forgive him for what he's done to me, I probably will never visit him, and I know what a heartache it must be to you. I'm going ahead with my life. I hope all of us can."

For the first time, Bill Hofmann didn't reject the offer of sympathy or challenge the suggestion of his son's guilt.

As soon as Mark entered prison, the members of his ward rushed to Dorie Hofmann's aid with money, food, and clothes. She and her four children were, they reasoned, as much victims as anyone else. Once a week, she would bundle the kids into the car and drive them to Point of the Mountain to visit their father.

Several months later, Shannon Flynn and his wife, Robin, called. They wanted to make sure Dorie was all right. "Some members of my family have tried to talk to me about divorcing Mark," she admitted, "but I think I should stand behind him. I go see him every Friday with the children." Had she come to terms with Mark's guilt? All she would say was, "I realize Mark has made a few mistakes."

When Flynn related the remark to Brent Metcalfe, he was, like everybody else who heard it, stunned. "A few mistakes?" Metcalfe gasped.

"Don't you get the feeling that that doesn't quite capture the magnitude of what's happening here?"

Eventually, both Terri Christensen and Gary Sheets remarried.

On Temple Square, the Mormon Church had its own unique way of responding to the events of the previous year.

Hugh Pinnock was promoted. On October 4, 1986, almost exactly one year after the bombings, he was "called" to the presidency of the First Quorum of the Seventy, a position just below his ultimate ambition, Apostle.

Francis Gibbons, Gordon Hinckley's secretary who had sometimes dealt with Mark Hofmann in matters of the greatest sensitivity, was promoted to General Authority.

Gordon Hinckley was promoted. Eighty-nine-year-old Marion G. Romney was "released" as First Counselor on November 5, 1985, making room for Gordon B. Hinckley to rise from Second Counselor to First Counselor in the First Presidency. He remained third in line to become Prophet, Seer, and Revelator.

Under the ironic headline, HISTORICAL RECORDS NOW MORE ACCESSIBLE, the Church announced a new policy that would virtually shut the doors to its archives. "Great numbers of the Historical Department's current records will be catalogued and microfilmed over the next several years," said Elder John K. Carmack, G. Homer Durham's successor. "Although confidentiality, respect for the sacred, and laws of privacy necessitate that some records will be closed, we expect that most records will eventually be open to the public."

"The public," however, would be required "to register with the archives, state their research purpose, and sign a research agreement." This agreement, not described in the article, required that anyone using the archives would henceforth have to agree to Church censorship, not just on books or articles being researched at the time, but on any books or articles published at any time in the future.

In a speech to the faithful, Hinckley attacked those scholars of the "new history" who ran around trying "to ferret out every element of folk magic and the occult" surrounding Joseph Smith. Yes, folk magic and superstition existed in Joseph Smith's day, but there "is no evidence whatever that the Church came of such superstition."

Finally, the Brethren called upon all those who had questioned the leadership of the Church during this time of trial, who had wondered how the representatives of God on earth could have been so easily and repeatedly bamboozled by Mark Hofmann, to have more faith.

"Safety lies in loving the Brethren," the faithful were told at the October 1987 General Conference. "To follow them is to build one's house on a rock. . . . Read the scriptures, especially the Book of Mormon. . . . Do as the prophets request. . . . Pray for the prophets."

The benefits to be derived from loving and following the Brethren would be many, they were told. Wives would be more obedient to their husbands; children would be more obedient to their parents. "Declare in quiet tones that you love the Brethren and you are going to follow them. Add exclamation marks to your words as you quietly and faithfully follow the Brethren."

Epilogue

On January 29, 1988, a little more than a year after Mark Hofmann entered Point of the Mountain prison, the Utah Board of Pardons met to consider his eligibility for parole. In a letter to the board, Hofmann wrote how he had rationalized the murders of Steve Christensen and Kathy Sheets. As always, he found himself easily convinced of things he wanted to believe: "I told myself that my survival and that of my family was the most important thing. That my victims might die that day in a car accident or from a heart attack anyway."

To the surprise of all and the gratification of many, the Board of Pardons ruled that Mark Hofmann should be denied all possibility of parole.

About the Authors

STEVEN NAIFEH and GREGORY WHITE SMITH are both graduates of the Harvard Law School. They co-edit the biennial directory The Best Lawyers in America, and have contributed articles on legal subjects to various journals, including the New York Times. In eight years of working together, they have written more than ten books, including two best-sellers—most recently The Human Animal, which they wrote with Phil Donahue. Mr. Naifeh is a native of Tulsa, Oklahoma; Mr. Smith, of Columbus, Ohio. Currently, they both live and work in New York City.

THE BOOK OF MORMON.

A NEW CLAIM OF AUTHORSHIP.

Important Researches at Amity Authorized From Utah—The Story of Rev. Solomon Spaulding—
Some New Facts.

The little town of Amity, a few miles up the Monongahela river, was the birth place of Mormonism. For many years Sidney Higdon was thought to have written the Book of Mormon afterward elaborated by Joe Smith, and made the basis of the faith system of the Utah Colony, but some investigations lately made at Amity by Dr. W. W. Sharp, under authority from Salt Lake City, have brought out a new story about the origin of the book. Dr. Sharp writes as follows to the Director of Washington, Pa.

The author of the "Manuscript Found," which doubters suggested the Book of Mormon, had occupied so important a position in its conception, design and execution, lived and died in Amity, Pa. The old frame house he occupied is still tenable, and his grave in the old cemetery attracts many a curious visitor. A stone still marks the foot of the grave with one of its bold inscriptions obliterated. Time has reduced the headstone to small particles of dust, while many a fragment of it adorns the cabinets of the antiquarians. About eighteen years ago, the writer, by carefully replacing the broken pieces, obtained a fragmentary copy of its inscription, a part of which was a four-line stanza, commencing as follows:

"A scribe lived his sweetest day"

But we have a living witness—Joseph Miller—a veteran of the war of 1812. A Christian gentleman of undoubted veracity, with mind and memory remarkable for their prolonged preservation, and singularly free from any signs of senility. I had an interview with Mr. Miller two days ago. Found him well and hearty barring some muscular disability, and as ready to turn it a joke or sing a quartet as ever. He said, if he lived till to day, (Feb. 1) he would be 68 years old.

I asked him to give me all the information he could, from his personal knowledge, of Rev. Solomon Spaulding and his family, his recollections and impressions, from association with him, with reference especially to his object in writing the "manuscript found," and its subsequent misuse by the founders of the Mormon sect. Prefacing his reply with the remark that he would not intentionally say one word that he did not believe to be strictly true, he proceeded deliberately to make, in substance, the following statement:

I was well acquainted with Mr. Spaulding while he lived in Amity, Pa. I would say he was from 55 to 60 years of age, in person, tall and spare, and considerably stooped, caused in part, I think, from a severe rupture. His hair was quite gray. He was chaste in his usage and demeaned in manner, regarding his profession. I never heard him preach, think he never preached at A., said he had quit preaching on account of ill health. He kept a public house of tavern of the character common to that day. He died of dysentery in 1816 (in the Fall, I think), after an illness of six or eight weeks. Dr. Cephas Dodd attended him.

I watched with him many nights during this illness. After he died I made his coffin and superintended his burial. One night when near his end, he told me he thought he should die, and requested me to assist him with in settling his estate, accordingly I, with Col. Theo. Vernon went on her board as administrators, and I helped her close it up.

Mrs. Spaulding was intelligent and of pleasing manners, with fair complexion, and say from 35 to 40 years of age.

A child of fair complexion and about four to five years of age, lived with them here, think she was their daughter as she bore the Spaulding name.

Mr. S. was poor but honest. I endeavored for him twice to borrow money. His house was a place of common resort especially in the evening. I was prosecuting my trade—carpenter—in the village and frequented his house. Mr. S. seemed to take delight in reading from his manuscript (written on foolscap) for the entertainment of his frequent visitors, heard him read most, if not all of it, and had frequent conversations with him about it.

Some time ago I had in my possession, for about six months, the book of Mormon, and heard most of it read during that time. I was always forcibly struck with the similarity of the portions of it which purported to be of supernatural origin to the quaint style and peculiar language that had made such a deep impression on my mind when hearing the manuscript read by Mr. S. For instance, the very frequent repetition of the phrase, "and it came to pass." Then on hearing read the account from the book of the battle between the Amalekites and the Nephites, in which the soldiers of one army had placed a red mark on their foreheads to distinguish them from their enemies, it seemed to reproduce in my mind not only the narrative, but the very words, as they had been impressed on my mind by the reading of Spaulding's manuscript.

The object of Mr. S. in writing the "Manuscript Found," as I understood, was to employ an invalid's life by imagination, and to support a romantic history of those lost races or tribes, whose true history remains buried with their dust beneath those mysterious mounds so common in a large portion of our country.

Its publication seemed to be an after thought most likely suggested by pecuniary embarrassment. My recollection is that Mr. S. had left a transcript of the manuscript with Mr. Patterson, of Pittsburgh, Pa., for publication, that its publication was delayed until Mr. S. would write a preface, and in the meantime the transcript was spirited away and could not be found. Mr. S. told me that Sidney Higdon had taken it, or that he was implicated for it. Recollect distinctly that Higdon's name was used in that connection.

The longer I live the more firmly I am convinced that Spaulding's MS. was appropriated and largely used in getting up the Book of Mormon. I believe, that leaving out of the book the portion that may be easily recognized as the work of Joe Smith and his accomplices that Solomon Spaulding may be truly said to be its author. I have not a doubt of it.

SIDNEY RIGDON.

A Report of a Lecture He Delivered Forty Years Ago in Meadville—Rigdon's Account of Joe Smith's Revelation.

To the Editor of the Pittsburgh Telegraph:

I observe that several papers besides the TELEGRAPH notice the late Sydney Rigdon. Rigdon was a curious genius, more knave than fool. I will never forget the first and only time that I was ever in his company. A friend had purchased a farm upon Sugar Creek, Crawford county, who wished me to go up to Meadville for him, and have the title examined, and if all right, to make the first payment upon it. This was about the middle of March, 1836. While in Meadville flaming posters were placed all over the town stating that at a certain hour, at the Court House, Sidney Rigdon would deliver a discourse upon Mormonism and how Joe Smith became the Mormon prophet. Upon arriving at the Court House, I found myself somewhat late, as Mr. Rigdon was upon his feet and speaking. The audience was large, and he was telling it a wonderful rignmarole of an eagle arising in the East and flying to the West, and of the nor of Ephraim breaking the staff of Jacob, &c., when the people got restless and broke in with, "Mr. Rigdon, we want to hear all about the Mormon bible, and where Joe Smith got it."

Mormon church, Sidney Rigdon, died last week in Allegany county, N. Y., aged eighty-four. The deceased was formerly a printer, and carried on business in this city. He was born in St. Clair township, this county, on the 19th of February, 1794. In 1813 Solomon Spaulding, the author of the original Mormon bible, who resided, and is interred, in Washington county, put the manuscript in the office in which Rigdon was at work, for publication. Rigdon made a copy of the manuscript. After Rigdon had quitted the printing business he became a Baptist preacher, and for a time was pastor of the First Baptist church at Third avenue and Grant street. Becoming dissatisfied with the faith, he with Alexander Campbell and a Mr. Church, of this city, formed the "Campbellite" or "Christian" church, which at one time had a considerable number of adherents in this section of the country. Some time afterward he went to Ohio and organized a congregation according to the new faith. While there he met Elder Parley Pratt, of the Mormon church, in debate, and becoming worsted joined the Mormon church, and took his congregation with him. They went to Courtland, Ohio, where a Mormon congregation was organized.

From there they were forced to go to western Missouri, and finally by persecutions were driven to Nauvoo. There Mr. Rigdon staid until within six or seven months of Joe Smith's death, when, becoming dissatisfied with polygamy, he returned to Pittsburgh. Hearing of Smith's death, and that he was appointed his successor, Mr. Rigdon returned to Nauvoo. On the day appointed for choosing Smith's successor, Mr. Rigdon told the congregation that if he was elected he would not only prohibit polygamy; but expel every one who practiced it. He then asked the audience, if they desired to have him for president, that each man hold up his right hand. Not a hand was raised. Brigham Young then told the audience that he was Smith's successor, and if elected he would carry out his ideas. He was unanimously elected. Mr. Rigdon again returned to Pittsburgh and tried to establish a church. Not succeeding he moved to the Genesee valley, N. Y., and there remained up to the time of his death, a period of about thirty years. After abandoning his religious ventures he devoted himself to the study of geology, and supported himself in a great measure by lecturing on that science.

ORSON HYDE.

Orson Hyde is another of the original disciples of Joseph Smith, at Nauvoo. He is a strong, well-favored man, a good preacher, and came originally from Nauvoo, with Brigham, Heber, &c. (now dead) Lorenzo Snow, &c.

when he said: "Well, I will tell you all about it. Joe Smith some few years previous was a poor boy who, to earn a living, herded cattle in Ontario county, New York. He was a good boy, and one day while herding cattle he fell into a trance, when the angel Gabriel appeared to him and told him that he was the chosen of God, appointed to be His prophet to reveal mysteries to the world that had been kept hidden to the present time, and for him to go to a particular spot, which he designated and dig, that he would there find a revelation from God, which he was to proclaim to the world. Joe, when he awoke, was so forcibly impressed with the heavenly vision that he started off directly for a mattock and shovel, and went to work at the place. After getting down about waist deep Joe came to a nice square stone box. The four sides and bottom were each eighteen inches square. The top was wider, projecting an inch or so over the sides, so as to throw off water. In the center was a large iron ring into which a man could comfortably put his hand. After clearing out all the earth from around it, Joe lay hold of the ring to pull it out and get it up; but there was no move to it. Joe tugged and tugged and tugged [his exact words] but move it wouldn't. When he raised himself up out of the hole and threw himself down upon his face to wonder over its stubbornness, the fact came to his remembrance that the angel told him that he was to take up the box when he was exactly twenty-one years of age, and that that day he was only twenty. So Joe turned to and filled up the hole and carried back his shovel and his hoe and waited another year with great patience, until the eventful hour arrived when he returned in rejoicing. The earth was again taken out of the hole, the box cleared off, and he again laid hold of the ring, when (with a graceful wave of his right hand, making a circle in the air, bringing it down past his face to his left side), it just came up like that."

When the box was once safe upon deck every one then was anxious to hear what was in it, when we were told that it contained fourteen gold plates, covered with mysterious characters, together with the sword of Gideon and the spectacles of Samuel the prophet! Joe, he said, was a very illiterate man, was unable either to read or write; but when he put on his nose the prophet's spectacles, and took the gold plates one by one, letter by letter and word by word presented themselves, and with the aid of an amanuensis the Bible that he held in his hand was a literal translation of the writing upon the gold plates.

As a good many were putting questions to Sydney, the writer's question to him was, "Had he seen the contents of the mysterious box, and what kind of a sword was it that could be packed away in an eighteen inch box?" But Sydney had seen nothing. "But here," he said, turning to the back of the Bible, "are the sworn statements of those who have seen it." To the question, "What eventually became of the box?" we were told that Joe, after having had the mysteries that he was to proclaim translated into English, packed away everything again in the box and put it back where he got it.

As the programme stated that Sidney, like the Apostles of old, was to address us, "in tongues," at this stage of the proceedings a sharp, little man to my right, in spectacles, who, I was afterwards told, was a professor in Allegheny College, said, "Mr. Rigdon, I believe you to be a good German and Greek scholar, and after you have spoken to us in those languages, I want you to speak to us in five or six other languages; giving a list of them." This proposition was a stumper which closed up poor Sydney, who, after looking all around him, declared us to be such a set of unbelievers that he wouldn't open his mouth to us again that day, and he sat down with his head upon his breast. Then a lawyer to my left, said to be called Potter, put his hand in his coat tail pocket and brought out a handful of shelled corn, which he flung all around Sidney's head and shoulders, but Sydney neither looked up nor moved. An old gentleman with a small Bible in his hand, called Col. Cochran, here arose, and after a word to the audience, pitched into Sydney. "To think," he said, "that a man who had once been a minister of God joining with an impostor to delude the simple and weakminded that he might be a big and looked up to man among them, is horrible!"

Sydney bore a long, exhorting address without ever looking up or speaking. I left him surrounded by a volunteer guard, who promised to see him off without letting him be mobbed. As Brigham Young has had a great many "latter day revelations," I thought that I would give you Joseph Smith's first one, as told by Sidney Rigdon.

Remarkable local testimony has been discovered by the Republican sustaining the charge that the religion of Joe Smith and Brigham Young had its origin in a romance written by Rev. Solomon Spaulding of Ohio half a century or more ago. The story is furnished by Mr. J. A. McKinstrey, of Longmeadow, a son of the late Dr. McKinstrey of Monson, and grandson of Rev. Mr. Spaulding. Mr. McKinstrey is employed in the Main street store of Newsdealer Brace. Rev. Mr. Spaulding's widow, who afterward became Mrs. Davidson, came East from Ohio to live with her daughter at Monson many years ago, bringing his manuscript of his romance with her. She died some twenty-five years ago, but before her death a plausible young man from Boston came to Monson to see and get the Spaulding writing. It was a time of considerable excitement concerning the Mormons, and he claimed to represent some Christian people who wanted to expose Mormonism. He therefore begged the loan of the manuscript for publication. Much against the wishes of Mrs. Dr. McKinstrey, Mrs. Davidson consented to let her husband's unpublished romance go. Nothing was ever heard from it again, and the family have always considered that the bland young gentleman was an agent of Brigham Young's to destroy this convicting evidence that Joe Smith's Mormon Bible was of very earthly origin.

The story of how the Rev. Mr. Spaulding came to prepare his romance, which Mr. McKinstrey remembers as a child to have seen, is fresh and interesting. He was out of the active ministry in Ohio—the name of the place Mr. McKinstrey does not recollect, but it was near Palmyra, we ating wide interest, the implements of cookery and war being unearthed, showing the existence of a forgotten race. This furnished the inspiration for the chronicles of the story-writer. He entitled his production "Manuscript Found," the idea being that the romance woven by the ex-preacher was dug out of one of the mounds in the region. It was a history of ancient Americans, not all written at once, but as leisure spells and the fancy fell to him Mr. Spaulding would add to it. His writing was no secret in the neighborhood. In that then frontier region, with few opportunities for literary enjoyment, Rev. Mr. Spaulding was prevailed upon to read his production to his neighbors as it progressed. It was written in Bible phraseology, and made as quaintly olden as possible, so as to carry out the conceit of its alleged mound origin. Among the attentive listeners at these readings were Joe Smith and Sidney Rigdon, the same who founded Mormonism. Not only did Smith hear the manuscript read, but on one occasion, as Mrs. Davidson frequently testified before her death, he borrowed it for a week or so, giving as a reason that he wanted to read it to his family, who had been unable to attend on Mr. Spaulding's readings. Not long afterward, it will be remembered, Smith claimed that an angel had revealed to him the existence of a buried history of aboriginal America, the plates of which it is alleged were dug up, and the book of Mormon made as a translation of their inscriptions. The widow of Mr. Spaulding and her daughter, Mrs. Dr. McKinstrey, of Monson, compared the Smith Bible with the parson's romance, and they were essentially the same. The similarity was so overwhelming as to leave no doubt that Smith copied in full Rev. Mr. Spaulding's writing, and made out of it bodily his divine "revelation."—[Springfield (Mass.) Republican.

BRIGHAM YOUNG.

Brigham Young is a venerable, silver-haired man of seventy-six. He has fifteen real wives, not counting Ann Eliza, and is spiritually sealed to several hundred. He has had seventy-five children, forty-five of whom are living, and four or five hundred grandchildren. He says he don't pretend to "keep track" of his grandchildren at all.

Are the Mormons increasing?

Yes—rapidly. They now extend from Idaho, through Utah and Arizona down into New Mexico. The Prophet says his people now number 150,000. That they double once in six years. He says there will be 300,000 Mormons in 1882 and 600,000 in 1888.

THE following work was undertaken with reluctance, at the earnest solicitation of a great number of friends, who had, with the author, long looked upon the subject of which it treats, with mingled feelings of abhorrence and pity—the Impostors and their victims of delusion, were viewed through these two different media. The truth, and the whole truth, have been his constant aim : But the difficulty of procuring, or arriving at the whole truth, in relation to a religious imposition, which has from its birth been so studiously veiled in secrecy, and generally under a belief that the judgments of God would follow any disclosures of what its votaries had seen or heard—will be readily discovered. He fears, therefore, that the half is yet untold. He has, in all his enquiries, endeavored to pay the most rigid regard to all the ordinary methods of eliciting truth, from every source within his reach. If he shall have failed in his desires and exertions, in any important particular, it will be a matter of regret. That his statements should fully escape censure or contradiction, by a sect whose foundation was falsehood, and which has been built up of the same material, is more than he can expect. He is fully persuaded, nevertheless, that sufficient, and more than sufficient, has been developed by unimpeachable testimony, to satisfy every rational person, whose mind has not already been prostrated by the machinations of the Impostors, that the Supreme Being has had as little agency in the prosperity of Mormonism, as in the grossest works of Satan.

INTRODUCTION.

OF all the impositions which "flesh is heir to," none ought to be more abhorred or dreaded, than those which come in the garb of sanctity and religion : But that none are more ardently seized upon and cherished, by a certain portion of mankind, all history goes to substantiate. Absurdities, like comets, move in orbits both eccentric and peculiar. At one time they are obscured and lost in distance ; then again they are to be seen shining with a full face, frightening silly mortals from their sphere, and turning into chaos the majesty of mind. Astronomy has scarcely taught us to foretel the appearance of the one ; but metaphysics will enable us to calculate the periodical return of the other, when it shall have enabled us to fathom the abysses of the human mind, and discover the springs of human action.

There is nothing more curious than the connection between passion and credulity—and few things more humiliating and extraordinary, than the extent to which the latter may be carried, even in minds of no vulgar order, when under the immediate influence of any strong interest or excitement. It is also true that we have frequently to encounter a perverse incredulity, and a callous insensibility to evidence, when we attempt to convince any one of what is contrary to his opinions, wishes or interests. But this is only another exemplification of the remarkable fact, that where any object, whether desirable, detestable, or dreadful, agitates the mind to a certain degree, our belief is very far from being regulated by the weight of testimony. In such a frame of mind, men are not in a situation to listen to the suggestions of sober reason ; their attention is rivited to one particular view ; they form their opinions with seeming deliberation, from circumstances which would be little regarded by minds of a sounder state, but which, seen through the medium of a distorted imagination, appear with an overpowering magnitude ; and in fact, if a deep impression is made by any recital seriously delivered, or by any idea whose falsehood is not manifest, the strength of the impression is very apt to be mistaken for a sure proof of its reality. Even in cases where the greatest calmness and deliberation might be expected, and among those whose profession it is to investigate truth—the ambition of founding a sect, or displaying intellectual superiority—the veneration for great names, or long established opinions—and the anxiety to penetrate into the mysteries of nature—have sometimes produced, not modest querists and patient inquirers, but zealous preachers and zealous believers of the most fanciful creeds of philosophy ; about the influence of the stars ; the whirlpools that guide the planets in their course ; about the concavity or internal regions of the earth ; and about the formation of the skull as furnishing a sure index to the passions and propensities.

If such dreams are indulged in the calm investigation of philosophy, what are we to expect when the mind is dazzled by supernatural objects, animated by supernatural hopes, and pressed upon the understanding by supernatural terrors? Our wonder therefore ceases, that mankind apparently delight in being misled by the grossest delusions ; that the pure truths of Christianity are so strangely mingled with the wildest fancies that can be imagined by the lunatic, or invented by the designing knave.

“Every age of the world has produced impostors and delusions. Jannes and Jambres withstood Moses, and were followed by Pharaoh, his court and clergy. To say nothing of the false prophets of the Jewish age, the diviners, sooth-sayers, the magicians, and all the ministry of idols among the Gentiles, by which the nations were so often deceived, the Impostors which have appeared since the Christian era, would fill volumes of the most lamentable details. The false Messiahs which have afflicted the the Jews since their rejection of Jesus Christ, have more than verified the predictions of the "true and faithful witness." No less than twenty-four distinguished false Messiahs have disturbed the Jews. Many were deceived, and myriads lost their lives through their impostures. Some peculiar epochs were more distinguished for the number and impudence of those Impostors. If the Jews had fixed upon any year as likely to terminate their dispersion, and as the period of their return, that year rarely failed to produce a Messiah. Hence in the 12th century, no less than ten false Messiahs appeared. Numerous have been the impostors among Christians, since the great apostacy began ; especially since and at the time of the reformation. Munzer, Stubner and Stork were conspicuous in the 16th century. These men taught that among Christians, who had the precepts of the Gospel to guide them, and the spirit of God to direct them, civil offices and laws were not only unnecessary, but an unlawful encroachment upon their spiritual liberty ; that all Christians should put their possessions into common stock ; and that polygamy was not incompatible with either the Old or New Testaments. They related many visions and revelations which they had from above, but failing to propagate their doctrines by these means, they attempted to enforce them by arms. Many Catholics joined them, and in the various insurrections which they effected, one hundred thousand souls are said to have been sacrificed.

"Since the millennium became a subject of much speaking and writing, Impostors have been numerous. In the memory of the present generation, many delusions have been propogated and received, to a considerable extent. The Shakers, styling themselves the "Millennium Church," a sect instituted by ANN LEE, in 1774, still maintain a respectable number. This "elect lady," as they sometimes styled her, was the head of the party, and gave them a new bible. They asserted that she spoke seventy-two different tongues, and conversed with the dead. Through her all blessings flowed to her followers. She appointed the sacred dance and the fantastic song ; and consecrated shivering, swooning, and falling down, acts of acceptable devotion. They hold all things in common, rank marriage among the works of the flesh, and forbid all sexual intercourse.

In 1792, Richard Brothers published a book of prophecies and visions, and an account of his daily intercourse with God, in London. He too had his followers ; and among them a member of the British Parliament, a profound scholar and one of the most learned men of his time. He even made a speech in the House of Commons, declaring his full belief in one of the craziest pieces of absurdity that was ever presented to a British populace.

Joanna Southcott, the most disgusting old hag that ever pretended to 'set up for herself,' in the business of blasphemy and dupe-making, was countenanced and encouraged by respectable and wealthy individuals in England ; who, not only believed in the divine origin of her ministration, but swallowed with most implicit faith, her "Dialogue with the Devil," a farrago of filthy licentiousness that would suffuse the face of a fisherwoman. By her arts of deception she succeeded in procuring the certificate of a respectable physician that she was pregnant of the Holy Ghost.

In Scotland a few years since, a Miss Campbell pretended to have come back from the dead, having the "gift of tongues," was believed in by many of the Clergy and Bar, and carried along with her a numerous train of lesser note. The pretensions of Jemima Wilkinson, the Barkers, Jumpers and Mutterers, of our own time and country, are also well remembered.

But at these things we only intended to hint, in this place, in order to prepare the mind for a detailed account of the more recent, more absurd, and, perhaps more extensive, delusion of MORMONISM. It will present in somewhat a new light, to the enquiring mind, the depths of folly, degradation and superstition, to which human nature can be carried. It will show that there is no turning a fanatic from his folly—that the distemper is more incurable than the leprosy—that the more glaring the absurdity, the more determined the tenacity of its dupes—and the more apparent you can render the imposture, the stronger become its advocates.

Our object, therefore, in the present undertaking, will not be so much to break the spell which has already seized and taken possession of great numbers of people in our enlightened country, as to raise a warning voice, to those who are yet liable, through a want of correct knowledge of the imposition, to be enclosed within its fetters.

We make no pretensions to literary merit, and anticipate adding but little to the common stock of useful information. What is related, is in a plain, unvarnished style ; such as we hope will be the more beneficial to those who are most usually obnoxious to religious impositions.

CHAPTER I.

CONTAINING A BRIEF SKETCH OF THE CHARCTERS OF THE MODERN PROPHET AND HIS FAMILY, AND SOME OF THE PRINCIPAL ACTORS IN THE IMPOSITION.

WITH the exception of their natural and peculiar habits of life, there is nothing in the character of the Smith family worthy of being recorded, previous to the time of their plot to impose upon the world by a pretended discovery of a new Bible, in the bowels of the earth. They emigrated from the town of Royalton, in the State of Vermont, about the year 1820, when Joseph, Jun. was, it is supposed, about 16 years of age. We find them in the town of Manchester, Ontario county, N. Y. which was the principal scene of their operations, till the year 1830. All who became intimate with them during this period, unite in representing the general character of old Joseph and wife, the parents of the pretended Prophet, as lazy, indolent, ignorant and superstitious—having a firm belief in ghosts and witches ; the telling of fortunes ; pretending to believe that the earth was filled with hidden treasures, buried there by Kid or the Spaniards. Being miserably poor, and not much disposed to obtain an honest livelihood by labor, the energies of their minds seemed to be mostly directed towards finding where these treasures were concealed, and the best mode of acquiring their possession. Joseph, Jun. in the mean time, had become very expert in the arts of necromancy, juggling, the use of the divining rod, and looking into what they termed a "peep-stone," by which means he soon collected about him a gang of idle, credulous young men, to perform the labor of digging into the hills and mountains, and other lonely places, in that vicinity, in search of gold. In process of time many pits were dug in the neighborhood, which were afterwards pointed out as the place from whence the plates were excavated. But we do not learn that the young impostor ever entered these excavations for the purpose of assisting his sturdy dupes in their labors. His business was to point out the locations of the treasures, which he did by looking at a stone placed in a hat. Whenever the diggers became dissatisfied at not finding the object of their desires, his inventive and fertile genius would generally contrive a story to satisfy them. For instance, he would tell them that the treasure was removed by a spirit just before they came to it, or that it sunk down deeper into the earth.

The extreme ignorance and apparent stupidity of this modern prophet, were, by his early followers, looked upon as his greatest merit, and as furnishing the most incontestible proof of his divine mission. These have ever been the ward-robe of impostors. They were even thrown upon the shoulders of the great prince of deceivers, Mohammed, in order to carry in his train the host of ignorant and superstitious of his time ; although he afterwards became a ruler of Nations. That the common advantages of education were denied to our prophet, or that they were much neglected, we believe to be a fact. His followers have told us, that he could not at the time he was "chosen of the Lord," even write his own name. But it is obvious that all those deficiencies are fully supplied by a natural genius, strong inventive powers of mind, a deep study, and an unusually correct estimate of the human passions and feelings. In short, he is now endowed with all the requisite traits of character to pursue most successfully the humbug which he has introduced. His address is easy, rather facinating and winning, of a mild and sober deportment, when not irritated. But he frequently becomes boisterous by the impertinence or curiosity of the skeptical, and assumes the bravado, instead of adhering to the meekness which he professes. His followers, of course, can discover in his very countenance all the certain indications of a divine mission.

For further illustrations of the character of the Smith family, the reader is referred to the numerous depositions and certificates attached to this work.

MARTIN HARRIS is the next personage of note in the Golden Bible speculation. He is one of the three witnesses to the truth of the book, having been shown the plates through the agency of an Angel, instead of the Prophet Joseph, who always had them in possession. Before his acquaintance with the Smith family, he was considered an honest, industrious citizen, by his neighbors. His residence was in the town of Palmyra, where he had accumulated a handsome property. He was naturally of a very visionary turn of mind on the subject of religion, holding one sentiment but a short time. He engaged in the new Bible business with a view of making a handsome sum of money from the sale of the books, as he was frequently heard to say. The whole expense of publishing an edition of 5000 copies, was borne by Martin, to secure the payment of which, he mortgaged his farm for $3000. Having failed in his anticipations about the sale of the books, (the retail price of which they said was fixed by an Angel at $1 75, but afterwards reduced to $1 25, and from that down to any price they could obtain) he adopted Smith as his Prophet, Priest and King. Since that time, the frequent demands upon Martin's purse have reduced it to a very low state. He seems to have been the soul and body of the whole imposition, and now carries the most incontestible proofs of a religious maniac. He frequently declares that he has conversed with Jesus Christ, Angels and the Devil. Christ he says is the handsomest man he ever saw ; and the Devil looks very much like a jack-ass, with very short, smooth hair, similar to that of a mouse. He says he wrote a considerable part of the book, as Smith dictated, and at one time the presence of the Lord was so great, that a screen was hung up between him and the Prophet ; at other times the Prophet would sit in a different room, or up stairs, while the Lord was communicating to him the contents of the plates. He does not pretend that he ever saw the wonderful plates but once, although he and Smith were engaged for months in deciphering their contents. He has left his wife to follow the fortunes of Smith. He has frequent fits of prophecy, although they are not held in very high repute among his brethren. A specimen of his prophetic powers we subjoin. They were written for the special information of a friend of his who placed them upon the wall of his office, and are in these words :

“Within four years from September 1832, there will not be one wicked person left in the United States ; that the righteous will be gathered to Zion, [Missouri,] and that there will be no President over these United States after that time.

MARTIN HARRIS.”

“I do hereby assert and declare that in four years from the date hereof, every sectarian and religious denomination in the United States, shall be broken down, and every Christian shall be gathered unto the Mormonites, and the rest of the human race shall perish. If these things do not take place, I will hereby consent to have my hand separated from my body.

MARTIN HARRIS.”

Martin is an exceedingly fast talker. He frequently gathers a crowd around him in bar-rooms and in the streets.— Here he appears to be in his element, answering and explaining all manner of dark and abstruse theological questions, from Genesis to Revelations ; declaring that every thing has been revealed to him by the "power of God." During these flights of fancy, he frequently prophecies of the coming of Christ, the destruction of the world, and the damnation of certain individuals. At one time he declared that Christ would be on earth within fifteen years, and all who did not believe the book of Mormon would be destroyed.

He is the source of much trouble and perplexity to the honest portion of his brethren, and would undoubtedly long since have been cast off by Smith, were it not for his money, and the fact that he is one of the main pillars of the Mormon fabric. Martin is generally believed, by intelligent people, to be laboring under a partial derangement ; and that any respectable jury would receive his testimony, in any case, of ever so trifling a nature, we do not believe ; yet, the subjects of the delusion think him a competent witness to establish miracles of the most unreasonable kind. But we leave him for the present.

OLIVER COWDERY comes next in the catalogue. He was also a chief scribe to the prophet, while transcribing, after Martin had lost 116 pages of the precious document, by interference of the Devil. An Angel also has shown him the plates, from which the book of Mormon proceeded, as he says. He is a blacksmith by trade, and sustained a fair reputation until his intimacy commenced with the money-diggers. He was one of the many in the world who always find time to study out ways and means to live without work. He accordingly quit the blacksmithing business, and is now the editor of a small monthly publication issued under the directions of the prophet, and principally filled with accounts of the spread of Mormonism, their persecutions, and the fabled visions and commands of Smith.

DAVID WHITMAR is the third special witness who signed the certificate with Harris and Cowdery, testifying to having seen plates. He is one of five of the same name and family who have been used as witnesses to establish the imposition, and who are now head men and leaders in the Mormonite camp. They were noted in their neighborhood for credulity and a general belief in witches, and perhaps were fit subjects for the juggling arts of Smith. David relates that he was led by Smith into an open field, on his father's farm, where they found the Book of plates lying upon the ground. Smith took it up and requested him to examine it, which he did for the space of half an hour or more, when he returned it to Smith, who placed it in its former position, alledging that it was in the custody of an Angel. He describes the plates as being about eight inches square, the leaves being metal of a whitish yellow color, and of the thickness of tin plates. The back was secured with three small rings of the same metal, passing through each leaf in succession; that the leaves were divided equidistant between the back and the edge, by cutting the plates in two parts, and again united with solder, so that the front might be opened, while the back part remained stationary and immovable, and was consequently a sealed book, which would not be revealed for ages to come, and which Smith himself was not permitted to understand. On opening that part of the book which was not secured by seals, he discovered inscribed on the aforesaid plates, divers and wonderful characters, some large and some small, but beyond the wisdom of man to understand without supernatural aid; this account is sometimes partly contradicted by Harris.

CHAPTER II.

THE GOLDEN BIBLE AND ITS CONTENTS.

The various verbal accounts, all contradictory, vague, and inconsistent, which were given out by the Smith family respecting the finding of certain Gold or brazen plates, will be hereafter presented in numerous depositions which have been taken in the neighborhood of the plot.— Since the publication of the book they have been generally more uniform in their relations respecting it. They say that some two years previous to the event taking place, Joseph, Jun. began his interviews with Angels, or spirits, who informed him of the wonderful plates, and the manner and time of obtaining them. This was to be done in the presence of his wife and first child, which was to be a son. In the month of September, 1827, Joseph got possession of the plates, after a considerable struggle with a spirit. The remarkable event was soon noised abroad, and the Smith family commenced making proselytes among the credulous, and lovers of the marvellous, to the belief that Joseph had found a record of the first settlers of America. Many profound calculations were made about the amount of their profits on the sale of such a book. A religious speculation does not seem to have seriously entered into their heads at that time. The plates in the mean time were concealed from human view, the prophet declaring that no man could look upon them and live. They at the same time gave out that, along with the plates, was found a huge pair of silver spectacles, altogether too large for the present race of men, but which were to be used, nevertheless, in translating the plates.

The translation finally commenced. They were found to contain a language not now known upon the earth, which they termed "reformed Egyptian characters." The plates, therefore, which had been so much talked of, were found to be of no manner of use. After all, the Lord showed and communicated to him every word and letter of the Book. Instead of looking at the characters inscribed upon the plates, the prophet was obliged to resort to the old "peep stone," which he formerly used in money-digging. This he placed in a hat, or box, into which he also thrust his face. Through the stone he could then discover a single word at a time, which he repeated aloud to his amanuensis, who committed it to paper, when another word would immediately appear, and thus the performance continued to the end of the book.

Another account they give of the transaction, is, that it was performed with the big spectacles before mentioned, and which were in fact, the identical Urim and Thumim mentioned in Exodus 28—30, and were brought away from Jerusalem by the heroes of the book, handed down from one generation to another, and finally buried up in Ontario county, some fifteen centuries since, to enable Smith to translate the plates without looking at them!

Before the work was completed, under the pretence that some persons were endeavoring to destroy the plates and the prophet, they relate that the Lord commanded them to depart into Pennsylvania, where they could proceed unmolested. Smith, accordingly, removed his family thither; but it appears that it was at the request of his father-in-law, instead of the command of the Lord. A box, which he said contained the plates, was conveyed in a barrel of beans, while on the journey. Soon after this, his father-in-law, Mr. Isaac Hale, on account of his daughter, agreed to sell Smith a part of his farm, provided he would go to work and quit his impositions. He said he had given up his former occupation, and concluded to labor for a living. But, in a few weeks Harris made his appearance there, and soon after Cowdery, and Smith again commenced looking into the hat, and telling off his bible. In the mean time, Satan had made an assault upon Harris, and robbed him of one hundred and sixteen pages of the bible, which had been translated. Cowdery was the chosen scribe to complete the work ; after which the plates were again buried up by the command of the Lord, in a place unknown to the prophet or any other person.

The Golden Bible was finally got ready for the press, and issued in the summer of 1830, nearly three years from the time of its being dug up. It is a book of nearly six hundred pages, and is, unquestionably, one of the meanest in the English, or any other language. It is more devoid of interest than any we have ever seen. It must have been written by an atheist, to make an experiment upon the human understanding and credulity. The author, although evidently a man of learning, studied barrenness of style and expression, without an equal. It carries condemnation on every page. The God of Heaven, that all-wise Being, could never have delivered such a farrago of nonsense to the world. But we must proceed to examine it more in detail. The title page says :—

“The Book of Mormon, an account written by the hand
 “of Mormon, upon plates taken from the plates of Nephi ; “wherefore it is an abridgment of the record of the people
 “of Nephi, and also of the Lamanites, which are a rem“nant of the house of Israel, and also to Jew and Gentile ;
 “written by way of commandment, and also by the spirit
 “of prophecy and of revelation : written and sealed up,
 “and hid up unto the Lord, that they might not be destroy“ed ; to come forth by the gift and power of God, unto

“the interpretation thereof; sealed by the hand of Moroni, “and hid up unto the Lord, to come forth in due time by “the way of the Gentiles; the interpretation thereof, by “the gift of God; an abridgment taken from the book of “Ether.”

“Also, which is a record of the people of Jared, which “were scattered at the time the Lord confounded the lan“guage of the people, when they were building a tower to “get to Heaven, which is to show unto the remnant of the “house of Israel, how great things the Lord has done for “their fathers; and that they may know the covenants of “the Lord, that they are not cast off forever; and also to “the convincing of Jews and Gentiles, that Jesus is the “Christ, the Eternal God, manifesting himself to all na“tions—And now if there be fault, it be the mistake of “men; wherefore condemn not the things of God, that ye
 “may be found spotless at the judgment seat of Christ.”

“By Joseph Smith, Jun. Author and proprietor.”

It is necessary that the reader should constantly bear in mind, that the impostor is held out to be a very ignorant person, so much so, that he can write nothing except it be dictated to him, word by word, by the mouth of the Lord. Here then we have a specimen of a title page according to infinite wisdom; constituting Joseph Smith, Jun. “Author and proprietor,” in order that he may have the sole profit of the work. Although the Mormon may have a faculty of pointing out examples, and proving every thing by scripture, we think it will trouble them to find an instance where the Great Jehovah has ever sent a message to fallen man, and that in the most miraculous way; and constituted any individual its retailer, and sole sharer of its profits! But we are told that “the ways of God are past finding out,” and he has therefore given to Joseph Smith a “copy right” to sell this last message, and that too from under the hand and seal of "R. R. Lansing, clerk of the Northern District of New York."

But a saving clause is inserted in the title page, and several times repeated in the book. It seems that neither the Lord or Smith, were willing to avow themselves the authors of the whole fable: "and now if there be fault, it be in the mistake of men"!!! Here then we have an acknowledgment that there may be faults, a bundle of truths and falsehoods, sent forth to imperfect man, without a single rule being given to distinguish one from the other!!! Oh! the credulity of man!

The real author, notwithstanding his studied ignorance, was well acquainted with the classics. The names of most of his heroes have the Latin termination of i, such as Nephi, Lehi, and Moroni. The word Mormon, the name given to his book, is the English termination of the Greek word "Mormoo," which we find defined in an old, obsolete Dictionary, to mean "bug-bear, hob-goblin, raw head, and bloody bones." It seems, therefore, that the writer gave his book not only a very appropriate, but classical name. His experiment upon the human mind, he thought, would be more perfect, by giving it a name, in addition to its contents, which would carry upon its very face the nature of its true character—a fiction of hob-goblins and bug-bears.

Next comes the "Preface," signed "the Author," which shows that the Lord was willing to approve and adopt the most modern plan of making books, by inserting a title page, copy right, and a preface. The substance of the preface is, that the author had translated one hundred and sixteen pages from the plates of Lehi, written by the hand of Mormon, which were stolen by some persons; "and being commanded by the Lord, that I should not translate the same over again, for Satan had put it into their “hearts to tempt the Lord their God, by altering their “words, that they did read contrary from that which I “translated, and caused to be written; and if I should “bring forth the same again, they would publish that “which they had stolen, and Satan would stir up the hearts “of this generation, that they might not receive this work;

“but behold the Lord said unto me, I will not suffer that “Satan shall accomplish his evil design in this thing :
“therefore shalt thou translate from the plates of Nephi, “until you come to that which ye have translated, which “ye have retained, and behold ye shall publish it as the “record of Nephi; and thus I will confound those who “have altered my words.”

The facts respecting the lost manuscript, we have not been able to ascertain. They sometimes charged the wife of Harris with having burnt it; but this is denied by her. They were, however, taken from the possession of Harris, by a miracle wrought by Satan. The prophet has undertaken to inform the reader how the Lord got him out of this dilemma : “thou shalt translate from the plates of Nephi until thou come to that which ye have translated, which ye have retained, and behold ye shall publish it as the record of Nephi.” Here the Lord, in order to counteract the works of the Devil, is represented by Smith as palming off upon the world an acknowledged falsehood,—the records of Lehi must be published as the records of Nephi. Again, how could Smith know when he came to that which he had translated, without looking at the plates, (which he could not read if he did,) for he does not pretend that there was any miracle in this operation. But who, except one fully endued with the folly and wickedness of “the author,” can believe for a moment, that the Lord would make known his will in such language. Again; an important record which had been made by a miracle, kept for ages by a miracle, dug from the ground by a miracle, and translated by a miracle, was stolen by some one, so that even a miracle could not restore it; and thus were the designs of the Lord counteracted by "Satan putting it into their hearts to tempt the Lord."

CHAPTER III.

"The Book of Mormon," is divided into a number of books, each one purporting to have been written by different individuals upon plates of brass, so far as the history of Lehi, the founder of the vast settlements which were situated on the isthmus of Darien, were concerned; and upon plates of gold, so far as it relates to one Jared and his posterity, who were not confounded at the destruction of Babel, but were miraculously navigated by the hand of the Lord across the ocean. The history of Lehi and his posterity, commences in the reign of Zedekiah, King of Judah, six hundred years before the Christian era, and ends about four hundred years afterwards, which concludes the history, or fiction. The whole work is written in a miserable attempt to imitate the style of king James the first, and the sameness is such, and the tautology of phrases from the beginning to the end of the work, that no one can be left in doubt in identifying the whole with one individual author. We are not aware that the style of king James is better calculated to reveal the will of Heaven, than is the modern and more refined language ; but is a strong evidence against the work now under our consideration. If God chose to reveal himself, it would be reasonable to expect that it would be done definitely, and in such language as could be clearly understood by all ; and why this long circumlocution^u of history ? it has nothing to do with salvation. Christ, nor the inspired writers of the new testament, furnish no such example ; the bare facts of the plan of redemption is set before us, and a few self evident rules to govern our moral conduct.

The first book is entitled "the book of Nephi," and commences its narrative with the departure of Lehi from Jerusalem. He had four sons, Laman, Lemuel, Sam, and Nephi ; the last of whom is the principal hero in the present book, and the historian. He is a scholar, an engraver, and a worker of metals ; for he says : "Behold I make an abridgment of the record of my father, upon plates of brass, which I have made with mine own hands ; wherefore, after that I have abridged the record of my father, then will I make an account of mine own life." Lehi dreams marvelous dreams previous to his departure from Jerusalem, and sees wonderful visions. He goes about prophecying of the great calamities that await the Jews, and warns them to flee from the wrath to come. The people become vindictive at his clamor, and threaten his destruction.

To rescue Lehi, and to bring about wonderful events, God warns him to flee into the wilderness, and leave all his great possessions, his gold and his silver, and take nothing with him but his family, his tents, and provisions. A miserable condition for the wilderness indeed ; no clothing, no weapons, nor tools to make them with.

The command is obeyed, and he travels until he arrives on the borders of the Red sea. The three elder brothers become disaffected, probably from their adversity and privations, and accuse the father with being visionary, &c. Nephi represents himself as being a particular favorite with the Lord, (or his narrator does for him) for he says : " And it came to pass that I, Nephi, being exceeding young, nevertheless being large in stature, and also having great desires to know the mysteries of God," &c. God blesses him, and makes a covenant with him, and promises him a choice land, which is above all others.—p. 9. Nephi is commanded by his father, together with his three brothers, to go back to Jerusalem, to the house of one Laban, who has in his possession a record of the Jews, engraven on plates of brass, as he is informed by the Lord in a dream ; and that it likewise contained the genealogy of his ancestors. Nephi is ready to obey, and by some little persuasion, the four brothers embark for the plates at Jerusalem. Laban, who has them in possession, refuses to give the plates to the ambassadors. But Nephi was not to be foiled. Two unsuccessful attempts are made, and, the third time, Nephi finds Laban drunk within the walls of the city, and says : " And I, Nephi, beheld his sword, and I drew it forth from the sheath thereof, and the hilt thereof was of pure gold, and the workmanship thereof was exceeding fine ; and I saw the blade thereof was of most precious steel." p. 12.

This is the earliest account of steel to be found in history. Alexander the Great, who lived about three hundred years after the period here spoken of, employed iron for points to his implements of war, as Josephus tells us ; and the same author says, that he complained that his weapons were so easily blunted ; now, if steel had been in use, either at Rome, Jerusalem, or Damascus, at the time here spoken of, in Alexander's time it would have been common, and he would have used it for his weapons instead of iron. Damascus was once famous for manufacturing swords, but it was long after the Christian era. A coarse kind of steel, or iron carbonated, was used in the days of Julius Cæsar, about one hundred years before Christ.

The covenant with Nephi gives him a choice land. And again he says that his father has obtained a promise from the Lord that he should have a choice land, p. 14. Whether these are separate lands, we are left to conjecture. If they are the same, one of the promises is gratuitous ; because when the Lord covenanted with Abraham, he promised him the land of Canaan, which should be inherited by his posterity forever. It is true, the covenant was renewed with Isaac ; but he was the rightful heir. If the Lord had have covenanted with Abraham, and with Isaac, for a land, we should naturally infer that they were different countries, especially if the covenant had been made with Isaac first. Nephi says the promise of the choice land, is to him, exclusively, as can be seen on page 9 ; consequently each have a separate land. But the sequel of the fiction informs us, that they all embark into one ship,—land on this side of the Atlantic, and dwell together until Lehi dies.

Nephi says, he drew forth the sword of Laban, and cut his head off, which enabled him afterwards to obtain the plates by false pretences and deception. Thus we see the author would have us believe, that the Lord sometimes accomplishes his designs by murder and lying.

Lehi receives the plates from his sons,—examines them, and finds to his great satisfaction, that he is a descendant from Joseph, the son of Jacob. “And now, when my father saw all these things, he was filled with the spirit, and began to prophecy concerning his seed ; that these plates of brass should go forth unto all nations, kindreds, tongues and people, which were of his seed. Wherefore, he said that these plates of brass should never perish, neither shall they be dimmed any more by time." p. 15.

The above plates have not been found; if they have, we have not been furnished with a translation.

Nephi, and his brethren, are again sent back to Jerusalem, to bring with them into the wilderness, a man by the name of Ishmael, and his family, which consists of daughters and sons enough, to furnish each family with husbands and wives. They all arrive in the wilderness, and very soon a quarrel ensues between the different individuals of the families, which Nephi settles in a most masterly manner; after which, the males of both families take wives, with which the provident author has kindly provided them.

The three next pages, to wit: 18, 19, and 20, are taken up in relating a marvelous dream, or vision, in which Laman and Lemuel are represented as being finally apostates, and would be cut off.

Nephi informs us, that he is at that time employed in engraving, or writing, on the plates, which he now names after himself; and whether the plates of Laban are included, we are not told, nor are we informed how they were disposed of. The plates, hereafter, are called the plates of Nephi. p. 21.

A little further, on the same page, he says he has a commandment from the Lord, to make plates for the special purpose of making a record of his own ministry, and of his own people.

Here our hero introduces himself as a minister, and as having the charge of a people—he is in the wilderness destitute of any thing, nothing but tents and provisions, every thing was left behind, gold, silver, no metals or tools as a matter of course, but the command to make his plates is obeyed. We shall be compelled to institute a chapter of miracles in order to account for the manner of making brass plates in the wilderness, without tools or metals, and likewise to satisfy our readers upon many other points in our review. Miracles will account for any thing, however ridiculous, whenever our minds preponderate in favor of the subject to which the story may be attached. Any thing, however preposterous and false it may be, if believed to be of divine origin, needs no evidence, because nothing is impossible with Deity.

Lehi comes out with a marvelous prophecy, considering the period in which it is made ; not so much on account of the prophecy as the language, in which he uses to express it. After the doctrine of the fall is explained, he speaks of the Messiah, and calls John by name, and quotes the words from Isaiah, or Matthew's gospel : " Prepare ye the way of the Lord : make his paths straight ;" and continues, " for there standeth one among you, whom ye know not ; and he is mightier than I, whose shoes' latchet I am not worthy to unloose."—John I. 26—7. Here is another miracle in choosing the exact language of King James' translation, more than two thousand years before it was arranged, and six hundred before the sentiment was uttered. The plan of redemption is explained at the same time, and the only way of salvation proclaimed ; consequently the law was abrogated at that time, and the Nephites were christians. The prophets of the old testament, doubtless, had very clear views of the promised Messiah, and of the atonement through his blood. But that they preached the law, and felt themselves bound by it, we never entertained a doubt. In the wise dispensations of God, man was not to avail himself of the redeeming doctrines of the gospel, until the time was fully come, when Christ was to appear to fulfil the law, and offer mercy through grace. Christ must appear on earth—die, and be raised from the dead, before all was fulfilled, as the sacred writers understood it, and taught the disciples, and the world of mankind. If it were possible for the plan of redemption to have been unfolded, without the actual appearance of Christ in the flesh, why did not the patriarchs with whom God made his covenants, and his promises, preach redemption through the atonement, instead of sacrifices and ceremonies? But we are informed by this same prophet Lehi, that "all mankind was in a lost, and in a fallen state; and ever would be, save they should rely on this Redeemer." p. 22. From the last paragraph, the author views the matter in the same light with us, that is, that the Christian religion was revealed and made known to the Nephites, six hundred years before the advent of Jesus Christ. Lehi speaks by the power of the Holy Ghost, which power he received by faith on the son of God. 'And the son of God was the Messiah.' Let us compare the above sentiments with the declarations and views of the inspired writers of the New Testament. "But when the comforter is come, whom I will send unto you from the father," &c. John XV. 26. From this we should infer, that the Holy Ghost was yet in anticipation, because he is promised; and to confirm our view of this subject, we will cite a few other passages. "It is expedient for you that I go away; for if I go not away the comforter will not come unto you." John XIV, 7. "And when he is come, he will reprove the world of sin, and of righteousness, and of judgment." John 16, 8. "But ye shall receive, after that the Holy Ghost has come upon you." Acts I, 8. In the second chapter of the Acts, we find all the above promises fulfilled.

Lehi continues his preaching, speaks of John and of the Virgin Mary, and calls her the "mother of God," and declares the way of salvation, by Jesus Christ, through faith and repentance. p. 25. All the prophets of old, were far behind our Lehi, and they prophecied falsely too, if our book of Mormon is true, according to our apprehension of the doctrines which they taught. If any one can reconcile the contradictions and incongruities between the sacred writings and Lehi's prophecies, we should be gratified to hear it, and will be among the first to acknowledge our misconceptions and error. We are among the last who would be willing to villify, and ridicule, any thing that is counted sacred, without the best evidence of its falsehood and imposition. We consider, and believe, the prophecies and doctrines of the Bible of divine origin, and any thing which contravenes its precepts, or its revelations, will be regarded by us as false.

Our hero, Nephi, next presents himself in the drama, as a dreamer and a prophet, and is more explicit as to particular incidents than his father. In his vision, he is made acquainted with all the particulars of our Savior's birth and life, to his baptism, which he witnesses, and sees the Holy Ghost descend in the form of a dove, and abide upon him. It is worthy of remark, that no circumstance is mentioned by Nephi, in relation to the life and ministry of our Savior, only what can be found in the New Testament. Very little is said by the evangelists of Jesus Christ, between the time of his birth and his entering upon the ministry. But we might expect some little incidents from such a revelation as the book of Mormon, which would throw some light upon that interesting subject, which is not to be found in the New Testament. It furnishes to us good evidence that the author was guided by the new Testament, when his low and licentious imagination conceived, and brought to light the "Book of Mormon." He could not, nor dared not, fabricate any thing, for fear of detection, which could not be found in the historical part of the sacred writings. But upon any thing which pertains to spiritual affairs, and is not susceptible of contradiction, only through the medium of reason, every licence is taken by our author.

Nephi's vision gives us a poor account of the corruptions of the Roman church, showing that the author understood very little of church History. The name of Jesus Christ is mentioned on page 28, and of John, the apostle, page 35. Nephi's vision takes up about ten pages, from page 25, and gives, as his own views, a cursory account of the popular doctrines which have been agitated since the Reformation. To give credit to the pretence, that Nephi, living six hundred years before the christian era, could, or would, have had the name of Jesus and of John revealed in preference to any other prophet, is repugnant to common sense, and in direct violence to the universal belief of those who have ever been distinguished for piety, and a critical knowledge of the holy Bible. Besides, we cannot reconcile a view of revealed truth, with a disquisition on Church scisms, such as we find in Nephi's vision. If the Book of Mormon is a revealed truth from God, we are compelled, irresistably, to conclude, that Paul was mistaken when he said the twelve apostles of the Lamb, developed certain secrets which were hid from ages and generations, and were ordained before the world to their glory, that they should have the honor of announcing them. But our author pretends that Nephi, together with sundry other prophets which he has created, had the whole christian system developed to them, many centuries before the twelve apostles, of which Paul speaks, had the honor of announcing it, and preached it to a set of Jews, who had been miraculously landed on, or near the Isthmus of Darien. Not only this, if we are to take the brass plate revelation for sacred truth, we must infer that there has been a great deficiency in the record of our Savior's mission, or that he did not exhibit his truths while here, as fully, and as clearly as he did to these Nephites, through their prophets; and consequently left the world in darkness, to grope their way in superstition and ignorance, until the mineral-rod neecremancy of Joseph Smith, Jun. searching after Robert Kidd's money, which was buried in Manchester, Ontario county, New York, found the plates of Nephi, which had been buried there one thousand four hundred and twenty-eight years. How long he kept them, we are not informed ; but they were taken from him, and hid up again by the Lord, so that no divination, nor legerdemain, will enable him to find them.

“ And it came to pass,” says Nephi, “ that the voice of the Lord spake unto my father, and commanded him, that on the morrow he should take his journey into the wilderness. And it came to pass, that as my father arose in the morning, and went forth to the tent door, to his great astonishment he beheld upon the ground, a round ball of curious workmanship ; and it was of fine brass. And within the ball were two spindles, and the one pointed the way whither we should go into the wilderness.” Which way the other pointed, we are not told, but probably the way they should not go. If this ball was a compass, as we are hereafter told by the author, many improvements have been made upon that instrument, except in the construction of the negative spindle, since that time. But what is most ridiculous, is, that it was a fine brass ball, and yet the spindles could be seen to traverse in the inside of it. Perhaps Lehi had a stone which favored his vision, and enabled him to look into opaque bodies as well as into futurity.

The revealing stone, and the stone spectacles, will hereafter be described, which will account for many wonderful things, without searching into the chapter of miracles.

From page 39 to 42, is principally taken up in giving an account of eight year's travels, following the direction of one of the spindles through the wilderness. It traversed eastwardly and southeastwardly, bringing them all safely on the borders of the Red sea, with the exception of Ishmael, who dies in the mean time.

Nephi is now commanded by the Lord, to repair to the top of a mountain, where he sees a vision, in which he is informed that he must build a ship, and where he can find ore from which to manufacture tools. We are now presented with our hero in a new character,—that of a ship-builder. So that in his youth he is a scholar, a historian, a worker of metals, a ship-carpenter, a prophet and a priest. It now seems that ore and tools are necessary, in order to construct a ship; but to make plates of brass, neither ore, tools, nor metals were essential. Six pages are next occupied in giving an account of quarrels between Nephi and his brethren. But Nephi, in the mean time, builds a ship contrary to the opinions of his brothers, and the rational inference is, that he makes his own tools out of ore, and builds the ship without assistance from any one. It requires some little stretch of credulity, to believe that Nephi done all the above work, such as making iron from ore, and converting it into steel, and then making the tools necessary to build a ship, without tools with which to do it. The manner in which he built the ship, he accounts for in the following language:—"Now I, Nephi, did not work the timbers after the manner of men, &c. but I did build it after the manner which the Lord did teach me." p. 47.—How long he was in accomplishing this great work, we cannot learn; but if all was done by a miracle, as the author intimates, we can see no necessity for any interference on the part of Nephi, but give to him the glory who accomplished the work.

The patriarch Noah, had special directions for building the ark, the kind of wood, &c., and he built it after the model given him, and he had many years in which to accomplish it. And we have good reason to believe that the work was done in the same manner as other ships were built, and that he employed workmen to aid him in it. Nephi arrogates to himself a great preference with the Lord, over the patriarch Noah.

Lehi, and all his host, after the ship is completed by our hero, go on board, and immediately embark for the promised land. But the wicked dispositions of Laman and Lemuel would not allow the crew to remain in peace. A mutiny takes place on ship board, and our hero and admiral was taken, and bound so tight that he could not move. But the Lord is represented as being on Nephi's side, and a remedy was at hand at once. The famous brass ball-compass ceased to traverse! "and they knew not whither to steer the ship, insomuch, that there arose a great storm, yea, a great and terrible tempest." We will leave the reader to draw the inference, whether the terrible storm arose from the abuse of Nephi, or, because the compass would not traverse! p. 48.

If the bare statement of a succession of miracles, such as have been recorded thus far in the Book of Mormon, unaccompanied by any testimony, or carrying with it any plausible probability of truth, entitles the work to the credit of Divine authenticity, we have already failed in our attempt to prove it a fiction. But we apprehend our readers will not receive the ridiculous story of Nephi, although it be clothed in the mantle of sanctity, without first instituting a critical enquiry, and comparing the probabilities with the sacred truths of Holy Writ.

We might have mentioned, that Lehi had two sons born in the wilderness, after he departed from Jerusalem. The eldest was called Jacob, and the other Joseph; these two sons are somewhat important personages in the como-tragedy hereafter.

To return to our crew. Finding the compass would not traverse, they get frightened, and set Nephi at liberty; the magnet again operates—the seas become calm—and every thing quiet. Whether the ship had sails, or was propelled by oars, or by a current, or by the will, or by the power of the spindle, we cannot inform our readers, for it is not stated. But Nephi, or the author, says that they all landed safely on the promised land.

“And it came to pass, that we did find upon the land of promise, as we journeyed in the wilderness, that there were beasts in the forest of every kind, both the cow and the ox.” p. 48. More miracles to substantiate the divine authenticity of the Book of Mormon. We had supposed that oxen were the result of a surgical operation upon bulls, changing their natures, in order to render them docile and useful to man; and nothing can be more ludicrous than to suppose the matchless power of the Almighty, had interfered with these animals in the wilderness, and caused the transformation of them as represented.

Nephi is again commanded to manufacture more plates to engrave upon, and in this land of promise materials are plenty. The art of making them without materials is probably lost. Gold, silver and copper ores are found, and no others mentioned, but brass plates can be made, doubtless, by Nephi out of gold, silver, and copper ores, as well as out of nothing, as he must have done before he navigated the tribe across the ocean. p. 50.

We are next presented with a recapitulation of the prophecies of Lehi, in relation to the coming of our Savior, together with a fictitious quotation from prophecies conceived by our author, and brought forth in his own miserable, barren style. “To be lifted up according to the words of Zenoch, and to be crucified, according to the words of Neum, and to be buried in a sepulchre, and according to the words of Zenos, which he spake concerning the three days of darkness,” Here we are presented with three new prophets, which were known to our hero, prophecy of the most important events which have ever transpired, or ever will. The last of which uttered a falsehood, because he speaks of three days of darkness at the time of the crucifixion. p. 51. The evangelists in the New Testament, state, that there was a darkness over the land from the sixth to the ninth hour, varying from three hours to three days. Profane history, likewise, corroborates the statement made by the evangelists. If such prophets as Zenoch, Neum, and Zenos, had ever existed, would not there have been some trace left, or allusion made, either in sacred or profane writing respecting them? The known characteristic of the Jews, from time immemorial, is conclusive evidence that these prophets are fictitious characters. The Jews have ever been distinguished for their tenacity to their traditions and religion. They have ever held their prophets in the highest veneration, particularly those who spake clearly of the coming Messiah.

We are now relieved by the author, from the coarse style in which the book is written, by the introduction of the 48th and 49th chapters of Isaiah, in the approved translation. To contrast the sublime style of the inspired writer, with the insipid and tasteless diction of the author of the Book of Mormon, requires more ability than we possess.

CHAPTER IV.

The marvelous always has something about it, to fascinate, however coarsely it may be clad ; and fiction has its charms, and when combined and presented to the mind in the mantle of inspiration, it is not singular that the credulous and unsuspecting should be captivated. This propensity for the marvelous in the human mind, is constantly leading them into error and delusion, and to it the fabricators of the new revelation are indebted for their success.

Our moral faculties are always improved by embracing simple philosophical truths, and, in proportion as we reject them, we become depraved, and less capable of discriminating between falsehood and error. He who embraces falsehood and error, will sink deeper and deeper in the vortex of folly and madness ; wild vagaries, apparitions, intercourse with the spirits of other worlds, and ten thousand other follies, will dance through his imagination in shapeless confusion. Realities are no longer a subject worthy his attention, but he is guided by the whims of his imagination, which he believes to be the breathing of the Holy spirit, and an internal revelation, and thus we find him enveloped in the fatal cords of fanaticism.

Our object is to unvail the deceptions, and impositions, which are now practised by the leaders of a sect which are called Mormons, or, as they have recently christened themselves, "Latter day Saints ;" and so place the Book, or Golden Bible, as it has been called, before the public, as to prevent any further deception. The subject of eternity is of infinite moment to all ; and each individual has sufficient capacity to embrace truth instead of error, provided the due exercises of the faculties are instituted. Then, when any subject is presented to us in the garb of religion, we ought carefully to investigate it, and compare it with the standard which should be our rule of faith and practice. The divine authenticity of the Book of Mormon, is the question now before us. Is it presented to us, accompanied with such conclusive testimony as entitles it to our implicit credit, and such as we should be willing to risk our eternal all upon? If any doubts hang over the subject, it is reasonable that a scrupulous search, and a critical enquiry be instituted by us.

Permit us to examine in what way the two above named chapters of Isaiah, became introduced in the modern version. The translation of King James is the one used. We believe the translation to be a correct one, and that the translators were guided by truth as far as human frailty would permit; but, at the same time, they were governed by the then existing rules of the English language, which now vary considerably. The rules which governed at the time the translation was made, are so far lost, that we presume a new one made at this period under our present rules, would vary the diction and phraseology very considerably, but not the true sense. We suppose that the object of the sacred writings, is to convey a definite meaning to the reader in his own language, without regard to words or phrases, and, consequently, if we were to receive a translation from the hand of the Lord at this time, we might rationally expect that it would appear in our own language, and not in that of King James' time, any more than in that of William the Conqueror. It is a remarkable coincidence that the author of our book should be able to give us an exact copy of those two chapters, reading them in a stone placed in a hat! We are truly inclined to accuse him of plagiarism, not only from the above circumstance, but because he attributes the authorship of the whole book to the Lord; and we cannot see why, if he could dictate such grand and lofty sentiments to Isaiah, together with the unparalleled figures, he could not have maintained a style and diction through the rest of the Book of Mormon, that would have appeared decent, and been somewhat in the language of the present time. Again we remark, that the beginning of the quotation commences with the chapter, and closes with the next chapter, which is, of itself, evidence that it was copied, because the division of the prophecies into chapters is both modern and arbitrary—the original furnishes no such arrangement. Then it would have been natural for an ignorant plagiarist to have blundered into that method of copying. If the two chapters had have been inserted in the author's language, at the same time preserving the sense strictly, there would have been more plausibility, and the deception not so easily detected. But the ignorance of the author led him to suppose that the translation was the only one that could be made, and that the division into chapters was done by Isaiah himself.

Nephi is represented as a wonderful prophet. He could prophecy what would be said, in the precise sentences, six hundred years afterwards, and so arrange and punctuate it, that a translator, by means of a stone which was prepared for that purpose, could, two thousand four hundred and thirty years afterwards, copy sentences which had been arranged about two hundred and twenty years previously, by a set of learned divines, assembled under the authority of James the first, king of England. There are no prophecies in the old Testament which compares with this; we deem it beyond the marvelous. In our examination of the prophecies in the old Testament, (which we suppose is not tantamount authority to the Golden Bible with a "latter day saint,") we are unable to find even an attempt made by the inspired authors to prophecy of the doctrines of our Saviour, in the words in which he would utter them. Besides, the evangelists themselves, who heard the wonderful sayings as he spake them, choose their own manner of expressing it. Each had his own peculiar style, and penned the sentiments in their own way. Our Savior uttered many prophecies, but in all he said he never attempted to represent the diction and phraseology which would be used on a future occasion. But our hero, Nephi, is made by the author to far surpass the Savior.

We are next presented with something like a sermon, in which the prophecies of the old Testament, (which, we presume, the author had by him,) is the matter of discussion and explanation. The Arian doctrine is denied, of which he, Nephi, has a prophetic knowledge, and instructs his readers after the popular doctrines of the present day. No particular denomination is sustained, but partakes of many, from which we suppose they had no articles of faith yet established ; but in the sequel they become Anabaptists. And thus ends the first "Book of Nephi."

The second Book of Nephi is introduced to the reader, by an attempt at a christian sermon, by Lehi, (Nephi having retired behind the curtain,) and in the course of his remarks, he makes several patriarchal promises to his sons ; all conditioned upon a faithful and implicit obedience to the requirements and commands of Nephi. Lehi preaches repentance and remission of sins. He expounds the law as it relates to original sin, and settles many of the leading points which are subjects of disputation between different denominations at the present day. p. 72. We will again, for the benefit of our readers, quote a remarkable passage, which the bold blasphemer has presumed to insert in his book, as matter revealed to him, and as having been penned by Nephi, nearly six hundred years before it actually was!!! “And by the law no flesh is justified. Behold, he offereth himself a sacrifice for sin.” “Which layeth down his life according to the flesh, and taketh it again by the power of the spirit, that he may bring to pass the resurrection of the dead, being the first that should rise.” p. 63.—

There are a variety of sermons in this discourse taken from the new Testament, somewhat garbled and transposed, and so varied as to suit the views of the writer, in his fictitious tenets.

Lehi next addresses his son Joseph, who was born in the wilderness, and reminds him of the commandments of the Holy one of Israel, and intimates that he is born for some great purpose. “For behold thou art the fruit of my loins; and I am a descendant of Joseph, which was carried captive into Egypt. And great was the covenants of the Lord which he made unto Joseph; wherefore Joseph truly saw our day. And he obtained a promise of the Lord, that out of the fruit of his loins the Lord God would raise up a righteous branch unto the house of Israel. Not the Messiah,” &c. He then goes on to explain the covenant, by representing himself, and his posterity, as the branch meant, to which the Messiah should be made manifest in the latter days. We next have a quotation from the prophecies of Joseph. “Yea Joseph truly said, thus saith the Lord unto me: a choice seer will I raise up out of the fruit of thy loins. And unto him will I give a commandment. p. 66. “And thus prophesied Joseph, saying:—Behold that Seer will the Lord bless; and they that seek to destroy him shall be confounded.” Behold I am sure of the fulfilling of this promise. And his name shall be called after me, and it shall be after the name of his father. Yea, thus prophesied Joseph.”—p. 67. Here is the prophecy which settles the matter as to Joseph Smith, Jun. He is, doubtless, from the lineage of Lehi, the father of the Nephites and the Lamanites, and a descendant of Joseph.—The Lamanites were all cursed by the Lord, and all marked and transformed into Indians. A curse was pronounced upon all who should ever mix with them. The Nephites warred with each other until they exterminated the whole race except three, who were immortalized. Whether the object of their immortality was to perpetuate the notable branch of Joseph by crim.con. we are left to conjecture.—We are not aware that Joseph ever uttered the above remarkable sentences. He held the highest standing among his brethren, and if he had ever made them, we have no doubt full credit would have been given to his sayings, and they would have been preserved by the Jews, and handed down to the latest posterity among them, well authenticated. But, the fact is, the whole is a base forgery, and he who attempted to palm it off as truth upon a credulous community, cannot but receive the frowns and punishments of a just God.

Again, on the same page, “And the Lord said unto me, also, I will raise up unto the fruit of thy loins ; and I will make for him a spokesman. And the spokesman of thy loins shall declare it.” This prophecy of Joseph is also fulfilled to the letter, in the person of Sydney Rigdon ; he is also from this same illegitimate race. It is true his name is not mentioned in the prophecy, but he fulfils the functions assigned him. Are not the circumstances mentioned in the prophecy, pointing out so plainly these two persons, Joseph Smith, Jun. and Sydney Rigdon, who are the founders, and are still the leaders among the Mormon fanatics, good grounds to infer that they were, at least, advisers, if not the authors, of the present form of the Book of Mormon ?

If they did not originally compose the book, they might easily, at the time of amending and copying, alter and insert the patent of their commissions, in order to give validity to their undertaking.

Joseph Smith, Jun. was well skilled in legerdemain, and the use of the divining-rods, which afforded him great facilities in translating. He doubtless had become acquainted with mystifying every thing, and collected that class of people about him, who were willing dupes, and anxious devotees to the marvelous. To establish the truth of any pretension, however ridiculous and absurd it might be, required nothing but some little necromancy, and it would be received as of divine inspiration by them.

In the conclusion of the present chapter, Lehi bestows his last benediction. "And now, blessed art thou Joseph. Behold thou art little." We think the mind of this little Joseph must have been quite precocious, to have comprehended the whole rigmarole which has been addressed to him. Not only this ; Nephi must have had a very tenacious memory, or have been a stenographer, in addition to his great literary attainments, in order to have engraved the oration of his father. The boy being little, perhaps might account for the circumlocution, and tautology, in the whole speech, if the whole book was not written in precisely the same words and phrases. The old and new Testaments are written in an ancient and very perfect style, and there is no doubt that, at the time it was written, it was in all respects, the most finished, and complete production, into which our language was capable of being modeled.— But many improvements, and innovations have been made in our vocabulary, since that period, which now renders the style, measurably, obsolete. A translation from the original Greek, in our present improved language, would be desirable, and, if it could be accomplished, many scisms would be abandoned, and sectarianism would be greatly diminated. We mention this, as an argument against the divine authenticity of the Book of Mormon. A few years have only elapsed, since the pretended translation of that work took place, and instead of its being given us in a chaste and clear style, it is the most miserable and barren of any thing we ever saw, in the form of a book. Would it not be reasonable to conclude, that any book, whose author was the Holy Ghost, would be clear and perfect in all its parts; so plain that the wayfaring man need not err? particularly if the translation and style be chosen and dictated by himself, as it is pretended that the book of Mormon was. But we are forbidden this test, otherwise the book would fall to the ground at once.

Nephi is the next person on the stage, and commences his harangue. He recapitulates his father's prophecies, and those of their ancestor, Joseph, in nearly the same language which Lehi used, and reminds the whole family of the promises in the covenant. Lehi is now old, and after he finishes his valedictory, gives up the ghost, and is buried. p. 69. The scene is now changed wholly. •Nephi is the Major-domo. Laman, Lemuel, and the sons of Ishmael, rebel against his authority; and Nephi is warned of the Lord to flee into the wilderness. A little previous, after the death of Lehi, Nephi is disconsolate, and a long soliloquy is penned, or engraved, upon the brass plates, which is principally patched up from detached sentences taken from Psalms and Jeremiah, badly arranged. p. 70.—The rebellion and civil war is so great, that Nephi comes to the rare conclusion, after receiving his special command, to take another journey into the wilderness! The promised land is not yet obtained, according to page 49, where it says, "we did arrive at the promised land." Whether the land of both North and South America was in the charter, or not, we cannot say, but a part is surrendered forthwith, which is never restored again, therefore it was not the promised land, or the Lord had broken his covenant.

“Wherefore it came to pass, that I, Nephi, did take my family, and also Zoram,” (Zoram was a servant man of Laban’s, whom Nephi and his brethren, decoyed from Jerusalem, at the time the renowned plates were obtained which contained the genealogy of Lehi,) “and Sam, and his elder brother, and his family, and Jacob, and Joseph, my younger brethren, and also my sisters, and all they which would go with me.”

They journeyed through the wilderness, until they arrived at a place which they call Nephi, after their leader; those who were left behind, to-wit: Laman and Lemuel, and their families, were afterwards called Lamanites, together with all their descendants, without distinction. Nephi instructs his people to manufacture swords, after the manner of the sword of Laban, to defend themselves against the Lamanites. p. 72. Nothing can be more ridiculous, than to suppose it necessary to manufacture swords with which to defend themselves against the Lamanites, as there could not have been to exceed twenty adults, including both parties; for he says on the very next page, that thirty years only had passed away since they left Jerusalem, and five males constituted the whole at the onset. We will admit that five men were added; but Ishmael and Lehi are dead; and Jacob and Joseph are born, and but a short time since, Joseph is called little. But see what follows in immediate connexion with their removal, and previous to the time mentioned of thirty years having elapsed since the he-gira of Lehi. “And I did teach my people that they “should work in all manner of wood, and of iron, and of copper, and of brass, and of steel, and of gold, and of precious ores, which were in great abundance. And, “I, Nephi, did build a temple, and I did construct it after

“the manner of the temple of Solomon, save it were not “built of so many precious things. But the manner of the “construction, was like unto the temple of Solomon, and the workmanship thereof was exceeding fine.” All this was accomplished in the short time which remains after deducting eight or nine years previous to their embarking for the promised land, and the time they were located previous to Nephi’s journey into the wilderness, where they now are with not more than twenty or thirty persons, including women and children. How much time remains from the thirty years which has not quite elapsed, we will leave for some Nephite, or Mormon, to determine. But this is not all—there is still another incongruity. Nephi has just told us, that gold, silver, brass, steel, iron, copper, and precious ores, in great abundance, were found; and in the next sentence he tells us, that he built a temple in all things like the temple of Solomon, “save it were not built of so many precious things, for they were not to be found upon the land.” We know not the precious things that were in So-lomon’s temple, more than our book enumerates. Brass and steel are represented native. These were advantages which Solomon had not. He was compelled to mix and form his own brass,—steel he had none. If any can reconcile all these incongruities, and unscientific mistakes, which have been exhibited thus far in the book of Mormon, with revealed truths from Heaven, we know not what inconsistencies, and fooleries, could be instituted under a pretence of divine authenticity, that would not have its enthusiastic devotees.

CHAPTER V.

If any man is curious to know the origin of the American Indian, he has it here. "That inasmuch, as they will not hearken unto thy words they shall be cut off from the presence of the Lord." This is prophecy that Nephi pretends to repeat as coming from the Lord, against all those who would not hearken to him as their ruler. Nephi describes the Lamanites as being very white, fair, and delightful, and very enticing to his people. "Therefore the Lord God did cause a skin of black to come upon them."—"And cursed shall be the seed of him that mixeth with their seed." p. 73. The known habits and characteristics of the Indian, are briefly set forth, in order to satisfy the credulous inquirer. "And thirty years have passed away from the time we left Jerusalem," p. 73. Jacob and Joseph are now consecrated priests. It may not be improper to examine this subject of consecrating priests out of the families to which it belonged; and it will be recollected, that, according to the account given by the author, that neither Jacob, nor Joseph were yet thirty years old. God made a covenant with the Jews at Mount Sinai, and instituted three orders, the high priests, priests, and Levites. The high priesthood was made hereditary in the family of Aaron, and the first born of the eldest branch of that family, if he had no legal blemish, was the high priest. "Thou shalt appoint Aaron and his sons, and they shall wait on the priest's office, and the stranger that cometh nigh shall be put to death.—Numb. chap. III, 10.

The priesthood was conferred upon the tribe of Levi, and the covenant gave them the office, and it was irrevocable while the temple stood, or, until the Messiah came. “And the priests, the sons of Levi, shall come near, for them the Lord thy God hath chosen to minister unto him, and to bless in the name of the Lord, and by their word shall every controversy and every stroke be tried.—Deut. XXI, 5. Korah, Dathan, and Abiram, with two hundred and fifty men of renown, rebelled against the institution of the priesthood, and the Lord destroyed them in the presence of the whole congregation. This was to be a memorial that no stranger invade any part of the office of priesthood, Numbers XIV, 40. Fourteen thousand seven hundred of the people were destroyed by a plague, for murmuring against this memorial. Even Paul declared, that Christ, while on earth, could not be a priest, for he descended from a tribe concerning which Moses spake nothing of priesthood. So fixed was the covenant in regard to the priesthood in Levi, and of the high priesthood to Aaron, that even the Savior was excluded by the law !

Our author being ignorant on this subject, makes Lehi the offspring of Joseph, and represents him as “offering sacrifices and burnt offerings to the Lord.” p 15. And to cap the climax of absurdity, after preaching faith and repentance as the only way of salvation, from the very commencement of the campaign, Nephi tells us, “Notwithstanding we believe in Christ, we keep the law of Moses, and look with steadiness unto Christ until the law shall be fulfilled.”!!! p. 105. In answer, to the above difficulty, into which the author has plunged himself, the priests say that Lehi’s priesthood was of the order of Melchisedic.—In what way the laws of Moses could be kept under a new order of priesthood, we cannot determine. Paul says “For that after the similitude of Melchisedic, there ariseth another priest, who is made, not after the law of a carnal commandment, but after the power of an endless life.” Heb.

VII, 15—16. 'Here then the matter is set at rest, that a priest after the order of Melchisedec could not exist under the law, nor could such a priest offer sacrifices and burnt offerings, nor could the law of Moses, in any sense, be fulfilled without the three orders of priesthood. From what has been seen, the opinions of Paul, and the law of Moses, are at direct issue with the Book of Mormon.

Jacob and Joseph having been consecrated priests, they commence the duties of their holy office, with a few prefatory remarks, interlarded with quotations from the prophecies. p. 74.

The 50th and 51st chapters of Isaiah, is inserted at full length for our relief. Whether the quotation was made as a matter of necessity by the young priest, or as being appropriate, we cannot determine from the connection in which it stands.

The choice in the quotation is certainly a good one, and is a great relief to the reader. The sublimity of sentiment and poetic style of Isaiah, is truly captivating, and in what manner it became inserted, according to the diction and phraseology of King James' translators, is, with us, a mystery—unless it was copied. Why not in the translation of J. Wickliffe, and J. de Traversa, of Tindal, and Coverdale, of Luther, and of half a dozen others we might mention? Perhaps the author had not, while composing the Book of Mormon, any of the above copies; and he might not have known that any such translations were ever made.

After the accurate quotation from Isaiah, Joseph, who is now preaching, anticipates the apostle Paul in his own language, nearly, on the subject of the resurrection, baptism, and repentance, and many other leading points upon which he was so pre-eminent for his clearness of thought and doctrine. We should conclude from the manner in which the quotations are made, that it was done by the author from recollection, and that he had a tolerable knowledge of the gospel doctrines. The following are a few of the sentences quoted, or, as is pretended, that Joseph is the original author of, instead of the apostle, or the Savior.—“They which are filthy, are filthy still,” “and they shall go away into everlasting fire,” p. 80. “And he commandeth all men that they must repent.” “And where there is no law given, there is no punishment, and where there is no punishment there is no condemnation.” p. 81.

There are a variety of other sentences in this sermon which are taken promiscuously from the Old and New Testaments. Who can be credulous enough to believe, that a preacher, five hundred and fifty years before the ministry of the Savior and his apostles, who taught the way of salvation, did preach and instruct not only the same principles, but the very words and phrases were used to convey the sentiments which are found in the evangelical writings?

Nephi next takes the stand, and testifies roundly to the truths which Joseph, his brother, had been preaching, and adds that they both had seen the Savior, and he had declared that he would send his word forth to the people of Nephi. “Wherefore, by the words of three, God hath said I will establish my word.” Who the three are, here referred to, we cannot say. It may be Oliver Cowdery, David Whitmar, and Martin Harris, who are appended to the Book of Mormon, to establish its divine authenticity; and they may be the immortal three, selected out of the three American apostles. The chapter of miracles will reconcile all this. Nephi says “his soul delights in the words of Isaiah,” and he says he will write some of them for the benefit of his people, that they may “rejoice for all men.” p. 86.—Thirteen chapters of Isaiah are then copied, commencing with the second chapter.

Nephi, after the quotation from Isaiah, comments upon it, and concludes by offering to prophecy a little plainer, so that all could understand him. The doctrines which are found in the new Testament, in relation to the coming Messiah, and his rejection by the Jews, is explained ; a task not very difficult for any one in the nineteenth century. Nephi says it had been told him concerning the destruction which came upon those who remained in Jerusalem, immediately after his father had left it, and that they then were destroyed, and carried captive into Babylon. p. 103.

We have been told by our author, a number of times, that Christ would make his appearance just six hundred years after Lehi left Jerusalem, and we have been told, likewise, that Lehi, and his family, travelled eight years about the borders of the Red sea, in the wilderness, after which time Nephi builds his ship. And between thirty and fifty five years, after the crusade commenced, he tells the people that Jerusalem is destroyed, and the Jews carried captive into Babylon. According to history, and according to Jeremiah, in the ninth year of the reign of Zedekiah, in the tenth month, Nebuchadrezzar, King of Babylon, besieged Jerusalem, which was six hundred and six years before the christian era. Here we see the ignorant author has made too great a mistake, for, according to the Bible, Jerusalem must have been besieged six years before the pretended departure of Lehi from Jerusalem, and the city destroyed, and the Jews carried captive into Babylon, four years and six months, for the siege lasted only eighteen months. So much for dates, which are given by Mormon inspiration.

We will give for the benefit of our readers, a specimen of Mormon inspired language. “And behold ~~it~~ shall come to pass, after the Messiah hath risen from the dead, and hath manifested himself unto his people, unto as many as will believe on his name, behold Jerusalem shall be destroy- ed again ; for woe unto them that fight against God and the people of his church. p. 104.

In the valedictory of Nephi, we have the doctrines of salvation through Jesus Christ preached, and about twenty pages of the book are taken up. A great many of the incidents which transpired in the days of our Savior, is prophetically mentioned, together with the reasons why it was necessary to baptize Christ, p. 108. We are likewise told, in the same discourse, that the plates, or book, would be sealed up, and should finally be found by an unlearned man, who should see them, and show them to three others, and then hide them again, for the use of the Lord. All this the Mormons believe that their prophet, Joseph Smith, Jr. translated, and as having been engraved by the hand of Nephi, on plates of brass, two thousand four hundred years ago ! (when the plates were hid by Smith, but did not know where,) by means of a stone in a hat ! Before Nephi concludes to die, he appoints a king over his people which they call second Nephi, p. 124.

The ignorance of the author, has caused the sceptre to depart from Judah, hundreds of years before Shiloh came. It must be recollected, that all their people were Jews, living under the law, to the fulfilling of it, and preaching the Gospel, baptism, and repentance, making priests out of those families, concerning which Moses spake nothing of priesthood, and kings, contrary to the blessings of Jacob, which he pronounced upon Judah.

Nephi prophecies that after the book of which he has spoken, shall be found, and written unto the Gentiles, and afterwards sealed up again unto the Lord, many would believe and carry the tidings to the remnant of their seed, which is the Lamanites, or the aborigines, and that they were of the Jewish parentage, and that they had had the Gospel preached to them six hundred years before there was a gospel.

“And it came to pass, that the Jews which are scattered also shall begin to believe in Christ; and they shall begin to gather in upon the face of the land, and as many as shall believe in Christ, shall also become a delightsome people.”

p. 117.

From the above prophecies, we may expect to see our Indians and the Jews flocking in, becoming Mormons, and the former laying aside their dark skins for white ones.

The prophecies continue, and inform us that at this time, the Lord will commence his work among all nations, kindred, tongues, and people, in order to restore them; and that great divisions will take place among the people, and terrible anathemas are pronounced against those who will not become Mormons, and quotes Isaiah's poetic description of the commencement of the Millennium. p. 117.

The sin against the Holy Ghost is defined as follows : after repentance, baptism by water, and by fire, and by the Holy Ghost, and can speak with a new tongue, and with the tongue of angels, and then deny the Savior, the unpardonable sin is committed; p. 119. He tells the people he is not “mighty in writing like unto speaking,” p. 121. For he says that he speaks by the power of the Holy Ghost.— We know not what kind of a speaker he was, but we have a sample of the author's composition, and we should readily concur with him that the inspiration of God had no agency in the composition. The Evangelists both spoke and wrote by inspiration, as we believe; at all events we find no apology made by them for not being able to convey their ideas, for want of language. Our author finally closes his sermon by making his hero possess the keys of the kingdom of heaven, and as having the power to seal on earth, &c. p. 122.

CHAPTER V.

We have thus far looked over the Book of Mormon, endeavoring to treat the sacred truths of the everlasting God, which have been profaned for one of the vilest of purposes, with the solemnity which it deserves ; and to expose in a becoming manner, the falsehoods which have been interwoven for the purposes of fraud and deception. If the book had been presented to us, for our inspection, we should never have anticipated that a religious sect could ever have been established from its doctrines. We should have come to the conclusion that the author was a fearless infidel, and had attempted a ridicule upon the Holy Bible ; and we still think that it is not improbable that the original design of the author was to bring down contempt upon the inspired writers, and the religion of Jesus Christ.

“THE BOOK OF JACOB THE BROTHER OF NEPHI.”

Jacob commences his book fifty-five years after Lehi left Jerusalem, p. 123. Jacob says, the word of the Lord came unto him, saying, “Jacob, get thou up into the temple, on the morrow, and declare the word which I shall give thee, unto this people.”

“And now behold, my brethren, this is the word which I declare unto you, that many of you have begun to search for gold, and for silver, and all manner of precious ores, in the which this land, which is a land of promise unto you, and to your seed, doth abound most plentifully. And the hand of Providence hath smiled upon you most pleasingly, that you have obtained many riches ; and because that some of you have obtained more abundantly than that of your brethren, ye are lifted up in the pride of your hearts, and wear stiff necks and high heads, because of the costliness of your apparel, and persecute your brethren, because that ye suppose that ye are better than they." p. 126. Jacob received a special command from the Lord to get up into the temple and declare the above paragraph!!! There seems to be a prevailing passion in the writer to represent the Nephites as being great miners after the precious metals. They are often represented as digging and searching after gold and silver—which will perhaps be an apology for Joseph Smith's early habits in searching after hidden treasures, he being a remnant of the Nephites. The love of gold among the Jews is proverbial; and it is a far more laudable method of obtaining it by digging after the deposits of pirates than by over reaching in commercial, or in other business transactions. There would seem but little prospect of obtaining pirate's money, either on the mountains, near the head waters of the Susquehannah, or in the town of Manchester, Ontario County, N. Y. But Don Quixote told his squire Sancho, that great fortune was often very near when we least expected it; thus it was with Smith in digging after hidden treasures—the famous brass plates, the gold spectacles and the interpreting stone were found, perhaps, when he least expected it; and if the sword of Laban had been added, instead of being found by "Guy of Warwick," in England, some centuries ago, we have no doubt but the mob in Missouri would have been quiet before this time, or Gen. J. Smith would have slain the whole. A similar adventure will be noticed which can be found on page 272, Book of Mormon.

In the third discourse, which Jacob favors us with, he informs us that only a small part of his doings can be engraved on plates; and in the close of the second discourse, he says that a hundredth part of the doings of these people could not be engraved on plates on the account of their having become so very numerous, p. 129, and all sprang from five or six females, in about forty years; and in the mean time they had had wars and contentions, and the reigns of kings, the history of which is written upon larger plates, which are called the plates of Jacob, p. 129. According to the most extravagant calculation, in point of increase among five or six females, the whole could not have amounted to more than about sixteen hundred, in the time mentioned, allowing no deaths to have occurred; besides, about one half of that number would be under ten years old. The story of wars and contentions, and of kings having passed away, is too ridiculous and inconsistent to be noticed and refuted in a serious manner.

Jacob reminds the people of a parable which the prophet Zenos spake, p. 131. In this parable, the author has no means of dissembling, there not being such a prophet nor such a parable, he is compelled to use his own phraseology, as he penned it.

The style of the Book of Mormon is sui generis, and whoever peruses it, will not have a doubt but that the whole was framed and written by the same individual hand. The phrases, "And it came to pass," is at the beginning of every paragraph, with a few exceptions, throughout all the original part of the work. "Behold," "Beholdest," "exceeding," "Thereof," "also," "grieveth," are favorite phrases.

Let us compare a paragraph which the author pretends was spoken by the prophet Zenos, and repeated by Jacob, with one translated from the gold plates of Jared, about seven hundred years afterwards by the hand of Moroni.

The following are the words of the prophet Zenos :

"Ye shall clear away the branches which bring forth bitter fruit, according to the strength of the good and the size thereof; and ye shall not clear away the bad thereof, all at once, lest the roots thereof should be too strong for the graft, and the graft thereof shall perish."

Seven hundred years afterwards, Moroni translated the following elegant description of the ships in which the Babelites navigated themselves across the ocean:

"And they were built after a manner that they were exceeding tight, even that they would hold water like unto a dish; and the bottom thereof was tight like unto a dish; and the sides thereof was tight like unto a dish; and the ends thereof were peaked; and the top thereof was tight like unto a dish; and the length thereof was the length of a tree; and the door thereof, when it was shut was tight like unto a dish," p. 542. We leave the intelligent reader to draw his own conclusions.

The parable of Zenos occupies about nine pages, and is followed by Jacob with an explanation, and a short Christian exhortation to his people. The last chapter of the book of Jacob is principally taken up in relating an anecdote about a man by the name of Sherem, who came and preached to the people, denying Christ; Jacob finally confounds him by the power of the Lord, which struck Sherem to the earth, p. 141. Jacob is now grown old, and he gives the plates of Nephi to his son Enos, together with the commands which Nephi gave to him. Enos promises obedience, and Jacob bids farewell to the reader, p. 143.

"THE BOOK OF ENOS."—Enos commences with giving his father a good name, as any dutiful son would do, and then tells us of a mighty wrestle he had with the Lord before that he received a remission of his sins, he then exhorts the people to repentance and faith in Christ; he tells us he is a great prophet, but prophecies nothing. He says an hundred and seventy-nine years had passed away since Lehi left Jerusalem, p. 145.

"THE BOOK OF JAROM" is said to be written by Jarom

the son of Enos, who is an engraver like all his predecessors in the priesthood; he tells us the plates are so small that he could engrave but little. About two pages in the Mormon translation is all, and delivers the plates to Omni, two hundred and thirty-eight years since the hegira of Lehi, p. 147.

“THE BOOK OF OMNI.”—Omni receives the plates from his father, who commands him to write a little to preserve the geneology. Omni writes a couple of paragraphs, each commencing with, “And it came to pass,” and confers the plates upon his son Amaron. Amaron writes a few sentences and delivers his plates to his brother Chemish. He follows the example in three or four sentences, and declares the plates genuine. Abinadom is the son of Chemish; he takes the plates by right, but declares he knows of no revelations, save what has been written, and says that is sufficient, p. 149. Amaleki is the son of Abinadom who takes the plates, and says he has something to say. A certain man, by the name of Mosiah was warned by the Lord to flee into the wilderness, with as many as would go with him. They all, with Mosiah for their leader, arrive at a place called Zarahemla, and bring with them the plates of brass, which pleased the people very much, because they contained the record of the Jews.

The people of Zarahemla, Mosiah discovered, came out from Jerusalem at the time of the Babylonish captivity, and had become very numerous. Their language had become degenerated so much that Mosiah could not understand them at all; but Mosiah causes them all to learn the language of the Nephites, and they make him king over the land, p. 149. Mosiah discovered upon a stone which was brought him, with hieroglyphics engraved upon it, which he interpreted by the gift and power of God—and it gave an account of another people, which escaped the confounding of languages at the tower of Babel, and of their destruction at the north. They were called the people of Coriantumr. Amaleki says he was born in the days of king Mosiah, and is acquainted with Benjamin, who is his son, and succeeds his father in the regal office, p. 150. Three or four more paragraphs, and the plates of Nephi are full. The plates were transferred to king Benjamin by Amaleki for safe keeping.

“THE WORDS OF MORMON.”—The scene is now changed by the author, and we are carried forward, “many hundred years after the coming of Christ.” But the inspired historian, who is called Mormon, begins with his record at the precise period when Amaleki delivers the plates to king Benjamin. Mormon commences his history with a kind of preface, in which he mentions that king Benjamin fought great battles with the Lamanites, and says “he did fight with the strength of his own arm, with the sword of Laban,” p. 152. We suppose the sword of Laban was probably a kind of keep-sake, and descended to their generals; and we are sorry to say that our Gen. Smith has not been favored with the possession of it. Such a specimen of antiquity, as a sword made 2400 years ago, which had slain so many in the hands of such renowned kings and prophets of God, would be a great curiosity.

Mormon is the author of the “Book of Mosiah.” King Benjamin is the father of three sons whose names are called Mosiah, Helorum and Helaman, who were taught in the language of their fathers, p. 154, which was the Egyptian; thereby they were enabled to read the engravings upon the plates, p. 155. Lehi has been represented as a pious Jew, living in Jerusalem, and of the tribe of Joseph, who separated himself from the Jews, and departed into the wilderness, and never again associated with any community or nation of people, until king Mosiah found another settlement, who came off at the time of the Babylonish captivity, in the land of Zarahemla, who were likewise Jews. The sacred records of the Jews, and all their religious ceremonies in the temple, were in the Hebrew language; and it is well established that no other language was in use among that nation in Jerusalem, until the temple was destroyed. It may be true that Jews who were born and lived in other countries, spoke other languages. But the known hostility of the Egyptians towards every other nation, and particularly towards the Hebrews, renders it improbable that the Egyptians had sufficient intercourse with the Jews, so as to have them adopt their language and literature. The Jews have a religious veneration for the Hebrew tongue, which also furnishes a strong argument against the position that our pious Hebrews spake the Egyptian language, and recorded their holy religion in it upon plates of brass, to be handed down to posterity.

After king Benjamin had finished the education of his sons, he “waxed old”—and as it became necessary to confer the kingdom on some one, he caused Mosiah to come forth. He orders him to issue a proclamation that on the morrow he would preach in the temple, and proclaim Mosiah king, p. 154.

King Benjamin took care to give his son charge as to the affairs of the kingdom; and handed down the old legacy, consisting of the sword of Laban, the brass ball or compass, and the records on brass plates, p. 155.

The people assemble, according to the request of King Benjamin, in great multitudes—“And they took of the firstlings of their flocks, that they might offer sacrifice and burnt offerings, according to the law of Moses,” p. 155.

In the sermon which king Benjamin is now preaching in the temple, where the people are offering sacrifice, we find the following sentences: “I am come unto you to declare the glad tidings of great joy,” p. 160. “And he shall be called Jesus Christ, the Son of God, the Father of Heaven and Earth, the Creator of all things from the beginning, and his mother shall be called Mary, !! p. 160—for salvation cometh to none such, except it be through repentance and faith on the Lord Jesus Christ,” p. 161. We are at a loss, inasmuch as it is not defined, what kind of a dispensation it was, to preach salvation through Christ and offer burnt offerings at the same time, according to the law of Moses, which they could not do agreeably to the law, not having legal priests to officiate. “And moreover I say unto you, that there shall be no other name given, nor no other way nor means whereby salvation can come unto the children of men, only in and through the name of Christ, the Lord Omnipotent,” p. 161. We cannot gather from any part of the sermon of Benjamin, any disapprobation of the ceremonial law, but infer that both the law of Moses and the gospel were binding upon them at one and the same time !!

The sermon is continued with many good doctrines extracted from the New Testament, with a pretence that it had been revealed to him by an angel.

The author doubtless had some knowledge of the revivals of religion, in the different churches; for he represents the whole congregation prostrated, crying for mercy through the atoning blood of Christ—“For we believe in Jesus Christ the Son of God,” p. 162. This would be judged, a priori, wonderful preaching, considering the period in which it took place, at least 200 years before the nativity of Christ.

Permit us to propound a few interrogatories to the reader, if he be a Mormon, or even has doubts in relation to the divine origin and authenticity of the new revelation: 1. When did God institute the ceremonial and moral laws? If upon Mount Sinai, when did it terminate, and in what? 3. For what purpose was those laws instituted? 4. If at the coming of the Savior, all the ceremonies of the law were done away, why were they in force among the Nephites as early as the gospel was made known to them, not relying upon the law and obedience to it, but upon the Gospel, six hundred years before the shepherds heard the glad tidings of great joy, which was unto all nations? except the Nephites, with whom the author pretends it was an old story.

Mosiah is the next king, and is son to king Benjamin; he is consecrated a priest. The king's and priest's office seems to be inseparably connected at this time among our ancients.

Mosiah's reign commences four hundred and seventy-six years from the time Lehi left Jerusalem. He despatches sixteen of his strong men to reconnoitre and search after another settlement of the Nephites, which appears to be disconnected from the land of Zarahemla. They lose their way, not having been provided with the brass ball to direct them, and are taken prisoners by Limhi. After king Limhi ascertains that they are from the land of Zarahemla, he recounts to them his troubles, and represents himself as being under bondage to the Lamanites; and that one half of all their products were paid to them, annually, as a tribute. The prisoners are set at liberty; and plates containing their record, from the time they left the land of Zarahemla.—Ammon, who is represented as captain of the scouts, reads the record upon the plates. After which, king Limhi asks him if he could interpret languages—being answered in the negative, he commences a narrative of having sent out forty-three of his men in search of the land of Zarahemla; and that they all got lost, and after many days they returned—having discovered a land that was covered with the bones of men and beasts! and was also covered with the ruins of buildings, having the appearance of being peopled as numerous as the hosts of Israel. As a testimony of the truth of their discovery, they brought home with them twenty-four plates of pure gold, containing a history of a people to which we have alluded, called the people of Jared, who were not confounded at the destruction of Babel. Ammon is again enquired of, whether he knows of any one who can translate languages—he answers in the affirmative, and says “for that he hath wherewith to look, and translate all records that are of antient date : and it is a gift from God ; and the things are called interpreters ; and no man can look in them, except he be commanded”—the king of Zarahemla is the man, p. 173. We will make no remark on the gold spectacles, but will leave the intelligent reader to infer whether the story and the manner in which it is told, comports with his views of divine revelation or not.

THE RECORD OF ZENIFF.—Zeniff is the leader of a band of Nephites, who left the land of Zarahemla, and is the father of Noah, who is the father of Limhi the king, of whom we have been speaking.

Zeniff confers the kingdom upon his son Noah, whose people become wicked, and wars ensue between them and the Lamanites, and they are mostly all destroyed ; hence they became tributary, as above alluded to. About this time, a prophet makes his appearance, by the name of Abinadi. He attempts to imitate Isaiah in his prophecies, and quotes many passages from the Old Testament, which were pronounced against the Jews for their wickedness and rebellion, and foretelling the destruction of Jerusalem—pretending that he is the author of the sentiments, and declares them against these Nephites, upbraiding them for their disobedience to the commands of Christ, and describes the awful calamities which shall follow, and concludes with the decalogue, p. 184.

The decalogue here inserted, is in our approved translation, like every thing else which is taken from the Old and New Testament. It is true that the pronoun which is used twice or three times, instead of that, consequently, we should infer that the quotation was made from recollection. The fact that so great a proportion of the whole book being made from quotations from the Bible, a part of which was not written until six hundred years after the pretended period of our author, places the matter beyond controversy, and is conclusive testimony that the author was an infidel.

The prophet Abinadi was somewhat expert in the sacred scriptures, and measurably understood the views of modern theologians;—he says, “And now ye have said that salvation cometh by the law of Moses. I say unto you that it is expedient that ye keep the law of Moses as yet; but I say unto you, that the time shall come when it shall no more be expedient to keep the law of Moses,” p. 185. The doctrines of salvation and the law, according to our prophet, were inseparably connected in their time, and both were indispensable to salvation. Whether the ceremonial and moral laws were both included by our prophet, we cannot determine; but to reconcile the idea that the ceremonial law which was typical of Christ, and was only obligatory until the gospel church was erected, with the literal obedience of it, by a community of people who had the gospel as fully revealed to them, as it was to the rest of mankind at any future period whatever, is a task beyond our abilities, so long as we view the writings of St. Paul as inspired of God. In immediate connection we are told that the Jews were a “stiff-necked people, quick to do iniquity”—“therefore, there was a law given them, yea, a law of performances and ordinances, a law which they were to observe strictly”—“But behold, I say unto you, that all these things were types of things to come,” p. 185. We are next led into the doctrines of the New Testament; and are told of the coming of the Messiah, and of his doctrines and crucifixion, about as well as any tolerably well informed man, who made no pretensions to literature, would do at the present time, having the scripture before him.

In the following quotation, we have the views of our author on the resurrection—"And if Christ had not risen from the dead or have broken the bonds of death, that the grave should have no victory, and that death should have no sting, there could have been no resurrection," p. 189. In this quotation the cloven foot is uncovered—the deformity brought into open day light. The prophet is represented by the author, as living some centuries before our Savior's nativity; but the slightest examination of the text quoted, will show the reader that the subject is spoken of in the imperfect tense, representing the event of the resurrection as past and finished, which was doubtless the truth, at the time it was written. The phrase, "if Christ had not risen" implies past time; again, in the same sentence, "there could have been no resurrection," implies past time; but if the author had said, if Christ does not rise, &c.—there will be no resurrection, we could have understood him, in reference to the time in which he represents his prophet speaking, to wit, some centuries before the great event of which he spake, took place, according to his own calender.

The sagacity of our impostor has not been sufficient in all instances, to avoid detection. His deliberations were insufficient to supply the place of erudition, and consequently, he plunged himself into a thousand absurdities, equaling the one just quoted. We are no less of the opinion, than heretofore, that divine inspiration would be an unerring guide in all things, as well in language as in the matter to be conveyed by it, which renders the book in question, good evidence against itself, that it is a miserable forgery and a libel upon the Christian religion. We will venture to predict that if the golden bible should be rendered into intelligible English, there would not remain a single honest Mormon who should examine the book, (provided he possessed common capacity,) among "the latter day saints."

Alma is the next hero, who is represented as a descendant of Nephi, and having repented of his sins, commences preaching and repeating the prophecies of Abinadi, who had recently fallen a victim, by the hands of king Noah's priests. Our hero is more successful than his predecessor, as he succeeds in converting king Noah to the Christian faith, together with many of his subjects.

After their conversion, the ceremony of baptism is to be performed, and the manner in which it was accomplished, in the first exhibition, is somewhat unique. The priest with his disciple are represented as going down into the water, in the river Mormon, and at the same time the believer is buried in the water, he buries himself with him. We are not told whether it was accidental or intentional that they both were immersed at the same time, but we learn, in immediate connection, that the mode adopted at the present day by the anabaptists, was followed and practiced afterwards.

The gospel doctrines, according to the views of our author have, in his clumsy manner, been spread before us, beginning with the hegira of Lehi, pretending that the whole plan of redemption was exhibited by a special revelation to an apostate Jew, six hundred years before our Savior expressly declares the ceremonial law was abrogated and the gospel preached—"The law and the prophets were until John: since that time the kingdom of God is preached, and every man presseth into it," Luke 16. We will leave the controversy whether the book of Mormon is true, on the subject of this special revelation, or the words of Jesus Christ, as recorded by the evangelist, to be determined at the great BAR of Justice.

The Book of Mosiah is continued by narrating the most ludicrous events, of wars and church schisms, imaginable, under the pontificate of our first immersed king, and the last one in our notable history.

Alma being warned by the Lord to flee his country, he gathers a large concourse of people, and they all start into the wilderness, and travel eight days where they pitch their tents, and afterwards build buildings. The sojourners with Alma endeavor to make him accept the royal sceptre, but he piously declines, and establishes a pontificate and builds a church, p. 203. Alma consecrates divers priests, and they were all just men, and they built a city and called it Helam; but in the midst of their prosperity and devotions, an army of the Lamanites appeared upon their borders, and they all fled; and finally arrived at the land of Zarahemla, under king Mosiah. The king receives the pilgrims with great kindness, and Alma is continued his high priest. He is authorized by the king to establish churches and ordain priests over them. Seven churches are forthwith built and dedicated to the Christian religion, in which, faith, repentance and baptism is preached by king Mosiah's priests, in its primitive purity. Alma has a son who has at this time arrived at manhood, (we should infer from this that he was not a Catholic Pontiff,) who persecutes the Christians, to their great annoyance. But the Lord would not suffer his chosen Christian Jews to be persecuted; and therefore, in the full tide of his wicked career, he is converted, not very unlike that of Paul the Apostle, according to our narrator, p. 213. The miracle of young Alma's conversion is described in the following language. An angel appeared unto Alma and said, "Go thy way, and seek to destroy the church no more, that their prayers may be answered"—"And now Alma, and those that were with him, fell again to the earth, for great was their astonishment" &c.—"And it came to pass, after they had fasted and prayed for the space of two days and two nights, the limbs of Alma receive their strength; and he stood up and began to speak," &c. and said, "I have repented of my sins, and have been redeemed of the Lord; behold I am born of the spirit."

Mosiah's sons are zealous Christians, all of them; they decline, severally, the regal honors, and choose the humble station of missionaries. They consequently all embark with a view of christianizing the heathen. Mosiah suggests the propriety of abolishing the office of king among them, because his sons had all refused, and that if any other should be crowned over them, the rightful heir might return and claim the crown as his legal patrimony, which would create contention, &c. among the people, p. 217.—King Mosiah's sons are represented as being extremely humble and devout, they are willing to abandon all for the cause of Christ—home, country, and their princely fortunes—and go missionating. But the eagle eye of the king looks upon his sons with suspicion, or the author of the Golden Bible is under the necessity of bringing up this kind of reasoning, in order to frame a pretence to change his government to one which will appear to the ignorant reader as much like the Jewish polity as possible. The reign of the Judges is next instituted, as answering the author best. Previously, however, we are presented with the following tirade of nonsense. Mosiah causes all records to be revised—"therefore, he took the records which were engraved upon the plates of brass, and also the plates of Nephi; and all the things which he had kept and preserved according to the commandments of God, and after having translated and caused to be written upon the plates of gold which had been found by the people of Limhi, which was delivered to him by the hand of Limhi: and this he done because of the great anxiety of the people, for they were desirous beyond measure to know concerning those people.

which had been destroyed. And now he translated them by the means of two stones, which was fastened into the two rims of a bow. Now, things were prepared from the beginning, and were handed down from generation to generation, for the purpose of interpreting languages; and they have been kept and preserved by the hand of the Lord, that he should discover to every creature which should possess the land, the iniquities and the abominations of his people: and whosoever has these things, is called seer, after the manner of old times."

We were told by Lehi that the plates should not perish, nor be dimmed by time; but our king has found it necessary, not only to revise, but to transcribe them; so much for Mormon promises.

Mosiah, after a long period, is enabled to translate the gold plates, by means of a pair of goggles, which he must have had in his possession from the time he was made king, because he says they had been kept with the plates from the beginning. It is certainly very remarkable that he should have kept in his possession a pile of gold plates, known to have been found by Limhi, for thirty years, with every facility for reading them, and yet never bestowed one leisure moment to examine their contents.

After the gold plates were examined, and were found to contain a full and complete history of a people who came from Asia, and which God had preserved at the time of the destruction of the tower of Babel, and navigated in a miraculous manner to this continent at that time, but now, or at the pretended period of our history, were totally extinct; he expresses great satisfaction at arriving to such important information!! In connection, we are promised a detailed account of these Babelites, by giving a translation of the plates in full. In the Book of Ether, which is placed at the end of the Book of Mormon, we shall see the wonderful translation, and make our remarks.

Mosiah reigned thirty-three years being sixty-three years old, and he dies—making the whole time since Lehi's departure from Jerusalem, five hundred and nine years, p. 221. Thus endeth the reign of the Mormon kings. Alma, of renowned conversion to the doctrines of the New Testament about an hundred years before it was published, is constituted Judge over the people of Zarahemla, and is also high priest over the church of Christ. He was the exclusive law-giver and umpire in all matters, both civil and ecclesiastical, and the most absolute monarch of which we have ever heard or read.

CHAPTER VI.

A new era has now commenced; Judge Alma, the high priest, is an engraver, as a matter of course, and is represented as keeping his own record: he tells us that in the first year of his reign a man was brought before him who had been preaching and bearing down against the church, persuading the people that ministers ought to become popular, and that they ought not to labor, but ought to be supported—"and he also testified unto the people that all mankind would be saved at the last day," p. 221.

The name of our ancient Universalist is called Nehor, and is represented as quite successful in gaining proselytes. Gideon, an orthodox Nephite priest, meets Nehor, and a warm debate on Christianity ensues between them—they are represented as able combatants—but the Universalist finally gets angry, and he draws his sword upon pious Gideon and kills him, which was the occasion of his being arraigned before his honor, Judge Alma. The declaration includes two counts—one of being guilty of priestcraft, and the other for attempting to enforce it by the sword. The murder of good old Gideon, was not set forth in the declaration, and therefore we suppose it was no crime to commit homicide in that early day, although it be a priest who is the victim. Nehor is, however, sentenced to die, as an example to those who might be guilty of the high crime of priestcraft, thereafter. But the sequel informs us that the ignominious death of Nehor, served no purpose in preventing priestcraft, and from that period the Nephites were greatly annoyed by impostors and preachers of the Devil.

The Book of Alma contains 204 pages and reaches down to the sixty-ninth year of the Judges, and is principally taken up in giving accounts of mighty wars and great generals. The civil, the military, and the ecclesiastical authority, were usually vested in the same individual; representing them as conducting the government much after the Mosaic polity. The miserable manner in which the story is told, renders it extremely irksome to the reader; but the knight errantry of Don Quixote bears no parallel, nor does the history of the Peloponnesian wars speak of such generals, nor of such brave achievements, as the book of Alma.— Besides, in the sixty-nine years, many large cities were founded and built, fortifications were erected, military costumes of great splendor were manufactured and worn.— Their implements of war consisted of swords, spears, scimitars, javelins, bows and arrows, slings, &c. We can see no propriety in the omission by the author of the use of guns and ammunition. We think it would have been as credible as most of the events of the narrative, and would have been matter for Mormon credulity and admiration.

A mint for coining money was probably in operation, for it is mentioned that they had an abundance of gold and silver, and they were used for money. The names of the gold coins were senine, seon, shum, simnah, antion and shubloon, making in all, six varieties; their relative value is stated, but not within our comprehension. Let the reader fancy for a moment that all these things are true, will he not enquire whether any of the coin which was so abundant, has ever been found. It is a well known fact that gold is not subject to oxidation, and is therefore indestructible—and if such coin had ever existed, specimens would have been discovered among the ancient ruins of our country, which our present Mormons believe, on the authority of their high priest and the golden bible, were the remains of the settlements of the Nephites. Copper and silver have often been found, (but not in the form of coin,) in the mounds on the Ohio River, and other places. The copper is usually in flat corroded plates, and the silver in the form of a ferule.

Next in order, comes the silver coin; which are called senum, amnor, ezrom and onti; their relative values are stated, but equally unintelligible with the former. Why has none of the silver coin been discovered? fifteen hundred or even two thousand years would not be sufficient to destroy a piece of silver of the size and value of a dollar, lying in the ground or out of it, p. 252.

The doctrine of personal identity and of the resurrection is explained by our chief judge and high priest, which, if John Locke or the Bishop of Worcester had read, that great matter of controversy between them would have been avoided, and they would both have been satisfied of their error. Just hear him—"The spirit and the body shall be raised again, in its perfect form; both limb and joint shall be restored to its proper frame, even as we now are at this time ; and we shall be brought before God, knowing even as we know now, and have a bright recollection of all our guilt—and be arraigned before the bar of Christ the Son of God the Father, and the Holy Spirit which is one Eternal God, to be judged according to their works whether they be good or whether they be evil.” If the Bishop of Worcester had been in possession of the above paragraph, he would probably not have suffered such a disgraceful defeat as he did in the controversy with Dr. Locke ; nor would the learned divines of Harvard University spread heresy any longer.

The civil, military and ecclesiastical departments of the government being incorporated and concentrated in the supreme power of our hero and historian—no movement can be detailed, either of the one or the other, without including the whole. If a military campaign is the subject matter of any story in the book of Mormon, civil and ecclesiastical rites and ceremonies are inseparably connected, as best suits the author's views, to aid him out of difficulties. When any religious matter is interlarded, in a particular narrative of any event, which is usually the case throughout the whole book, they are the opinions of the author concerning the doctrines, together with garbled extracts from the New Testament.

We have been in the habit of viewing human nature in a state of moral depravity, but not wholly without some redeeming qualities—not such, indeed, as would justify any one before the all-searching scrutiny of an Omnipotent God, but such as constitute a social being. But the contents of the work before us presents the author, and consequently human nature, in an entirely new light. We could not have believed that any man would have attempted to have prostituted every moral virtue which wisdom and ages have established. If the Bible is a fabrication and a forgery, it is the foundation upon which our rights, our civil privileges, our personal safety, and in fine the whole of human happiness are based. If any one denies this position, let him examine those countries where they have not the Bible, or even communities where it is disregarded, and we will venture to predict that his opinion will be with ours. We have carefully examined the works of Hume, Gibbon, Voltaire and Volney, and with all their sarcasm against the divine authority of the Bible, they have addressed themselves to the most noble and learned of the human family; they left the field covered with rubbish, it is true, but of such materials as soon evaporated to the four winds. But the work before us—which is doubtless, not only an attempt to institute a new religion, but to bring contempt and reproach upon Christianity—is fabricated upon the pretension of inspiration, and is placed at an era which denies all research. If a history or a doctrine be known to have been revealed from God, the subject matter is not to be questioned, however improbable it may appear; consequently, whenever the fact is established in the mind that the Book of Mormon is true, the victory is gained, and whatever fictions, absurdities, contradictions or doctrines it may contain, they will be received as unerring as Deity himself.

In our review, we are left without weapons to combat the credulous Mormon believer; but we trust that to any man who is not a Mormon maniac, who has not inhaled the malaria of the impostor, enough has been said to place the matter beyond a shadow of doubt, that the Book of Mormon is a fabrication, and that the author has addressed the work to the lowest of our passions. No one but the vilest wretch on earth, disregarding all that is sacred, intrepid and fearless of eternity, would ever dared to have profaned the sacred oracles of truth to such base purposes.

We have not yet done—the task, however loathsome, shall be honestly pursued, and placed before the reader.

Above, we have seen that the doctrine of Universalism was preached by Nehor; for which he was put to death.—The next sect was a kind of Episcopalians, who were also heretics—who “gathered themselves together on one day of the week, which day they called the day of the Lord—and they had a place which was high and lifted up, which held but one man, who read prayers, the same prayers every week, and this high place was called Rameumptom, which being interpreted is the holy stand, p. 311. The Episcopalians and Universalists can claim, on Mormon authority, great antiquity for their orders, at least fifty years before the gospel dispensation.

To amuse the reader, we will narrate an event which is found on page 271. One Ammon, a gospel missionary, who had previously devoted himself to the missionary cause, went among the Lamanites to preach baptism, repentance, and the remission of sins, through Jesus Christ. The servants of king Lamoni of the Lamanites, took Ammon prisoner and brought him before the king, who being rather pleased with his sober honest deportment took him into his service. The king's servants, together with Ammon, were sent to water the flocks at some distance. On their way they were met by another party of Lamanites, who sought a quarrel by scattering the king's flocks—a loss of any one of the cattle was punished by death. This circumstance presented a fine opportunity for Ammon to distinguish his knight errantry; for he was a brave knight, as well as a priest. The servants of the king were greatly frightened, as they might well be, in consequence of the severe penalty, in case any of the flock should be lost, which would unavoidably be executed. But Ammon seized upon this favorable opportunity, and said to the other servants, “encircle the flocks round about, that they flee not; and I go and contend with these men which do so scatter our flocks—Ammon stood forth and began to cast stones at them with his sling; yea, with mighty power he did sling stones amongst them; and thus he slew a certain number of them, insomuch that they began to be astonished at his power; nevertheless they were angry because of the slain of their brethren, and they determined that he should fall; therefore, seeing that they could not hit him with their stones, they came forth with their clubs to slay him. But behold, every man that lifted his club to smite Ammon, he smote off their arms with his sword, insomuch that they began to be astonished, and began to flee before him; yea, they were not few in number; and he caused them to flee by the strength of his arm. Now six of them had fallen by the sling, but he slew none, save it were their leaders; and he smote off as many of their arms as was lifted against him, and they were not a few.” In this Don Quixote adventure, there are two important circumstances worthy of our consideration and investigation, to wit: that this horde of Lamanites should be astonished twice, inasmuch as Ammon only killed six and cut off the arms of, perhaps, not more than twenty!! And the other is, that they got angry because Ammon slew a few of them. Ammon certainly showed great forbearance, for he only killed their captains and leaders, and punished the rest by simply lopping off a few of their arms. The result shows us that the battle was very unequal, much more so than the conflict between Sampson and the Philistines; for Sampson had no sword, but our hero not only had a sword, (which afterwards fell into the hands of Guy of Warwick,) but he doubtless understood the scientific use of it. Missionaries in those days wore swords, and for aught we know the chapeaux des bras. We are ready to give full credit to the whole account, provided it can be proven that those Lamanites got angry once and were astonished twice—those circumstances seem improbable on so slight an occasion.

Chief Justice Alma has three sons, viz : Helaman, Shiblon and Corianton—towards the end of his career, three commandments, one for each son, were written, each in separate chapters. We should view them rather as patriarchal valedictories, if they were not headed commandments.

To Helaman he commits the plates of Nephi, or the records, as he calls them, which he says shall be preserved by the hand of the Lord, and shall go forth into every nation, kindred and tongue, p. 326.

We are presented with another method of translating the plates—possibly the spectacles may get lost, or they may not suit the eyes of all. “And the Lord said, I will prepare unto my servant Gazelem, a stone, which shall shine forth in darkness unto light, that I may discover unto my people which serve me, that I may discover unto them the works of their brethren ; yea, their secret works, their works of darkness and abominations,” p. 328.

Now, whether the two methods for translating, one by a pair of stone spectacles “set in the rims of a bow,” and the other by one stone, were provided against accident, we cannot determine—perhaps they were limited in their appropriate uses—at all events the plan meets our approbation.

We are informed that Smith used a stone in a hat, for the purpose of translating the plates. The spectacles and plates were found together, but were taken from him and hid up again before he had translated one word, and he has never seen them since—this is Smith’s own story. Let us ask, what use have the plates been or the spectacles, so long as they have in no sense been used ? or what does the testimony of Martin Harris, Oliver Cowdery and David Whitmer amount to ? They solemnly swear that they saw the plates, and that an angel showed them, and the engravings which were upon them. But if the plates were hid by the angel so that they have not been seen since, how do these witnesses know that when Smith translated out of a hat, with a peep-stone, that the contents of the plates were repeated and written down? Neither of the witnesses pretend that they could read the hieroglyphics with or without the stone; and, therefore, are not competent testimony—nor can we see any use, either in finding the plates or the spectacles, nor of the exhibition of them.

The notable ball is committed to the charge of Helaman, by the right of the law of primogeniture, with the following descriptive and pathetic remarks from his father—“And now my son, I have somewhat to say concerning the thing which our fathers call a ball or director, or our fathers called it Liahona, which is, being interpreted, a compass; and the Lord prepared it.” The sons of Alma were all priests, and were called missionaries, because they devoted their time to traveling and preaching among the heathen, declaring unto them the glad tidings of great joy. Alma now prophecies of the destruction of the Nephites; he says, that four hundred years after the coming of Christ they will entirely lose their religion, p. 348.

The following extraordinary doctrines were preached in the days of the Judges; and believers were called Christians, and “baptism unto repentance” was declared the only door of salvation. “And it came to pass that they did appoint priests and teachers throughout all the land, over all the churches, p. 349. “And those who did belong to the church were faithful; yea, all those who were true believers in Christ took upon them gladly the name of Christ or Christians, as they were called, because of their belief in Christ,” p. 301. “And it came to pass that there were many who died, firmly believing that their souls were redeemed by the Lord Jesus Christ: thus they went out of the world rejoicing," 353. The word was preached by Helaman, Shiblon, Corianton, Amnon, and his brethren, &c. "yea, and all those who had been ordained by the holy order of God, being baptised unto repentance," (John's baptism) "and sent forth to preach unto the people," p. 362. "And that great and last sacrifice will be the son of God; yea, infinite and eternal; and thus he shall bring salvation to all those who believe on his name; this being the intent of this last sacrifice, to bring about the bowels of mercy, which overpowereth justice and bringeth about means unto men that they may have faith and repentance, p. 320.

It will be remembered that the author pretends that the above doctrines were preached from about fifty to an hundred years before Christ's nativity. The clumsy manner in which the above quotations are written, cannot be attributed to the veil which hangs over the spirit of prophecy, for the doctrines are as distinctly explained as the same author can do it at this time, unless he has, since writing the Book of Mormon, undergone a classical drilling, which is far from probable.

Moroni is the next important personage in the drama; he is represented as master of all the modern military tactics, according to the record of Helaman, and is now the scribe of all the important matters that are passing; but not the author yet of a book.

Moroni, who now commands all the forces of the Nephites against the Lamanites, is represented as conducting the war with great skill, and the number which was slain in the battles surpasses any other account in the annals of history. The prowess of Gen. Moroni is only equalled by Ammon in his battle with the Lamanites, where he killed six and cut off the arms of "not a few."

In the thirty-sixth year of the reign of the Judges, Helaman dies, and delivers the old legacy over to Shiblon, which consisted of the brass plates, gold plates, the compass, the big sword, the stone spectacles and the peep-stone, all sacred relics!! In the thirty-sixth year, Moroni dies, after having in a pious manner killed hundreds of thousands of the heathen.

At about the conclusion of the Book of Alma, one Hagoth is ushered on the stage as an old ship carpenter—"And it came to pass, that Hagoth, he being an exceeding curious man, therefore he went forth and built him an exceeding large ship, on the borders of the land Bountiful, by the land Desolation, and launched it forth into the West Sea, by the narrow neck which led into the land northward.—Query—did John Bunyan, when writing his Pilgrim's Progress, pilfer terms from the Book of Mormon, or had the author of our new revelation become familiar with the words Bountiful and Desolation by reading that eccentric but excellent production?

The ship which Hagoth built, was large and commodious for passengers. Many are said to have embarked in this ship for other countries northward, and our ship carpenter built a great many more within the term of two years!—This furnishes the credulous Mormon with a plausible account of the first inhabitants upon the Islands in the Pacific Ocean, and of those west of the Rocky mountains.

The sacred legacy, consisting of the plates and the peep stone, is next conferred upon Helaman, the son of Helaman, which ends the account of Alma, and his sons Shiblon and Helaman, p. 406.

CHAPTER VII.

THE BOOK OF HELAMAN.—Helaman, the son of Helaman, is the next writer of a book, which commences with the fortieth year of the reign of the Judges and reaches down to the ninetieth, and is the year preceding the nativity of Jesus Christ.

In the commencement of this book, we are presented with the account of mighty wars and battles, with great slaughter—next, with multitudes of holy prophets, prophecy of the coming of the Messiah. Thousands were baptised unto repentance and for the remission of sins. “And the Holy Spirit of God did come down from heaven, and did enter into their hearts, and they were filled as with fire, and they could speak forth marvelous words,” p. 421. Freemasonry is here introduced and is said to have originated with a band of highwaymen. This institution is spoken of in very reproachful terms, in consequence of the members having bound themselves by secret oaths to protect each other in all things from the justice of the law. The Nephites are represented as being Anti-masons and Christians, which carries with it some evidence that the writer foresaw the politics of New York in 1828-29, or that work was revised at or about that time.

Nephi, who is the son of Helaman, now receives the sacred charge of keeping the plates, &c. together with the power of loosing and sealing in Heaven, and the gift of working miracles. He invokes a famine, which follows, as a matter in course, in order to bring the people to the remembrance of their religion. The distress and suffering occasioned by the famine is beyond description, without the aid of Mormon inspiration.

The Nephites, notwithstanding all their wars and difficulties, were not idle—they made progress in the sciences; their arts were not confined to the building of temples, houses and large ships, &c., but they understood astronomy, of which any one will be convinced after reading the following elegant extract: “If he saith unto the earth thou shalt go back that it lengthen out the day for many hours, and it is done; and thus according to his word the earth goeth back, and it appeareth unto men that the sun standeth still; yea, and behold, this is so: for sure it is the earth that moveth, and not the sun.” If the prophet Elijah had taken the same precaution when he commanded the sun to stand still, and explained it in such a clear and astronomical manner as did our Nephite prophet, the infidel caviling of Hume, Gibbon, and others, would doubtless have been avoided upon the subject of that miracle. But we perceive that the prophets of the Old Testament were of the minor class or were only satellites, when compared to an inspired Nephite.

The events of our history are growing more and more important—the heathen or the Lamanites send forth a prophet, (in what way it is brought about after all their curses we cannot see, but such is the fact) among the Christians; his name is Samuel, and he foretells the coming of Christ, and says the night before he will be born, will be as light as day, but in order that the people may distinguish the two periods of time, they shall see the sun rise and set, but the light would not be extinguished but remain as bright as day all night, p. 445. The crucifixion and death of our Savior is also foretold and described in the following poetic style: “The sun shall be darkened and refuse to give light unto you; and also the moon and stars; and there shall be no light upon the face of this land, for the space of three days,” and he adds that great earthquakes and convulsions, hills and mountains shall be leveled, and valleys shall become mountains; and divers atmospherical phenomena, such as thunder and lightning, tempests, &c. will take place, p. 446-7.

Samuel likewise prophecies of the restoration of the Lamanites, to the true religion of the Redeemer, and that they finally would be numbered among his sheep. Samuel is persecuted as usual among the Nephites, by the infidels, but he is represented as having so much of the spirit of God, that he was invulnerable to their missiles and other weapons.

“THE BOOK OF NEPHI, the son of Nephi, which was the son of Helaman,” p. 452.—The great and notable year has at length arrived, “and it was six hundred years from the time that Lehi left Jerusalem.” This is the year in which the Savior must be born, and the event is consequently brought about by our author, accordingly. During this year the infidels rallied all their forces, and towards the close they had rejoicings and festivities because they fancied that Samuel had prophecied falsely. They not only rejoiced, but sent forth threatenings against the Christians! But Nephi prayed to God for protection, who informed him that the time was at hand, that, that very night the sign should be given—and lo! the sun set, and the brightness of the day continued, to the discomfiture and confounding of the infidels. A star appeared, which every body saw even in the bright light of day. By what kind of vision it could be seen, we cannot conjecture, unless through the medium of those huge magic spectacles. The power of seeing stars in a bright light day was never heard of previous, nor since that time, unless through the medium of optical instruments; but whether the spectacles were used, or whether the star was as large and as bright as the sun, we cannot determine.

We have heretofore mentioned that free-masonry originated with a band of robbers, and at the present period of our history, that class of men are the most formidable foes of the Nephites. They inhabited the mountains and lurked in secret caverns of the rocks, and could not be ferreted out. The only safe-guard which the Nephites possessed, was, to appoint such men as were filled with the spirit of prophecy and revelation for their chief captains and generals; and by this means they could not be surprised and destroyed by the mountain robbers.

We do not object to this mode of making rulers over the people; but we cannot see why, when God appointed and annointed Joseph Smith his high priest on earth, and ruler over his people, he did not give him sufficient prophetic knowledge so that he might have avoided the disturbances in Missouri and his own tom fool's errand, together with about three hundred deluded followers, to reinstate the disinherited from the "promised land"?

Mighty battles are fought between the Nephites and their mountain enemies, but the former are always successful, on account of their inspired rulers and generals. "And thus they did put an end to all those wicked, and secret, and abominable combinations, in the which there were so much wickedness, and so many murders committed," p. 463.

The writer says his name is Mormon, and is a "pure descendant of Lehi," p. 464. He assures us that his record is true, but complains of the impoverished condition of their language, and that many things cannot be written in consequence of it. This is the first instance of any complaint that we have ever met with, where an inspired writer could not convey divine history, for want of language. In this case, the Almighty is represented as forestalling himself by undertaking to make a history of important events without language, through the medium of a brass plate engraver.—Preposterous!!

In the thirty-fourth year of the reign of the Judges, Samuel's prophecies are realized. A great and terrible tempest is described, which lasted three hours; thunder and lightning, such as were never before witnessed. The great city of Zarahemla took fire, and the city of Moroni sunk in the depths of the sea, cities which were in vallies were destroyed & their location became mountains, the rocks were split asunder and the face of the whole earth became "deformed," 470-1.

After the terrible tempest, then came on darkness, which was] so intense that it could be felt—candles, nor torches, nor fires, however dry the fuel, would not give the least scintillation of light—all was darkness; "the sun, nor the moon, nor the stars," were any more useful. In this terrible period, sixteen cities were destroyed, together with their inhabitants; some were burned, and others sunk into the depths of the sea!! p. 471-2.

The troubles of the Nephites and the destruction at this time, is represented by our author as surpassing all other events, and if the description was truth, we should not differ with him in the least. But let us see how it compares with the words of our Savior, as recorded in St. Matthew's gospel—"For there shall be great tribulation, such as was not, nor ever shall be." Here our blasphemer is at direct issue with the Son of God.

After the description of the great signs which were seen and heard during the three days of darkness and trouble, the people gather themselves in a great multitude about the temple, which was situate in the land Bountiful, and were expressing their astonishment of the past events, and conversing about Jesus Christ, when they heard a voice from heaven, which "caused their hearts to burn"—they cast their eyes toward Heaven, and they saw a man descend, clothed in a white robe. Fear came upon all for they thought it was an angel. The whole multitude are called upon to thrust their hands into his side and examine the points of the nails, and they did so, one by one, which satisfied them that it was the Son of God. After having authorised Nephí and a number of others to baptize, the Savior issues the following explicit command in relation to receiving members into the church: "Behold, ye shall go down and stand in the water, and in my name shall ye baptise them. And now behold, these are the words which ye shall say, calling them by name, saying—Having authority given me of Jesus Christ, I baptize you in the name of the Father, the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, Amen. And then shall ye immerse them in the water, and come forth again out of the water." It seems to us that the instructions here given are wholly gratuitous, for this mode, precisely, has already been practiced by the Nephites, for about four hundred years, or since King Noah was baptized, in the river Mormon.

The number which were authorised to administer and preach, were twelve, which were afterwards called apostles. After every thing is organized the beatitudes are repeated to them in a translation corresponding with that found in the 5th Chap. of St. Matthew's Gospel, together with the sermon on the mount, somewhat transposed, but the variations are inconsiderable. The Savior is represented as continuing to address the multitude with almost precisely the same sentences which are recorded by the evangelists, somewhat picked up, and not very judiciously arranged.

The preaching is finally finished, and Christ departs into Heaven, and we are then presented with apostolic writing, from which we extract the following beautiful, descriptive sentence: "And after this manner do they bear record; the eye hath never seen, neither hath the ear heard before, so great and marvellous things as we saw and heard Jesus speak unto the Father; and no tongue can speak, neither can the hearts of men conceive so great and marvellous things as we both saw and heard Jesus speak; and no one can conceive of the joy which filled our souls at the time we heard him pray for us unto the Father," p. 489.

The only additional commandments which were given to the American apostles on this special visit of the Savior, were—"Pray in your families unto the Father, always in my name, that your wives and your children may be blessed"—"meet often, and forbid no man from coming unto you, when you shall meet together," p. 492.

Nephi, our present hero, was the archbishop—he baptised himself, and then baptized the eleven, whose names were Timothy, Jonas, Mathoni, Mathonihah, Kumen, Kumenonhi, Jeremiah, Shemnon, Jonas, Zedekiah, and Isaiah—"They were baptized with fire and the Holy Ghost."—Many marvelous sayings are represented to have been uttered, but not one of them could either be spoken or written, although he spoke for many days!!

The plates of Nephi were critically examined, and only one omission could be found which was, that no mention was made of the resurrection of the saints which were raised in America at the time of the great tempest, who were very numerous!!

"THE BOOK OF NEPHI, THE SON OF NEPHI."—This book includes only four pages, and contains the whole history of three hundred and twenty years after Christ.—Events appear to be unimportant, or otherwise they are of that character which cannot be written nor spoken.

In the thirty-sixth year, all the inhabitants of the land were converted and baptized, and a perfect community of peace was the result. This condition of Millennial happiness, continued for one hundred and seventy years. Three of the apostles were immortalized and were seen four hundred years after their induction into the sacred office by the Savior. Where they are at this time, has not been revealed, but it is conjectured by some that the three witnesses appended to the Book of Mormon, to establish the truth of the brass-plate revelation, are the identical immortal three.

We cannot be dismissed by our author until we are told that sectarianism commenced among the Christians, which terminated in wars and bloodshed, and almost a total extinction of vital religion, which happened in the year, A. D. 320.

All the events, from the time when Amaleki delivered the plates to king Benjamin up to the present period of our history, have been written by Mormon, who is the recording angel of the whole matter. And he now keeps the record under his own observation; and commences a book in the following sublime language; "And now I, Mormon, make a record of the things which I have both seen and heard, and call it the Book of Mormon." We have never read of so great a general, nor so great a Christian as was our hero Mormon. He commanded in one engagement against the Lamanites, 42,000 men, all with splendid equipage, and under complete martial discipline. The terrible battle was fought, and Mormon came off victorious, as a matter of course, A. D. 330.

A definitive treaty was concluded, after the great battle between the two hostile powers; and the Lamanites took South America and the Nephites North America; there being only a small remnant left of either side. Mormon exhorts the people to obey the commands of Christ, and laments over the slain, and represents that thousands of females had fallen in the great battle, p. 530.

Moroni is the next on the stage, and finishes what his father left undone, and continues the history down to A. D. 400. He complains that the plates are so small, (the art of manufacturing the sacred brass leaves we suppose is lost) he is obliged to make the record in "Reformed Egyptian," otherwise he would have written or engraved the whole matter in Hebrew. The whole record "being handed down and altered according to our manner of speech," p. 538.—He says that no one shall disbelieve his record, because of its imperfections! and declares that all who receive it, will not condemn it for that reason, and promises to those who believe, not doubting, shall know far greater things, p. 532. "He that condemneth it shall be in danger of hell fire." We are told by Moroni, in a lamentable manner, that Free-masonry will be very prevalent in the days that the unlearned man shall find the plates; and establishes the doctrine that miracles will never cease unless it be through unbelief.

Previous to baptism each applicant must relate his religious experience, as being a duty and satisfaction to the church, and be sure not to partake of the sacrament unworthily.

THE "BOOK OF ETHER," which commences, "And now I, Moroni, proceed to give an account of the ancient inhabitants which were destroyed by the hand of the Lord, upon the face of this north country." The privilege of recording the great events of the people of Jared, has been reserved for our hero, Moroni. The people of Jared are those who were not confounded in their language at the destruction of Babel, but built ships, eight in number, and came to America, nearly 4000 years ago. The record is taken as we are told, from the gold plates which were found by the forty men whom king Limhi despatched to make discoveries.

One Ether is the reputed author of the engravings on the gold plates, and in the translation by Moroni, alias Smith, we are presented with a genealogy of the fathers down to Jared, who left the great Tower, together with sundry other families and embarked for America. The genealogy is somewhat amusing; he gives us TWENTY-NINE generations down to the time of Jared, and the time when the Lord confounded the languages. According to the writings of Moses, the Tower was built in the days of Shem, the son of the patriarch Noah, and agreeably to the evangelist Luke, there were only TEN generations between Shem and Adam!! If we are not allowed the Bible to prove the Book of Mormon false, we must resort to the reasonableness of the story and positions taken.

To rescue Jared and his people, God marched before them in a cloud, and after reaching the sea he directed them to construct eight barges, in which to cross the seas. The whole eight are finally built, after the directions given by the Lord, and when finished they were air-tight! The Lord directs them how to remedy the evil—they are commanded to make a hole in the top to admit air, and one in the bottom to admit water; in each hole was put a molten stone, which, when touched by the finger of Jesus, became as transparent as any glass, and gave them light under the “mountain waves,” as well as above the water. He that touched these stones appeared unto the brother of Jared, and said, “Behold I am Jesus Christ, I am the Father and the Son.” Two of these stones were sealed up with the plates, according to a prediction before Abraham was born. How, and in what manner they became set in the “two rims of a bow,” and fell into the hands of the Nephites, has not been explained, nor what has become of the remaining fourteen molten stones, is likewise hidden in mystery.

Moroni says, in his Book of Ether, that he that should find the plates, should have the privilege of shewing them unto those who should assist him in publishing the book, “and unto these shall they be shewn by the power of God: wherefore they shall of a surety know that these things are true,” p. 548.

Those barges or ships are literally described on page 57 of this work as it is found on p. 542. The barges are represented air tight, and after diving and swimming three hundred and forty four days, they all safely arrive at the land of promise.

The people of Jared had the Gospel of Jesus Christ revealed and preached to them—and in the lapse of ages and generatoins, they became very numerous, and wars and contentions ensue. Two renowned generals take the command of the two hostile forces; one is named Coriantumr and the other Shiz. Shiz pursues Coriantumr to the sea shore, where a battle is fought with unparalleled slaughter, which lasted three days—three battles more are fought, and Coriantumr is represented successful in every rencountre, but on the fifth attack, Shiz comes off conqueror.

Coriantumr now remembers the prophecies of Ether, and he counts his slain, and they amount to nearly TWO MILLION!! How many Shiz lost, is not computed. However, the cessation of hostilities did not last long; the two generals commenced rallying together their troops, which occupied four years; and every person was enrolled that was in all the land—"MEN, WOMEN AND CHILDREN,"—on one side or the other, except Ether, who was then the recording angel and prophet. "And it came to pass that when they were all gathered together, every one to the army which he would, with their wives and their children; both men, women and children, being armed with weapons of war, having shields, and breast-plates, and head-plates, and being clothed after the manner of war, they did march forth, one against another, to battle, p. 572.

They fought five successive days without conquering, and the slain could not be numbered; but the remains of Coriantumr's army were fifty-two, and those of Shiz, sixty-nine. The next day the forces met again, and the soldiers of Coriantumr were reduced to twenty-seven and those of Shiz to thirty-two; and on the next day they fought again—they were all killed except the two generals. Coriantumr took advantage of Shiz, and cut off his head, and then he “fell to the earth and became as if he had no life,” p. 573. This story cannot be doubted, for Ether went forth and saw it, and finished his record; and adds, that he is uncertain whether he shall be translated or not, and concludes by saying that it is no matter if he can be saved in the kingdom of God. Thus ends the Book of Ether, giving an account of the people of Jared, who were of a different race from the lineage of Adam, because we have their geneology, which embraces twenty-nine generations, and begins to count back from the days of Shem. Neither Noah nor any other of the antediluvian patriarchs are mentioned, consequently others must have been preserved from the flood than Noah and his family, if this history be true. Besides the inspiration of Moses is not only contradicted in this particular, but in the plain declaration that the Lord confounded the language of the whole human race, Gen. XI. 9.

“THE BOOK OF MORONI.”—Moroni is the last of the Nephites! He has survived his whole race, amidst wars and carnage, for the important purpose of “abridging” the records of the people of Jared and of sealing up the plates of Nephi, which is done, A. D. 420.

Contrary to his expectations, he lives, and concludes to write a book for the benefit of his brethren the Lamanites, which he hopes will ultimately convert them. To avoid discovery, by the Lamanites, he remains incognito;* he expresses great fear of assassination by them, if discovered, on account of his great belief in Christ, which he asserts, roundly, he will not renounce, p. 574.

*Moroni, however, has been seen by Smith, as he says, in Susquehannah Co., Pa., since the plates were translated. A more particular account of this interview will be found in a subsequent part of this work.

The manner of ordaining priests and teachers, and of "administering the flesh and blood of Christ" is the first subject explained ; after which, the particular qualifications for admission into Christ's visible church, is described, together with the ordinance of baptism, which must be done by immersing the candidate under water.

Moroni notices the manner in which the ancient Nephites worshiped, and says they met often to converse about the welfare of their souls, and met often to partake of the bread and wine, in remembrance of the Lord Jesus. It was customary to forgive their members for their transgressions, as often as they required it, and the confessions were made before the Elders of the church. Previous to the death of Mormon, he wrote a few epistles to his son Moroni, which he inserts, and then concludes to write something which seems good to him. Spiritual gifts, he assures us, will never cease, only through unbelief and want of faith. And when the plates of Nephi should be dug up out of the earth, Moroni "exhorts you that ye should ask God, the Eternal Father, in the name of Christ, if these things are not true ; and if ye shall ask with a sincere heart, with real intent, having faith in Christ, and he will manifest the truth of it unto you by the power of the Holy Ghost," p. 586. Here we are directed how we can all become Mormons, to wit : first believe all the fooleries, and forgeries, and lies of Jo Smith's translation of the brass plates ; and then pray to be convinced of its divine authenticity, not doubting, and then, by the power of the Holy Ghost, it will all be made manifest!!

We now have gone through with the new revelation, or the Bible of the Mormonites, the analysis of which we present to our readers. The task has been a laborious one, and we acknowledge but little has been effected, and would cheerfully make an apology to our readers for the uninteresting results, if the forest through which we have traveled had furnished better materials for our review. We should have abandoned the task, were it not that so many of our worthy fellow citizens have been seduced by the witcheries and mysterious necromances of Smith and his colleagues, from the paths of wisdom and truth, into folly and madness. We anticipate the bitter vituperation and sneers of the Mormon leaders and their influence over their already numerous followers, and do not expect to accomplish a reformation amongst them; but if we shall serve to enlighten any, who are not already the slaves of Mormon madness, alias the Devil, we will feel richly compensated.

The next subject is the testimony of the "three witnesses," Oliver Cowdery, David Whitmer and Martin Harris, which is appended to the Book of Mormon, to establish its divine authenticity. It is as follows :

THE TESTIMONY OF THREE WITNESSES.

Be it known unto all nations, kindreds, tongues, and people, unto whom this work shall come, that we, through the grace of God the Father, and our Lord Jesus Christ, have seen the plates which contain this record, which is a record of the people of Nephi, and also of the Lamanites, his brethren, and also of the people of Jared, which came from the tower of which hath been spoken; and we also know that they have been translated by the gift and power of God, for his voice hath declared it unto us; wherefore we know of a surety, that the work is true. And we also testify that we have seen the engravings which are upon the plates; and they have been shewn unto us by the power of God, and not of man. And we declare with words of soberness, that an Angel of God came down from heaven, and he brought and laid before our eyes, that we beheld and saw the plates, and the engravings thereon; and we know that it is by the grace of God the Father, and our Lord Jesus Christ, that we beheld and bear record that these things are true; and it is marvelous in our eyes: Nevertheless, the voice of the Lord commanded us that we should bear record of it; wherefore, to be obedient unto the commandments of God, we bear testimony of these things. And we know that if we are faithful in Christ, we shall rid our garments of the blood of all men, and be found spotless before the judgment seat of Christ, and shall dwell with him eternally in the heavens. And the honor be to the Father, and to Son, and to the the Holy Ghost, which is one God.

OLIVER COWDERY,
DAVID WHITMER,
MARTIN HARRIS,

The solemnity of an oath has been regarded sacred in all ages of the world; both by the pagan and the Christian. In all civil communities, like ours, when an individual calls the searcher of all hearts to whom he expects and firmly believes he must render a final account in a future state of existence, to bear him witness to the solemn truth of his assertions, we are irresistibly led to give full credit to his testimony. But experience has taught us, that sometimes individuals have purjured themselves, however revolting it may seem at first view; yet suspicions as to the credibility of a witness ought to be well grounded.

There are many circumstances which go to destroy the credibility of a witness, and his competency. By the common law, no person can be a witness, who does not entertain a just sense of the obligation of an oath, and disbelieves in a God, and a future state of accountability. Nor can any person be a witness who is interested in the event of a suit, that is, when he may gain or lose by the verdict.

These rules are taken, and are well founded, together with many others equally well established.

It is unnecessary for us, in this place, to give the reasons for the above rules of the common law; but the long application of them in our municipal courts, and the justice which has uniformly resulted from their operations upon the rights of individuals and communities, are sufficient arguments in favor of their equitable claim for continuance in all our civil tribunals.

At the end of the Book of Mormon the names of Oliver Cowdrey, David Whitmer and Martin Harris, are affixed under a most solemn oath, testifying to the divine exhibition of the plates to them, and of their having been translated by the power of God!!

Here are positive declarations, under the solemnities of an oath, with circumstances that will justify us in an examination, as to the credibility and competency of the witnesses.

In the first place, do each of these witnesses entertain a just sense of the obligation of an oath? do they believe in a future state of existence and accountability? We think the rational answers are in the negative; nor will any one disagree with us, when we shall have proven that the Book of Mormon was a joint speculation between the "author and proprietor" and the witnesses.

How stands the matter? Martin Harris was the scribe for Smith, for a considerable part of the work, and then mortgaged his farm to the publisher as collateral security for the payment of $3000, and after the book was completed he claimed the whole profits of the sale, until he should be reimbursed. These are facts which can be substantiated in a court of justice. Then, was he not a partner? would not the law consider him connected with Smith and make him jointly liable?

Oliver Cowdrey was the principal amanuensis, probably better qualified for the task, than his predecessor Harris.—How, and in what way he was connected we can only infer from circumstances. His pecuniary situation was very low, and the labor of writing, if he charged common wages, would amount to no inconsiderable sum, and Smith was wholly irresponsible to pay him, nor can we learn that Harris had indemnified him in any manner whatever. Then, the rational inference is, that after having the plot disclosed to him, he was willing to risk his chance for a fortune. He is now associated with the leaders, and appears in easy circumstances.

David Whitmer is a very inconsiderable person, but is in high standing, as a leader, among the Mormons. We know but little about him, only that he has been known as a man of small capacity, an anxious dupe to the marvelous, and a firm believer in witches. Whether he was suborned or deceived by the impostor we are unable to determine.

So far as it relates to Smith, Cowdery and Harris, we have clearly shown that they were connected in the outset, as the result has proven; a failure of which, would have reduced Harris to beggary, and blasted the fond hopes of Smith and Cowdery, and brought down upon them everlasting contempt and disgrace.

In addition to the joint speculation, we may connect the attempt to institute a new religion, contrary to the revelations of Jesus Christ, as revealed in the Bible—which we claim to have clearly shown in our analysis of the Book of Mormon. And he who would be guilty of so gross a sacrifice, necessarily disbelieves in accountability to God, and therefore would perjure himself, with impunity.

We contend, therefore, that no credit ought to be given to those witnesses; nor are they competent, firstly, because they were under no conscientious restraint, and secondly, their worldly prospects depended upon the issue.

Above, we have copied the solemn testimony of "the three witnesses," accompanied with circumstances which renders it proper for us to critically examine and analyze it. They call God to witness, that they have seen the plates from which the Book of Mormon is translated; and that the translation was accomplished by the power of God, for his voice had declared it unto them!! At what time this special revelation was made, is not specified; but we infer that the voice of God declared the fact to them in relation to the translation, at one time, and that they saw the plates at another; and they were severally chosen, and no others, to bear the testimony to the world. Nor could any others have seen and heard as they did, had they been present.

If an individual swears to a particular fact or facts, in order that the testimony may be believed—time, place and other circumstances must be mentioned, without which others might be prejudiced, by not giving them an opportunity to rebut. If the time and the place had been mentioned, when and where the plates were seen, it is not impossible but that testimony of equal credibility might be produced, to show that there was no such place; and that the witnesses were hundreds of miles from the country in which they testified they saw them. Then the testimony is vague and uncertain, and not entitled to credit upon that ground. If the subscribing witnesses saw the plates and heard the voice of God; they themselves must have been in some place or places when the communications were made; and it is not unreasonable to enquire into it.

But this is not all. Testimony must be of such a nature that others, if they were present, could have testified to the same facts. But in the testimony, the three would have us believe that they were specially chosen to testify to the truth of the Book of Mormon, and no others, according to the predictions of the Mormon prophets, made over two thousand years ago. Besides all the transactions which have been and will be shewn in the course of this work, in relation to the getting up of the Book of Mormon, the testimony carries strong suspicions upon the face of it; and were it disconnected from all other circumstances of fraud and deception, it would not be believed, however solemnly declared, in a court of justice.

We have, likewise, the testimony of eight other witnesses subjoined, consisting of four Whitmers, Hiram Page, Joseph Smith, Sen., (the father of the prophet,) and two of his brothers.

They testify that Joseph Smith, Jun., showed them the plates, and that they looked like gold, and that they saw the engravings and hefted them.

Who are the witnesses? four Whitmers of the same family with the one who subscribed to the miraculous exhibition of them, and three Smiths, the father and two brothers of the prophet. And what is their testimony? Why, that Jo Smith showed them some plates, that were yellow and had engravings upon them, which they could not read nor understand; but Jo probably told them that he had translated a part of them, and intended to continue the work until he had finished them. So much for the eight witnesses.

CHAPTER VIII.

Before the publication of the book, Smith found many to believe its contents, from the ghost stories which he related concerning it. Soon after it was issued from the press, a person by the name of Parley P. Pratt happened to be passing on the canal through Palmyra, and hearing of the wonders of the gold plates and huge spectacles, called on the prophet, and was soon converted. This Pratt then resided in Lorain County, Ohio; and had, some time previous, formed an intimacy with Sidney Rigdon, and became a convert to his doctrines. This Rigdon was a man of great eloquence, belonging to a denomination of Christians, who style themselves, "Disciples," or "Reformers," and who are also, by their opponents, in derision, called "Campbellites." He resided in the County of Geauga, and but a few miles from the place which has since been made the head quarters of Smith. He was a very popular preacher, and had large congregations in different parts of the country. If there was a man in the world that could successfully spread and give a name to the vagaries of the Smiths, it was Rigdon. They soon became convinced of this, by the representations of Pratt. We may here stop to remark that an opinion has prevailed, to a considerable extent, that Rigdon has been the Iago, the prime mover, of the whole conspiracy. Of this, however, we have no positive proof; but many circumstances have carried a suspicious appearance; and further developements may establish the fact.

Either before or soon after the arrival of Pratt at Manchester, among the Smiths, it appears that an expedition was fitted out for the Western Country, under command of Cowdery, in order to convert the Indians, or Lamanites, as they called them. As a preparatory step, a long revelation was furnished by Smith, to Cowdery, to serve as his credentials. This curious document will be found in the succeeding pages, from which it will be seen that the prophet, at the outset, feared a rivalry, and took effectual means to put it down. - His brother Hiram, it appears, also undertook to write some mysteries from a stone, which was forthwith retted, and pronounced to be the work of Satan.

As Cowdery had been a scribe to the prophet, it became necessary to supply his place. He therefore very prudently and affectionately, had the following command for his wife:

“A commandment to Emma, my daughter in Zion, A. D., 1830.—A revelation I give unto you concerning my will. Behold, thy sins are forgiven thee, and thou art an Elect Lady, whom I have called. Murmur not because of the things which thou hast seen, for they are withheld from thee and from the world, which is wisdom in me in a time to come; and the office of thy calling shall be for a comfort unto my servant Joseph, thy husband, in his afflictions, with consoling words in the spirit of meekness; and thou shalt go with him at the time of his going, and be unto him a scribe, that I may send Oliver whithersoever I will: and thou shalt be ordained under his hand to expound the scripture, and to exhort the church according as it shall be given thee by my spirit, for he shall lay his hands upon thee and thou shalt receive the Holy Ghost; and thy time shall be given to writing and to learning much; and thou needst not fear, for thy husband shall support thee from the church, for unto them is his calling, that all things might be revealed unto them whatsoever I will according to their faith; and verily I say unto thee, that thou shalt lay aside the things of this world and seek for the things of a better; and it shall be given thee also to “make a selection of sacred Hymns as it shall be given “thee, which is pleasing unto me to be had in my church,

“for my soul delights in the song of the heart, yea the song
“of the righteous is a prayer unto me, and it shall be answered with a blessing upon their heads, wherefore lift up “thy heart, and rejoice and cleave unto the covenant which “thou hast made—continue in the spirit of meekness—let “thy soul delight in thy husband and the glory which shall “come upon him—keep my commandments continually, “and a crown of righteousness thou shalt receive; and “except thou do this, where I am ye cannot come, and verily
“I say unto you that this is my voice unto all—Amen.”

These were some of Smith's first attempts at making his followers believe that the Lord was to make known his will constantly through him; and the persons chosen were, it must be acknowledged, the best of which the nature of the case would admit—his wife and Cowdery. In this operation, he abandoned his spectacles, or “peep-stone,” and merely delivered it with his eyes shut. In this manner he governs his followers, by asking the Lord, as he says, from day to day. Every difficult question or dispute is thus decided—from it there is no appeal. He has taught them, that to doubt their divine authority, is to endanger their salvation. We shall have occasion, in the progress of this work, to give many curious specimens of his art of governing.

The expedition to the “Lamanites” was finally fitted out by Smith, and was composed of Cowdery, Pratt, Peterson and Whitmer. In the latter part of October, 1830, under the guidance of Pratt, they arrived at the residence of Rigdon, in Mentor, Ohio, well supplied with the new bibles.—They professed to rejoice at finding a people walking according to the scriptures, and pretended to acknowledge no other guide. They professed to have no commands for them; nevertheless, they called upon them to receive the book as from Heaven, which they said mostly concerned the western Indians, as being an account of their origin, and a prophecy of their final conversion to Christianity, and make them a "white and delightful people," and be reinstated in their lands, of which they have been despoiled by the whites. When called upon for testimony, they appealed (like Mahomet) to the internal evidences of their book.—The book was read by Rigdon, and pronounced a "silly fabrication." When farther pressed upon the subject, they required the people to humble themselves before God, and pray for a sign from Heaven. Near the residence of Rigdon, in Kirtland, there had been, for some time previous, a few families belonging to his congregation, who had formed themselves into a common stock society, and had become considerably fanatical, and were daily looking for some wonderful event to take place in the world. Their minds had become fully prepared to embrace Mormonism, or any other mysterious ism that should first present itself. Seventeen in number of these persons, readily believed the whole story of Cowdery, about the finding of the golden plates and the spectacles. They were all re-immersed, in one night, by Cowdery. At this, Rigdon seemed much displeased, and when they came next day to his house, he told them that what they had done was entirely without precedent or authority, from the scriptures—for they had immersed those persons that they might work miracles, as well as come under their new covenant—showed them that the Apostles baptized for the remission of sins, instead of miraculous gifts. But when pressed upon the point, they said it was done merely at the solicitation of those persons. Rigdon again called upon them for proofs of the truth of their book and mission; they then related the manner in which they obtained faith, which was by praying for a sign, and an Angel was showed unto them. Rigdon here showed them from scripture the possibility of their being deceived: 'For Satan himself is transformed into an angel of light.' But said Cowdery, "do you think if I should go to my heavenly Father, with all sincerity, and pray to him in the name of Jesus Christ, that he would not show me an Angel; that he would suffer Satan to deceive me?" Rigdon replied, "if the heavenly Father has ever promised to show you an Angel, to confirm any thing, he would not suffer you to be deceived, for says John, 'this is the confidence we have with him, if we ask things according to his will, he hearkens to us.'" But he continued, "if you should ask the heavenly Father to show you an Angel, when he has never promised you such a thing, if the Devil never had an opportunity of deceiving you before, you give him one now."

However, about two days after this, Rigdon was persuaded to tempt God by asking this sign, which he knew to be contrary to his revealed will; he of course received a sign, and was convinced that Mormonism was true and divine.—According to his own reasoning, therefore, the Devil appeared to him as an angel of light; but he now imputed his former reasoning to pride, incredulity, and the influence of the Evil One.

On the conversion of Rigdon, a most successful starting point was thought to have been obtained. Cowdery and his associates then began to develope the peculiarities of the new imposition. Scenes of the most wild, frantic and horrible fanaticism ensued. They pretended that the power of miracles was about to be given to all those who embraced the new faith, and commenced communicating the Holy Spirit, by laying their hands upon the heads of the converts, which operation, at first, produced an instantaneous prostration of body and mind. Many would fall upon the floor, where they would lie for a long time, apparently lifeless. They thus continued these enthusiastic exhibitions for several weeks. The fits usually came on, during or after their prayer-meetings, which were held nearly every evening.—The young men and women were more particularly subject to this delirium. They would exhibit all the apish actions imaginable, making the most ridiculous grimaces, creeping upon their hands and feet, rolling upon the frozen ground, go through with all the Indian modes of warfare, such as knocking down, scalping, ripping open and tearing out the bowels. At other times, they would run through the fields, get upon stumps, preach to imaginary congregations, enter the water and perform all the ceremony of baptizing, &c. Many would have fits of speaking all the different Indian dialects, which none could understand. Again, at the dead hour of night, the young men might be seen running over the fields and hills in pursuit, as they said, of the balls of fire, lights, &c., which they saw moving through the atmosphere.

Before these scenes fully commenced, however, Cowdery had departed for the country inhabited by the Indians, with the expectation of converting them to Christianity, by means of his new bible, and miracles which he was to perform among them. These pretensions appeared to have taken possession of the minds of the young men in their aspirations. Three of them pretended to have received commissions to preach, from the skies, after having jumped into the air as high as they could. All these transactions were believed to be the Spirit of God, by the whole congregation, which now numbered more than one hundred.—That they were honestly impelled by the same causes which have, in all ages of the world, contributed so much to debase human nature, we have no doubt. One of the young men referred to, freely acknowledged, some months afterwards, that he knew not what he did, for two or three weeks.—Such is the mind of man, when his reason is dethroned by physical causes. One of these aerial commissions, which they all supposed was signed and sealed by Christ himself, we here subjoin, verbatim:

“Oh my servant, there is a great work for you and the other two of your brethren. I send a messenger to tell you where to go and find a piece of parchment that shall contain these words:—You shall teach repentance and remission of sins to all who shall come in the sound of your voice—I command you that you do these things in sincerity and in truth; and if you do, you shall be blessed.—The time is shortly acoming and is not far distant when you shall be bound together for life—the names of your brethren are these: Burr Riggs and Edson Fuller, and if they are not faithful I will choose another in their stead—my work must be done. My servants, you shall go forth from place to place, and if you are true to your trust, they shall hear. Remember that I am the Lord your God—serve me above all others, and I will bless you, in the end, Amen.

“That that you had a messenger tell you to go and get the other night, you must not show to any son of Adam.—Obey this and I will stand by you in all cases—my servants, obey my commandments in all cases, and I will provide.

{ Be ye always ready,
 { Be ye always ready, } whenever I shall call.
 { Be ye always ready, } My Seal

“There shall be something of greater importance revealed when I shall call you to go—my servants, be faithful over a few things, and I will make you a ruler over many.—Amen, Amen, Amen.”

These commissions, they said, came on parchment, and they had only time to copy them before they vanished from their sight. With such papers in their pockets they actually went through the country, preaching, and made many converts. Two of the three afterwards obtained their reason, and left the concern. All these things were afterwards pronounced by Smith to be the work of the Devil, although more than one hundred had been converted to Mormonism, by merely witnessing the exhibitions. They professed, at all times, their inability to work miracles, but were secretly trying to perform them, and frequently proclaimed their success. At a distance from the scene of action, many notable miracles were circulated.

During these performances, it should be remembered, that Rigdon was not present. In about three weeks after his conversion, he repaired to the bible quarry, in the state of New York, in order to have a personal interview with the prophet. Smith was prepared to receive him, of course; and a commandment was soon fitted out for him, every way calculated to suit his case and vanity. This being an important link in the chain of our history, we here transcribe it:

“A Commandment to Joseph and Sidney, Dec. 7, 1830: “Saying, listen to the voice of the Lord your God; I am “Alpha and Omega, the beginning and the end, whose course “is one eternal round; the same to-day as yesterday and “forever. I am Jesus Christ, was crucified for the sins of “the world, even as many as will believe on my name, that “they may become the sons of God, even on me as I am “in the father, as the father is in me, that we may become “one. Behold, verily, verily I say unto my servant Sid“ney, I have looked upon thee and thy works; I have heard “thy prayers; and prepared thee for a greater work—thou “art blessed, for thou shalt do great things. Behold, thou “wast sent forth even as John, to prepare the way before “me and Elijah which should come, and thou knewest it “not—thou didst baptize by water unto repentance, but “they secured not the Holy Ghost; but now I give unto “you a commandment, that thou shalt baptize by water and “give the Holy Ghost by laying on of hands, even as the “Apostles of old. And it shall come to pass that there shall “be a great work in the land, even among the Gentiles,

“for their folly and their abominations shall be made man“ifest in the eyes of all nations; for I am God, and mine “arm is not shortened, and I will shew miracles, signs and “wonders, unto all those who believe on my name; and “whosoever shall ask in my name, in faith, shall cast out “Devils, they shall heal the sick, they shall cause the blind
“to receive their sight, and the deaf to hear, and the dumb
“to speak, and the lame to walk; and the time speedily “cometh that great things are to come and be shown forth “unto the children of men; but without shall nothing be “shown forth except desolation and destruction upon Baby“lon, the same which hath made all nations drink of the “wine of their fornication, and there is none that doeth “good except them that are trying to receive the fulness of “my Gospel, which I have sent forth to this generation.—
“Wherefore, I have called upon the weak things, that they “are unlearned and despised, to thresh the nations by the “power of my spirit, and their arm shall be my arm, and I “will be their shield and their buckler; I will gird up their “loins and they shall fight manfully for me, and their ene“mies shall be put under their feet; and I will let fall the “sword in their behalf, and by the fire of mine indignation
“will I preserve them, and the poor and the meek shall have “the gospel preached to them, and they shall be looking “forth to the time of my coming, for it is nigh at hand,
“and they shall learn the parable of the fig-tree, for even “now already, summer is nigh at hand, and I have sent “forth the fullness of my gospel by the hand of my serv“ant Joseph, and in meekness have I blessed him, and I “have given unto him the keys of the mysteries of those “things which have been sealed, even things which have “been from the foundation of the world, and the things “which shall come from this time till the time of my coming,

 “if he abide in me, and if not, another will I plant in his “stead; wherefore, watch over him that his faith fail not;
 “as it shall be given by the comforter, the Holy Ghost, “which knoweth all things. And a commandment I give “unto you, that thou shalt write for him, and the scriptures “shall be given, even as they are in my own bosom, to the “salvation of mine own elect, for they will hear my voice,
 “and shall see me, and shall not be asleep, and shall abide
 “the day of my coming, for they be prepared, even as I “am prepared, and now, I say unto you, tarry with him “and he shall journey with thee—forsake him not, and “surely these things shall be fulfilled; and inasmuch as ye
 “do not write, behold it shall be given unto him to prophe“cy, and thou shalt preach my gospel and call on the Holy “Prophets to prove his words as they shall be given him.
 “Keep all the commandments and covenants by which ye “are bound and I will cause the Heavens to shake for “your good, and Satan shall tremble and Zion shall rejoice “upon the hills and flourish, and Israel shall be saved in “mine own due time, and by the keys which I have given “shall be led and no more be confounded. Lift up your “hearts and be glad, for your redemption is nigh. Fear “not, little flock; the kingdom is yours until I come. Be“hold I come quickly, even so. AMEN.”

We, before, had Moses and Aaron in the persons of Smith and Cowdery, and we now have John the Baptist, in the person of Sidney Rigdon. Their plans of deception appear to have been more fully matured and developed after the meeting of Smith and Rigdon. The latter being found very intimate with the scriptures, a close reasoner, and as fully competent to make white appear black, and black white, as any other man; and at all times prepared to establish, to the satisfaction of great numbers of people, the negative or affirmative, of any and every question, from scripture, he was forthwith appointed to promulgate all the absurdities and ridiculous pretensions of Mormonism, "and call on the Holy Prophets to prove" all the words of Smith. But the miraculous powers conferred upon him, we do not learn have yet been put in requisition. It seems that the spirit had not, before the arrival of Rigdon, told Smith any thing about the "promised land," or his removal to Ohio. It is, therefore, very questionable, "what manner of spirit" it was which dictated most of the after movements of the Prophet. The spirit of Rigdon, it must be presumed, however, generally held sway; for a revelation was soon had, that Kirtland, the residence of Rigdon and his brethren, was to be the eastern border of the "promised land," "and from thence to the Pacific Ocean." On this land the "New Jerusalem, the city of Refuge," was to be built. Upon it, all true Mormons were to assemble, to escape the destruction of the world, which was so soon to take place. The width of this Mormon farm, we have not heard described. The revelation concerning the promised land, we have not been able to obtain a copy of; it is explained, however, in the following letter from Rigdon, written to his brethren in Ohio, soon after he became acquainted with the movements and designs of the prophet.

"I send you this letter by John Whitmer. Receive him, for he is a brother greatly beloved, and an Apostle of this church. With him we send all the revelations which we have received; for the Lord has declared unto us that you pray unto him that Joseph Smith and myself go speedily."

unto you ; but at present it is not expedient for him to send us. He has required of us, therefore, to send unto you our beloved brother John, and with him the revelations which he has given unto us, by which you will see the reason why we cannot come at this time. The Lord has made known unto us, some of his great things which he has laid up for them that love him, among which the fact (a glory of wonders it is) that you are living on the land of promise, and that there is the place of gathering, and from that place to the Pacific Ocean, God has dedicated to himself, not only in time, but through eternity, and he has given it to us and our children, not only while time lasts, but we shall have it again in eternity, as you will see by one of the commandments, received day before yesterday. Therefore, be it known to you, brethren, that you are dwelling on your eternal inheritance ; for which, cease not to give ceaseless glory, praise and thanksgiving to the God of Heaven.—Yes, lift up your heads with joy, for the kingdom is ours till the Savior comes, even so, Amen—therefore, prepare your hearts to receive salvation which God has sent unto you, knowing that they have come from God ; and know assuredly if you receive them, you shall receive greater things, yes, things unspeakable and full of glory—“such as eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither hath it entered into the heart of man to conceive,” for our God hath in visions shown it unto me. Therefore, I write with the greatest certainty of these things which he hath prepared for us—yes, even us, forever, who receive the revelations of the last days, are the very people of whom the prophets spoke, and the very saints who shall rejoice with Jesus”!!!.

This communication caused a great rejoicing in the congregation. They were then residing upon their “eternal inheritance”!!! Rigdon tarried with Smith about two months, receiving revelations, preaching in that vicinity, and proving by the prophets that Mormonism was true, as he imagined. He then returned to Kirtland, Ohio, being followed in a few days after by the prophet and his connections. This being the "promised land," in it their long cherished hopes and anticipations of "living without work" were to be realized. Thus, from almost a state of beggary, the family of Smiths were immediately well furnished with the "fat of the land" by their fanatical followers, many of whom were wealthy.

CHAPTER IX.

On the return of Rigdon, many of his old friends called upon him to enquire about his new faith. The particulars of one of these interviews, we have on record by an eye-witness, which we shall give in his own words, with his remarks thereon:—

"Feb. 1, 1831.—Mr. Rigdon just returned from the state of New York. His irascible temper only left him for a little season. Two friends went from Mentor to see him—required of him a reason for his present hope, and for his belief in the Book of Mormon. He declined; saying he was weary, having just come off his journey, had lost much sleep, and the like. After a number of words had passed, by way of solicitation on one side, and refusal on the other, one of the friends from Mentor said he thought there was no more evidence to confirm the Book of Mormon, than the Koran of Mahomet. At this, Mr. R. seemed very angry, rose up and said, "Sir, you have insulted me in my own house—I command silence—if people come to see us and cannot treat us with civility, they may walk out of the door as soon as they please.” The person then made some apology. Mr. R. said he had borne every thing; he had been insulted and trampled upon, by old and young, and he would hear it no longer. The two friends then departed. Two days after, I accompanied several friends to Mr. R.’s residence, and found him in conversation with a Methodist elder. That being soon broken off, one of my friends modestly approached Mr. R. and solicited him to give some reason for his present faith. Mr. R., with great show of good nature, commenced a long detail of his researches after the character of Joseph Smith, he declared that even his enemies had nothing to say against his character; he had brought a transcript from the dockets of two magistrates, where Smith had been tried as a disturber of the peace, which testified that he was honorably acquitted. But this was no evidence to us that the Book of Mormon was divine. He then spoke of the supernatural gifts with which he said Smith was endowed; he said he could translate the scriptures from any language in which they were now extant, and could lay his finger upon every interpolation in the sacred writings, adding that he had proven him in all these things. But my friend knowing that Mr. Rigdon had no knowledge of any language but his own vernacular tongue, asked him how he knew these things, to which Mr. R. made no direct reply.

“Mr. Smith arrived at Kirtland the next day, and being examined concerning his supernatural gifts, by a scholar, who was capable of testing his knowledge, he confessed he knew nothing of any language, save the king’s English.

“Mr. R. asserted that our revelation came to us upon testimony—this we denied, and gave him reasons, which he himself formerly urged against deists. He then said the old revelations were confirmed by miracles, but the Book of Mormon would not be; it was not designed to be thus confirmed. (And Mahomet said, nearly twelve centuries ago, ‘Moses and Jesus were empowered to work miracles, yet the people did not receive them, wherefore, God had sent him without that attestation, to be the last and greatest prophet.’) But in this Mr. R. contradicted his book, for that declares it is to be thus established.

“We then asked Mr. R. what object we could have, in receiving the Book of Mormon—whether it enjoined a single virtue that the Bible did not, or whether it mentioned or prohibited a single additional vice, or whether it exhibited a new attribute of Deity? He said it did not. ‘The Book of Mormon, (said he) is to form and govern the Millennial Church; the old revelation was never calculated for that, nor would it accomplish that object; and without receiving the Book of Mormon there is no salvation for any one into whose hands it shall come.’ He said faith in the Book of Mormon was only to be obtained by asking the Lord concerning it. To this, scriptural objections were made. He then said, if we have not familiarity enough with our Creator to ask of him a sign, we were no Christians; and that, if God would not condescend to his creatures, in this way, he was no better than Jugernaut!!!

“Thus I have given a simple statement of facts. They proclaim the ancient gospel, putting their own appendages to it. When they think it will best suit their purpose, they say nothing about the Book of Mormon, and at other times make it their chief topic. Mr. R. said it was no part of his religion to defend the Book of Mormon, he merely wished the people to give heed to the old revelation. Again, there is no salvation without believing the Book of Mormon.—Mr. R. now blames Cowdery for attempting to work miracles, and said it was not intended to be confirmed in that way. How then are we to obtain fatih? Dees the book offer any internal evidence of its divinity: It contains nothing but what might have been, and evidently was, borrowed from the sacred writings and from the history of the world. Was it so with the revelation that was from the beginning? Far otherwise. Respecting Smith and his followers, do they give any proof of their honesty? They can give none but their own assertions. They have no sacrifice to make—no loss of fortune or reputation to sustain. They are in a land of liberty—very different were the circumstances of those who first promulgated the faith “once delivered to the saints.” They had to forsake their friends and relations—leave their possessions, and forfeit their reputation. Twelve apostles sealed their testimony with their blood. So, whether their religion was true or false, they proved their honesty. But Mormonism is to be proved, from beginning to end, by assertions, and this we have in whole numbers. But we know that they cannot more roundly and positively assert, than hundreds of impostures who have gone before them.”

From this point in the history of this delusion, it began to spread with considerable rapidity. Nearly all of their male converts, however ignorant and worthless, were forthwith transformed into “Elders,” and sent forth to proclaim, with all their wild enthusiasm, the wonders and mysteries of Mormonism. All those having a taste for the marvelous, and delighting in novelties, flocked to hear them.—Many traveled fifty and an hundred miles to the throne of the prophet, in Kirtland, to hear from his own mouth the certainty of his excavating a bible and spectacles.—Many, even in the New England States, after hearing the frantic story of some of these “elders,” would forthwith place their all into a waggon, and wend their way to the “promised land,” in order, as they supposed, to escape the judgments of Heaven, which were soon to be poured out upon the land. The State of New York, they were privately told, would most probably be sunk, unless the people thereof believed in the pretensions of Smith.

On the arrival of Smith in Kirtland, he appeared astonished at the wild enthusiasm and scalping performances, of his proselytes there, as heretofore related. He told them that he had enquired of the Lord concerning the matter, and had been informed that it was all the work of the Devil. The disturbances, therefore, ceased. Thus we see that the devil, for the time being, held full sway in making converts to Mormonism. We must here stop to introduce another document, which belongs to this history. Soon after the return of Rigdon to Kirtland, in some of his eloquent harangues on the subject of his new faith, he gave a challenge to the world to disprove the new Bible, and the pretensions of its authors. Elder THOMAS CAMPBELL, of Va. being in the neighborhood, addressed him the following Letter:—

MENTOR, February 4, 1831.

Mr. Sidney Rigdon:

Dear Sir—It may seem strange, that instead of a confidential and friendly visit, after so long an absence, I should thus address, by letter, one of whom, for many years, I have considered not only as a courteous and benevolent friend, but as a beloved brother and fellow laborer in the gospel—but alas! how changed, how fallen! Nevertheless, I should now have visited you as formerly, could I conceive that my so doing would answer the important purpose both to ourselves, and to the public, to which we both stand pledged, from the conspicuous and important stations we occupy:—you, as a professed disciple and public teacher of the infernal book of Mormon; and I, as a professed disciple and public teacher of the supernal book of the Old and New Testaments of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ—which you now say is superceded by the book of Mormon—is become a dead letter—so dead, that the belief and obedience of, without the reception of the latter, is no longer available to salvation; to the disproof of this assertion, I understand you defy the world. I here use the epithets infernal and supernal in their primary and literal meaning, the former signifying from beneath, the latter from above, both of which are truly applied, if the respective authors may be accredited; of the latter of which, however, I have no doubt. But, my dear sir, supposing you as sincere in your present, as in your former profession, (of the truth and sufficiency of which you have frequently boasted with equal confidence,) neither yourself, your friends, nor the world, are therefore bound to consider you as more infallible in your latter than in your former confidence, any further than you can render good and intelligible reasons for your present certainty: This, I understand from your declaration on last Lord's day, you are abundantly prepared and ready to do. I, therefore, as in duty bound, accept the challenge, and shall hold myself in readiness, if the Lord permit, to meet you publicly, in any place, either in Mentor or Kirtland, or in any of the adjoining towns, that may appear most eligible for the accommodation of the public.

The sooner the investigation takes place the better for all concerned; therefore, it is hoped you will not protract the time beyond what may justly be deemed necessary for giving sufficient publicity to the proposed discussion—say one week after your reception of this proposal to accept the challenge you have publicly given, for the vindication and eviction of the divine authorship of Mormonism, which, if your assertion be true, that there is no salvation for any that do not embrace it; and not only so, but I am credibly informed you have asserted, that even those who have lived and died in the faith and obedience of the old book, in the triumphant assurance of a glorious resurrection and a blissful immortality, may be in hell for aught you know; therefore, I say again, the sooner this matter is publicly settled, the better. For my part, I do cordially assure you, sir, that if I were in the possession of a nostrum, upon the knowledge and belief of which, the salvation of every soul of man depended, I should consider myself responsible to the whole world for the speedy and effectual confirmation and publication of it; and if it be at all a revelation from God for the salvation of man, he must be wonderfully changed since he gave the former revelation of his will, for that important purpose, if he do not require you so to do, for he was then willing that all men should come to a knowledge of his will and truth and be saved; and therefore, he not only charged all to whom he made it known, by special revelation, to go into all the world and declare it to every creature, but also furnished them with such potent and evincive arguments, both prophetic and miraculous, as no candid inquirer could mistake, without abandoning both his senses and his reason. If then, the Book of Mormon, which you assume to vindicate as a divine revelation, upon the belief and obedience of which the salvation of all men stands suspended, be such, then surely the unchanged and unchangeable author, who, it seems, has communicated it to you and others, by special revelations, has, doubtless, furnished you with such special, intelligible, and convincing arguments, as are abundantly sufficient to convince every candid inquirer, as he did the heralds of the former dispensations.—Therefore, woe is unto you if you preach not your gospel. But why should I seem to doubt the philanthropy of my former friend and brother, more than I do my own, or that of the apostle Paul, that I should thus appear to urge his performance of a challenge, which, no doubt, the purest and most benevolent motives excited him to propose, for the purpose of promoting, as fast as possible, the benign intentions of his mission? Taking this for granted, I shall further add, in relation to the manner of conducting this all-important investigation, that, seeing it is purely for the discovery and confirmation of the truth, upon the belief and obedience of which, depends the salvation of the world, the parties realizing the deep and awful responsibility of the undertaking, and having no private and personal interest at stake, separate from the rest of mankind, will not only afford each other every facility of investigating and exhibiting the truth by all manner of fairness, both of argument and concession, but also by the mutual allowance of any assistance that can be contributed by the friends on each side, either suggesting matter to the speakers, or by correcting any mistakes that may occur in quotations, references, &c, in an amicable and an obliging manner, without giving or taking offence on these accounts; that for these purposes, each party shall be at liberty to select as many of his intelligent friends as he pleases to assist him as prompters; and if any difficulty occur, respecting time, order, &c, it shall be referred to a competent board of moderators, equally chosen by the parties, that the whole investigation may be conducted without the least shadow of disorder or partiality.

According to the spirit and tenor of the above proposals on my part, for the speedy and effectual determination of the momentous question at issue, I shall candidly inform you of the course I intend to take, for the confirmation and defence of my side of the question, that you may be the better prepared to meet my arguments with a solid and unanswerable refutation, if possible; as I can have no wish, nor can any man in his common senses, where the salvation of the soul is at stake, but to know and embrace the saving truth. The proposition that I have assumed, and which I mean to assume and defend against Mormonism and every other ism that has been assumed since the Christian era, is—The all-sufficiency and the alone-sufficiency of the holy scriptures of the Old and New Testaments, vulgarly called the Bible, to make every intelligent believer wise to salvation, thoroughly furnished for any good work. This proposition, clearly and fully established, as I believe it most certainly can be, we have no more need for Shakerism, Wilkinsonianism, Buchanism, Mormonism, or any other ism, than we have for three eyes, three ears, three hands, or three feet, in order to see, hear, work, or walk. This proposition, I will illustrate and confirm by showing—

1st, That the declarations, invitations, and promises of the gospel, go to confer upon the obedient believer the greatest possible privileges, both here and hereafter, that our nature is capable of enjoying.

2nd, That there is not a virtue which can happify or adorn the human character, nor a vice that can abase or dishappify, which human heart can conceive, or human language can express, that is not most clearly commanded or forbidden in the holy scriptures.

3rd, That there are no greater motives, that can possibly be expressed or conceived, to enforce obedience or discourage and prevent disobedience, than the scriptures most clearly and unequivocally exhibit.

These propositions being proved, every thing is proved that can affect our happiness, either here or hereafter.

We shall, however, if deemed necessary, next proceed to expose the blasphemous pretensions of Mormonism, by examining both its external and internal evidences.

1st. By examining the character of its author and his ac complices, as far as documents for that purpose may have come to hand.

2d. Their feigned pretensions to miraculous gifts, the gift of tongues, &c.; a specimen of the latter we shall afford them an opportunity of exhibiting in three or four foreign languages.

3d. We shall next proceed to expose the anti-scriptural assertions, that there has been none duly authorized to administer baptism, for the space of fourteen hundred years up to the present time, by showing that the church or the kingdom of Christ, must have been totally extinct during that period, provided its visible administration had actually ceased during that time, is an express contradiction of the testimony of Jesus, Mat. xvi. 18.

4th. We are prepared to show that the pretended duty of common property among Christians is anti-scriptural, being subversive of the law of Christ, and inimical to the just rights of human society.

5th. We shall next proceed to show, that re-baptizing believers is making void the law of Christ; and that the imposition of hands for communicating the Holy Spirit, is an unscriptural intrusion upon the exclusive prerogative of the primary apostles.

6th. We shall also show that the pretensions of Mormonism, as far as it has yet been developed, are in no wise superior to the pretensions of the French Prophets, of the Shakers, of Jemima Wilkinson, &c. That all these pretended to as high degrees of inspiration, to prophoeings, to visions, to as great humility, self-denial, devotion to God, moral purity, and spiritual perfection; declaimed as much against sin, denounced as heavy judgments against their neighbors, and against the professing world at large, for their corruptions of Christianity, &c. &c. as the Mormonites have done or can do; the two latter have also insisted as much upon the supposed duty of common property, and have spoken as certainly of the near approach of the millenium, and of their relation to that happy state, as any of the Mormonite Prophets, especially the Shakers, who pretend to be living subjects of that happy period, and and who have also given us an attested record of their miraculous operations.

The obvious conclusion of this sixth argument is evident, that if the Mormonite prophets and teachers can show no better authority for their pretended mission and revelations than these impostors have done, we have no better authority to believe them than we have to believe their predecessors in imposition. But the dilemma is, we can't believe all, for each was exclusively right in his day, and those of them that remain, are still exclusively right to this day; and if the Shakers be right, the whole world, the Mormonites themselves not excepted, are in the gall of bitterness and bonds of iniquity—quite as far from salvation as you yourself have pronounced all the sectarians on earth to be, namely, in a state of absolute damnation.

In the last place, we shall examine the internal evidence of the Book of Mormon itself, pointing out its evident contradictions, foolish absurdities, shameless pretensions to antiquity, restore it to the rightful claimant, as a production beneath contempt, and utterly unworthy the reception of a schoolboy.

Thus, my dear sir, I have given you a fair and full statement of my intended method of defence and attack, of the principal topics of argument pro and con, which I shall use, provided you stand to your proposed challenge. I have also used great plainness of speech, and spoken of things just as I believe they deserve, as you yourself are in the habit of doing; and who can do otherwise upon a subject of such vast importance, if he duly realize them? Nevertheless, I would not have you think, although I consider things just as I have spoken, that I suppose myself more infallible than you do yourself ; but I should blush to fall short of any one, of any sect whatever, in my expressions of confident certainty of the truth of my profession, which has stood the test of most rigorous investigation for nearly eighteen hundred years, and which I have scrupulously examined, for upwards of forty, especially when the investigation is with sectarians of little more than three months standing.

But though I have spoken as positively as you have done, and we have both spoken positive enough, I will yet venture to assure you that you will find me, as changeable as yourself, provided you afford me evidence paramount to the evidence which I have proposed to produce for the ground which I at present occupy, for it has ever been with me a fixed principle, that the less should give way to the greater. But in case I should fail to convince you, or that you should fail to convince me, others may be benefitted ; and we shall have the consolation of having discharged our duty, both to each other and the public, for no man liveth to himself.

In the mean time I wait for your reply, which you will please to forward per bearer. I hope you will be as candid and plain with me as I have been with you. My best respects to Mrs. Rigdon, and sincerest wish for the happiness of your family.

I remain, with grateful remembrances of the past, and best wishes for the future, your sincere friend and humble servant,

THOMAS CAMPBELL.

It is only necessary to say, that after Rigdon had read a few lines of the above, he hastily committed it to the flames.

CHAPTER X.

About this time an opinion was propagated among them, that they should never taste death, if they had sufficient faith. They were commanded to have little or no connexion with those who had not embraced their faith, and every thing must be done within themselves. Even the wine which they used at their communion, they were ordered to make from cider and other materials. All diseases and sickness among them were to be cured by the Elders, and by the use of herbs—denouncing the Physicians of the world, and their medicines, as enemies to the human race.

¶ They had one or two root doctors among them, for whose benefit it is presumed the Lord made known his will, if at all. Notwithstanding, the prophet himself was the first one to break over the rules he had received from the Lord. Being much alarmed for the fate of his “elect lady,” in an obstetrical case, he applied to the world, (after all the Mormon remedies had failed,) for an eminent physician. This gave dissatisfaction to some of his followers, but like every thing else, was easily smoothed over.

About the last of March, a young man about 20 years of age, by the name of Dota, became suddenly ill and died. He was duly commissioned, after their manner, to preach, was very active and zealous in the cause, and so fully did he believe in the divine mission and miraculous powers of Smith, that he had a firm expectation of living in the world a thousand years. This he made known to a near relation of his, about four weeks before his decease. Five days before he expired, he was suddenly attacked with an inflammation in the bowels. He was immediately removed to the residence of his parents, living in the neighborhood, who had no faith in the Mormon remedies for the cure of diseases. No persuasion, however, could induce the young man to have a physician called, so strongly was he impressed with the supernatural powers of Smith. Several of the Elders assembled around the sick man, where they continued to encourage him to persevere, and ministering to his delusion, by telling him that he was getting better, and would soon be well, till they saw he was about to expire, when they left him to his fate. Smith was sent for soon after he was taken sick, and proceeded towards the house of Dota, to heal him, but soon returned back, saying that he had received a commandment not to "cast pearl before swine." He, however, visited the sick man a day or two after, and protested against calling a physician, saying that he would get well. A physician was finally called, a few hours before he expired, who told him he had fallen a victim to his delusions. When the young man discovered that death was nigh, his faith in Smith's pretensions seemed to forsake him. He said, "what a wonderful mistake I have made." Addressing himself to an old man of the Mormon faith, he said, "you are a friend to every body—I must shake hands with you—this is a lesson which I have learnt by actual experience, by which you ought to profit, but with me it is too late."

The Mermons soon began to assemble in considerable numbers at and about Kirtland, the supposed "eternal inheritance," and those who were able, bought land; but the greater part of their dupes had thus far been the poor and needy, and came there with a view of enjoying all things "in common," as such doctrine had gone forth. Many, however, found out their mistake after their arrival; and the revelation appeared to be only that the prophet and some of his relations should be supported by the church.—

In consequence of their inability to purchase lands adjoining head-quarters, they were scattered about in several townships, much exposed to "wild beasts," and subject to have their faith shaken by the influence of reason. Several renounced it. They were daily running to the prophet with queries and doubts which were constantly arising upon their minds. He generally satisfied them by explaining; nevertheless, they annoyed him much, and the necessity of withdrawing them from the influences which surrounded them, became apparent: hence, their removal to Missouri, where they could, in time, purchase all the land which they should need at a low rate, and become a "distinct people."

As before noticed, Cowdery and his companions, proceeded on to the west, with the avowed intention of converting the Indians, under a command of the Lord. On their way they tried their skill on several tribes, but made no proselytes, although their deluded brethren at home could daily see them, in visions, baptizing whole tribes. They finally arrived at the western line of the State of Missouri, late in the fall of 1830, with the intention of proceeding into the Indian country, but were stopped by the agents of the general government, under an act of Congress, to prevent the white people from trading or settling among them. They then took up their winter quarters in the village of Independance, about 12 miles from the State line. Here they obtained employment during the winter. In the following spring, one of them returned to Kirtland, with a flattering account of the country about Independence. About the 1st of June, the prophet assembled all his followers, for the purpose of a great meeting, at which time it was given out that marvelous events were to take place. Here many new attempts were made by Smith to perform miracles and otherwise to deceive his followers. Previous to this time, it should be remarked, nearly all the Mormonites had arrived from the State of New York, under a revelation, of course, to take possession of the "promised land." There were, in all, about fifty families. At the above mentioned meeting a long revelation was manufactured, commanding all the leading men and Elders to depart forthwith for the western part of Missouri, naming each one separately, informing them that only two should go together, and that every two should take separate roads, preaching by the way. Only about two weeks were allowed them to make preparations for the journey, and most of them left what business they had to be closed by others. Some left large families, with their crops upon the ground, &c. &c., and embarked for a distant land, from which they have not yet returned. For further particulars of this expedition, its objects and return, we shall refer the reader to the statements of an eye-witness, who was one of the party, which are given at length hereafter, (see Booth's Letters.)

On arriving at the village of Independence, they proceeded to purchase a lot of land, upon which the prophet directed Rigdon and Cowdery to perform the mock ceremony of laying the corner stone of a city, which he called Zion. Of the future prosperity and magnificence of this city, many marvelous revelations were had by the prophet and many more marvelous conjectures formed by his dupes. Among others, it was said that it would in a few years exceed in splendor every thing known in ancient times. Its streets were to be paved with gold; all that escaped the general destruction which was soon to take place, would there assemble with all their wealth; the ten lost tribes of Israel had been discovered in their retreat, in the vicinity of the North Pole, where they had for ages been secluded by immense barriers of ice, and became vastly rich; the ice in a few years was to be melted away, when those tribes, with St. John and some of the Nephites, which the Book of Mormon had immortalized, would be seen making their appearance in the new city, loaded with immense quantities of gold and silver. Whether the prophet himself ever declared that these things had been revealed to him, or that he had seen them though his magic stone, or silver spectacles, we will not say ; but that such stories and hundreds of others equally absurd, were told by those who were in daily intercourse with him, as being events which would probably take place, are susceptible of proof.

The prophet and his life-guard of Elders, stayed in their city about two weeks. Revelations were had for a part of them to return to Ohio, a part to stay and take charge of the city, and a part to commence preaching "in the region round about." Much dissatisfaction was manifested by some of the dupes, as to the selection of the site, and the general appearance of the country. Smith, Rigdon and Cowdery returned to the old head-quarters in Kirtland.— Their followers immediately commenced selling their lands, mostly at a great sacrifice, and made preparations for emigrating up the Missouri. All were now anxious to sell, instead of buying more land in Ohio. A special command was given to seventeen families, who had settled in one township, some three months previous, to depart forthwith to the promised land, who obeyed orders, leaving their crops to those who owned the land. Besides a great variety of special revelations relating to individuals, and other matters, a general one was given to the proselytes to sell their lands and other property and repair to Missouri as fast as possible, but not in haste. Accordingly, many went during the year, making sacrifices of property, (those few of them who had any,) in proportion to their faith and their anxiety to be upon their "eternal inheritance." In the mean time, thirty or forty "Elders" were sent off in various directions in pursuit of proselytes. This year passed off with a gradual increase, and considerable wealth was drawn in, so that they began to boast of a capital stock of ten or fifteen thousand dollars.

Their common stock principles appear to be somewhat similar to those of the Shakers. Each one, however, is allowed to "manage his own affairs in his own way," until he arrives in Missouri. There the Bishop resides; he has supreme command in all pecuniary matters, according to the revelations given by the prophet. The one relating to this branch of business reads in these words:

"If thou lovest me, thou shalt serve me and keep my commandments; and behold thou shalt consecrate all thy properties, that which thou hast, unto me, with a covenant and a deed which cannot be broken; and they shall be laid before the Bishop of my church, and two of the Elders, such as he shall appoint and set apart for that purpose. And it shall come to pass that the Bishop of my Church, after that he has received the properties of my Church, that it cannot be taken from the Church, he shall appoint every man a steward over his own property, or that which he has received, inasmuch as shall be sufficient for himself and family; and the residue shall be kept to administer to him who has not, that every man may receive according as he stands in need; and the residue shall be kept in my store-house, to administer to the poor and needy, as shall be appointed by the Elders of the Church and Bishop, and for the purpose of purchasing land, and the building up of the New Jerusalem, which is hereafter to be revealed; that my covenant people may be gathered in one, in the day that I shall come to my temple; and this I do for the salvation of my people. And it shall come to pass, that he that sinneth and repenteth not, shall be cast out, and shall not receive again that which he has consecrated unto me: For it shall come to pass, that which I spoke by the mouths of my prophets shall be fulfilled, for

I will consecrate the riches of the Gentiles unto my people, which are of the House of Israel.”

The next year commenced with something like a change of operations. Instead of selling their possessions in Ohio, they again began to buy up improved land, mills and water privileges. It would seem that the Missouri country began to look rather dreary to the prophet and his head men, supposing that they could not enjoy their power there as well as in Ohio. They could not think of undergoing the hardships and privations incident to a new country. Besides, the people there were not much disposed to encourage the emigration of such an army of fanatics—and their “Lamanite” brethren, under Gen. Black Hawk, were about that time commencing a war upon the whites.

They, therefore, continued to extend their impositions by sending abroad every thing that could walk, no matter how ignorant, if they had learnt the tales and vagaries of their leaders. All that were so sent, were dubbed Elders or High Priests, and furnished with a commission, purporting to have been dictated by the Lord to the Prophet. These requisites being added to their credulity, they were of course inspired with all necessary self-sufficiency, zeal and impudence. They were thus prepared to declare that every thing which they stated or imagined, was absolutely true—for the Spirit had so informed them. Many of them actually carried their power of discerning spirits, and their enthusiasm, so far, that they frequently declared, that if Smith and all his witnesses were now to come forward and say that his pretensions were a wicked deception, they would not believe a word of it—because the Spirit had shown that it was true. Here again, the intelligent mind will readily discover one of the principal sources of all error and delusion. Here is the sure refuge, the fast hold, of every impostor. This something, which is the Spirit, or the Holy Spirit, has been the standing, unequivocal, incontrovertible and true witness for at least 24 false Messiahs, for Mahomet, who is considered the prince of impostors, and for nearly fifty others who have come with pretended commissions from Heaven. They all had, and may still have, numerous followers, whose faith was wrought and confirmed by what they supposed to be the Spirit.

During the year 1832, considerable progress was made in writing out, and revising the Old and New Testaments, which the prophet pretended to do by inspiration, or by the guidance of the Spirit. In this business, most of his leisure hours were occupied, Rigdon acting as scribe. They say that the Scriptures, in their present form, retain but little of their original purity and beauty, having been so often copied and translated by unskilful hands. The whole of the old Bible is now said to be ready for the press, in its amended form, and will be forthcoming, as soon as the state of their finances will permit. The curious, perhaps, may be anxious to learn what alterations the prophet has made in the numerous verses and chapters which he has copied into his book of Mormon, almost verbatim, and especially the thirteen chapters of Isaiah.

Revelations and commandments still continue to be received. Visions were frequently had, and extraordinary prophecies given out verbally by Smith, to his followers, to strengthen and prolong their faith. Although he has assumed the name and title of prophet, he is very cautious how he commits himself. His predictions are always found far off, equivocal, and ambiguous, and always relate to some events which every one supposes to be quite probable, and delivered in such a way, that their failure is susceptible of an easy explanation, but if he happens to guess right, in any case, it is immediately placed to his credit as a true prophecy. We will give but a single specimen of this branch of his business: After the Cholera had ceased its ravages in New York, in 1832, Smith prophesied it would return the ensuing year, with much greater severity and violence, and nearly depopulate the city. From the known character of that disease, its return was apprehended by most people, and with more fatal effects. This was thought by our modern prophet, to be too good an opportunity to pass unimproved, for establishing his reputation as a true prophet of God. But the prediction wholly failed.

CHAPTER XI.

On the opening of the year 1833, the "gift of tongues" again made its appearance at head-quarters, and from thence extended to all their branches in different parts. Whether the languages now introduced, differed materially from those practised two or three years previous, (and pronounced to be of the Devil,) we have not been informed. It appears that this last device, was all that was then lacking to make the system perfect. They had long before professed to be fully endowed with the power of healing all manner of diseases, discerning spirits, and casting out devils. But a succession of failures had rendered them rather stale, and given distrust to many of the faithful. A new expedient was therefore indispensably necessary, in order to revive the drooping spirits of the deluded, and at the same time, insure a new crop of converts. The scheme proved eminently successful. Hundreds were soon convinced of the truth of the whole, by hearing of and seeing the manner in which the "tongues" were performed, although the trick would seem more susceptible of discovery than any previous one. This gift was not confined to the Elders and high priests, who, in other respects, were supposed to have a superabundant share of "the spirit"; but nearly all the proselytes, both old and young, could show their faith by speaking with "tongues." And it would appear, from all the facts which we have been able to gather upon this subject, that if this gift were not supernaturally bestowed, it required but a few moments instruction from a priest, to render his pupil expert in various dead languages, which could never be understood by man or beast, except a supernatural power was at the instant given to some one present to interpret it.—They sometimes professed to believe that these "tongues" were the same which were "counfounded" at the building of Babel.
